ARUNAH S. ABEll, Esq.,

FOUNDER, EDITOR, AND PROPRIETOR OF THE BALTIMORE SUN,

THIS VOLUME IS DEDICATED;

PARTLY IN TESTIMONY OF THE AUTHOR’S ESTEEM AND HIS ENDURING GRATITUDE FOR MANY KINDNESSES, ANCIENT AND RECENT; PARTLY, ALSO, AS A TRIBUTE OF THE AUTHOR’S GENUINE ADMIRATION FOR, AND APPRECIATION OF, the model newspaper of the United States. This great Structure, as it was Mr. Abell’s creation, will also become his monument. It is a Perfect Piece of Work, “not built by envious show,” yet symmetrical in all its Parts, and the Pride of the Generous Architect swells chiefly at the Fact that, as it was reared with no man’s ruin and to no man’s hurt, so there are none who witness its Prosperity with Envy or wish its solid columns less stately in their vista. It is so built that there is always not only encouragement, but necessity, for its expansion; its influence in the community, always large and strong, and always increasing, must ever be on the side of virtue, honor, justice, and enlightenment, since the public will never believe it capable of utterance or suggestion on any other side.

The Founder’s Sons may be expected to maintain in its pristine integrity, develop, enlarge, and beautify the original work; but neither They nor the Public will ever fail to uphold him for its creating and perfecting should he depart now, or should his life be spared to us for multiplied years, which all trust and pray, none more fervently than

PREFACE.

The preparation of such a work as the "History of Western Maryland" imposes a vast responsibility and an immense amount of labor. Years of study devoted to the subjects embraced in it, the encouragement of friends, and the enterprise of the liberal publisher induced the author to undertake the work.

In the compilation of this history no authority of importance has been overlooked. The author has carefully examined every source of information open to him, and has availed himself of every fact that could throw new light upon, or impart additional interest to, the subject under consideration. Besides consulting the most reliable records and authorities, over fifteen thousand communications were addressed to persons supposed to be in possession of facts or information calculated to add value to the work. Recourse has not only been had to the valuable libraries of Baltimore, Annapolis, Frederick, and Hagerstown, but the author and his agents have visited personally the entire territory embraced in the six counties of Western Maryland, spending much time in each district, examining ancient newspapers, musty manuscripts, family, church, and society records, conversing with the aged inhabitants, and collecting from them orally many interesting facts never before published, and which otherwise, in all probability, would soon have been lost altogether. In addition to the material partly used in the preparation of his "Chronicles" and "History of Baltimore City and County" and "History of Maryland," the author has consulted an immense number of pamphlets, consisting of county and town documents, reports of societies, associations, corporations, and historical discourses, and, in short, everything of a fugitive character that might in any way illustrate the history of Western Maryland. From these and a large collection of newspapers (more particularly a nearly complete file of the Hagerstown Torchlight, Mail, Spy, and Herald, which were kindly loaned by Messrs. Mittag, Bell & Williams, and E. W. Mealey) great assistance has been derived.

With the aid of Prof. Philip R. Uhler, the topography and geology, as well as the geography, of Western Maryland have received the attention which their importance demands. Sketches of the rise, progress, and present condition of the various religious denominations, professions, political parties, and charitable and benevolent institutions, societies, and orders form a conspicuous feature of the work. Manufacturing, commercial, and agricultural interests have also a prominent place. An account of the county school system is also given, and a history of the various institutions of learning of which Western Maryland has every reason to be proud. Many of the facts recorded, both statistical and historical, may seem trivial or tediously minute to the general reader, and yet such facts have a local interest and sometimes a real importance.

An honest effort has been made to do justice to both sections in the relation of such events of the civil war as come within the proper scope of a purely local history. The author has made no attempt to obtrude his own political views upon the reader, and has constantly kept in mind the purpose that has guided his labors,—to present a work free from sectional or partisan bias which shall be acceptable to the general public.

Considerable space has been given to biographies of leading and representative men, living and dead, who have borne an active part in the various enterprises of life, and who have become closely identified with the history of Frederick, Washington, Montgomery, Allegany, Carroll, and Garrett Counties. The achievements of the living must not be forgotten, nor must the memories of those who have passed away be allowed to perish. It is the imperative duty of the historian to chronicle their public and private efforts to advance the great interests of society. Their deeds are to be recorded for the benefit of those who follow them; they, in fact, form part of the history of their communities, and their successful lives add to the glory of the Commonwealth.

A distinguishing feature of the work is its statistics of the various districts into which the six counties of Western Maryland are divided. In them the reader is brought into close relation with every part of Western Maryland. The advantage of this method of treatment is obvious, embracing, as it does, narratives of early settlements, descriptions of interesting localities, and personal reminiscences. The maps, views, and portraits are a prominent accompaniment, and add interest and attractiveness to the subjects which they are designed to illustrate and explain. Our acknowledgments are due to many friends, not only for a kindly interest shown in our labors, but for much valuable information, furnished in many cases without solicitation.

In presenting the "History of Western Maryland" to the public the author feels conscious that he sends it forth with many imperfections. In the preparation of a work of this character many minor inaccuracies and errors are almost unavoidable, the existence of which it is impossible to discover until the book has been exposed to the light of general criticism. It may not be considered presumptuous, however, to express the hope that its general conception and execution will be satisfactory to the community for which it has been written, and that it will prove useful and interesting to all classes of readers.

WESTERN MARYLAND.

TOPOGRAPHY AND GEOLOGY.1

The section of country embraced in the following descriptive outline is a long strip, running from east to west, widened on the ends, and extending from the western boundary of Baltimore County to the extreme limits of Maryland next to West Virginia. It consists of six large counties, among the most fertile, varied, and populous in the State. These are Frederick, Montgomery, Washington, Allegany, Carroll, and Garrett Counties. This region is bounded on the north by Mason and Dixon’s line, which separates it from Pennsylvania, and on the south by the Potomac River, whose bending channel breaks the outline into a series of long and short curves, and cuts it off from West Virginia and Virginia. It might be regarded as of the form of a low bridge or arch, the keystone of which would be placed at Hancock (where the county is narrowed to a breadth of only one and a quarter miles); the wider end would rest on the District of Columbia, and the narrower end would stand on the source of the north branch of the Potomac River. The length of this strip is about one hundred and forty miles, and the width is about fifty miles, from north to south, across the east, and nearly thirty-six miles, in the same direction, across the west end.

It embraces almost every variety of surface within the State, the lowlands at tide-water and the ocean shores only being excepted. For convenience, the region may be divided into four great sections, marked by well-distinguished features of the surface, and coinciding sufficiently with the groups of rocks upon which it rests.

1 Contributed by Prof. Philip R. Uhler, president of the Maryland Academy of Sciences.

As no part of the Tide-water Belt strictly occurs within this territory, the first to be noticed is the Midland Belt. It begins about five miles back of the inner limits of the tides in the rivers, such as the Potomac and Patuxent, and extends westward to an oblique line running from the month of the Monocacy River to the sources of Piney Creek, in Carroll County.

The second is the Blue Ridge Belt, which runs from the basin of the Monocacy and the head-waters of Piney Creek to the west side of the summit of the Blue Ridge, or South Mountain range.

The third is the Great Valley, extending from the western side of the summit of South Mountain to the corresponding part of the summit of North Mountain. It is occupied chiefly by the extension of the Cumberland Valley of Pennsylvania, which is widely known as the Hagerstown Valley, and which, southwest of the Potomac River, becomes the great Valley of Virginia.

The fourth is the extensive Appalachian Belt. This is pre-eminently the mountain region, and extends from the summit of North Mountain to the western boundary of the State.

Each of these divisions includes smaller belts and tracts of country, which may be recognized by a difference in the quality or color of the soil, and by the kinds of native rocks which rest near the surface.

Midland Belt.—This embraces the greater part of the two most eastward counties, Montgomery and Carroll. The lowest lands occurring within its limits belong to the southern extremity of Montgomery County, where the primitive rocks dip beneath the soil to stretch off under the deep basin of the Chesapeake Bay. These are tracts of clay, gravel, and sand, the former resting directly upon the eroded surfaces of granite, gneiss, and hornblende, and the latter spread over the surface of the low hills of clay and rock by floods and by the retreating tides of a former ocean. Several of these areas reach back into the country for a distance of nearly seven miles, while the more gravelly portions are confined to a belt varying in width from two to five miles. The clay area extends through the District of Columbia and Prince George's County into this region, chiefly along the ancient valleys of the streams, spreading more broadly from thence, and covering parts of the adjacent hills. On the northwest of the former the surface rises gradually by a series of rounded plateaus, until it culminates about twenty miles back in the folds and crest of Parr's Ridge. An altitude of about nine hundred feet is now attained, and the backbone of this range is seen to stretch away from near the Potomac River on the southwest in a wavy line, through the eastern part of Carroll County in a north-northeast direction, then with a backward bend as Westminster is reached, and across the boundary into Pennsylvania. It forms a high fold in the talcose slates, which, decomposing, serve to furnish a fairly light and kind soil, capable of being made very productive of all the cereals and fruits of temperate climates. A fine agricultural tract is also seen to spread away on both sides, presenting large farms of real fertility, and testifying the thrift of the inhabitants, whose ample barns and well-kept houses greet the eye on every hand. The soils belonging to this system of rocks extend as far as to the base of the Sugar-Loaf Mountain on the west, interrupted in the west corner by the red sandstone soils, and on the east extend as far as to the boundary of the archaean lands on Rock Creek. They also send off two tongues of the same kind of soil, the one reaching to near the northern angle of the District of Columbia, and the other running parallel with the Patuxent River as far as to the source of Paint Branch. The ridge forms the dividing line between the creeks and rivers which flow towards the east and south and those which course southwest and west. In most parts the scenery offers a pleasing variety, but the wildest and most romantic spots are to be met with in the thinly-settled section on the headwaters of the various tributaries of the Patuxent River. There the hills are abrupt, high, and broken, flanked along the sides by lower and more rounded knobs, which have lost their former angular summits by reason of the softer and less resisting materials of which they are composed. Deep, sudden ravines, set with angular and piled-up rocks, are seen at frequent intervals, and through these the limpid waters of the rivulets and branches leap with never-ceasing activity over moss-covered bowlders, amid the tangled branches of flowering bushes and creeping vines. On these ridgy hills, too, the principal forests still remain. Second-growth trees of various kinds—oaks, hickory, walnut, beech, maples, sour-gum, dogwood, tulip-poplars, elm, hazel, a few pines, and numerous chestnut-trees—still serve to cover the wilder places and store the moisture to feed springs and rivulets.

As usual, the dark-gray and silvery minerals composing the rocks of this region are attacked by the atmosphere, frost, and heat; they crack into slaty joints, change to a rusty color, and then disintegrate into a pale yellowish micaceous and alumino-silicate. Moisture, supplied by the morning and evening vapors, creeps into these, in common with many other kinds of clearing, cracking rocks, carries carbonic acid and other solvents into the interstices between the grains, and sets up chemical activities which rapidly reduce them to powder.

Commencing in Montgomery, on the southeast, the country rises by series of water-worn plateaus, or hills, with shallow, narrow depressions intervening, giving the effect of interrupted table-lands. The roads intersect ledges and masses of granite, gneisises, hornblende schists, and, at the lowest levels, the black hornblende rocks. As in Baltimore and Howard, so here, this latter seems to be the bed-rock which underlies, holds, or gives rise to all the later ones of the formation. It crops out in the beds of the streams, such as Rock Creek, Paint Branch, and the tributaries of the Potomac south of the Great Falls, and is also indicated in places adjacent to the Patuxent. It underlies the mica schists where in most places their lower exposures are visible, and it forms bowlders on the sides of the hills and partly in the drift of the lower and central parts of this county.

Crossing the rolling slope which descends immediately west of Parr's Ridge, the valley of the Monocacy River is reached, and the talcose slates become more aluminous. Here and there chains of high domes stretch from the northeast towards the southwest, and the higher swellings are seen to be composed of the rougher beds of the rock, while the lower undulations appear more shattered, broken next the surface into small fragments, and exhibit marked evidences of decay. Near the mouth of the river erosion and frequent washings have opened out a wide basin, which is now covered by the alluvium of this stream. It has thus brought some of the best fertilizing ingredients of the distant rocks within the reach of the agriculturist, who has thus been enabled to profit by the opportunity to secure most abundant crops of Indian corn, clover, hay, etc. On the northwestern side of this county a broad belt of red sandstone hills runs down to the bed of the Potomac River. They begin a little east of Seneca Creek, and extend to within a few rods of the mouth of the Monocacy River. These rise in their more central parts in majestic piles, like huge ranges of masonry, swelling to a height of more than one hundred and fifty feet above the basin of the Potomac. Colossal chimney-rocks stand up like tall sentinels on the dark-brown walls of precipitous sandstone, and craggy peaks jut out at various angles over the vast piles of overthrown blocks, which join to attest the power of the forces that have snapped them apart and pitched their shattered fragments upon the buttresses below. This is a section full of delightful scenery, and beset with a multitude of surprises for the attentive eye. It abounds in objects of the weird and grotesque, and is quite unlike any other part of the great triassic framework to which it belongs. The great river itself spreads away in a silvery sheet through solitude broken only at distant intervals by the lonely bird or the more fearless hunter or fisherman.

Montgomery County has an area of five hundred and eight square miles; it is the most southern of the counties included in the present notice, and possesses in an eminent degree those peculiarities of surface, soil, and climate which contribute to the health and prosperity of the inhabitants. It is about twenty-eight miles long from northwest to southeast, by about twenty-three miles wide on its northern boundary, and seventeen miles across its southern extremity. No mountain ranges actually exist within its limits, but, instead, the system of high hills known as Parr's Ridge crosses it diagonally a few miles from its northern border. The hills and plateaus already described occupy the chief parts of its surface, and serve to separate the numerous rivulets, branches, and creeks which so abundantly water almost all sections of its territory. Although large tracts of uncleared lands appear on the uplands and undulations next these water-courses, yet large farms have been cleared in most parts of the county, and others of even greater size form the larger part of the area in the more northern and central divisions. The upper part of the great plateau around Sandy Springs, which was originally but little better than a sandy waste, has been almost turned into a garden by the energy and intelligence of the inhabitants. An almost endless variety of soils appears as the different parts of the country are examined, and in nearly all the natural quality is well adapted to the purposes of agriculture. The northern and western portions are especially the home of the grasses and cereals; the warm hillsides promote the growth of the grape and fruit-trees; the small fruits succeed well on the more loamy and sandy depressions of the midlands and more southern sections, and in the bottoms the native bushes, flowering shrubs and plants form a varied and comprehensive collection.

In the expanded portions of the old beds of the creeks the decaying leaves and other vegetable matter, drifted down from the higher levels, joined to the washings brought down by freshets and overflows, has placed vast beds of humus and rich soil within easy reach of the florist and horticulturist. The more rocky streams are decorated by the kalmia, or common laurel, which grows in thickets between the gray rocks, in the loose, rich soil. In the spring the golden blossoms of the leatherwood, the sassafras, the clear line of the Houstonia, and the delicate pink of the Claytonia add a cheerful brightness to the tender verdure of the open woods, while the advancing summer is made rich by the fragrant flowers of the magnolia and azaleas, the showy sepals of the dogwood, the clustering bloom of the snowy viburnum, the odor of the wild grape, and the splendor of the native lily. The waters, too, are studded with the huge, fragrant rosettes of the pond-lilies, and teem with the numerous varieties of pickerel plants, water plants, arrow-heads, and a host of others too numerous to mention. Alders group themselves on the damp spots of the basins, the swamp-maples spread their broad limbs over the pools, and the greenbrier binds the crown of the bushes in a maze of perpetual green.

Between the mouth of the Monocacy River and Seneca Creek the brown sandstone hills were formerly covered with a luxuriant growth of the sugar-maple. An abundant supply of sugar was obtained from the trees, and this industry was one of great importance to the inhabitants. But now these forests are replaced by other kinds of trees, forming a later growth of uncommon variety. Chestnut, red, black, and other oaks, ash, hickory, elm, walnut, and, most of all, false locust grow in thick woods, set with a dense undergrowth of bushes, creepers, and grape-vines. At intervals, where the hills are eroded to near the water-level, wide lowlands stretch back into the country, the margins of which are occupied by large specimens of the sycamore, sour-gum, and occasionally the tulip-poplar. The vistas across these broad plains are broken here and there by low spurs of hills, which stand out like islands. These are usually wooded, fade out imperceptibly into the lowlands, and form a rich relief of dark color to the paler and yellower greens of the grasses and cereals of the wide-spread fields. Usually the remote background, two or more miles away, is formed by higher hills of similar dark green, rendered more soft and blue by the distance, while in the interval are large farms of high culture, with excellent houses, immense barns, and numerous haystacks. Herds of cattle, groups of horses, and flocks of sheep have their appropriate places on the open undulations and in the meadows, giving a pleasant air of animation to the scene, and adding to the enjoyments of rural life. Milk is abundant, and the water is soft, pure, and plentiful. Little rills pursue their way in unbroken steadiness through these meadows, or burst with impetuosity from the rocky hillsides to plunge into the creeks beyond.

Much of the successful farming of this county has been due to the free use of lime. The soils being naturally sour, require the addition of this substance or plaster of Paris. Some of the farmers along the high-roads leading into the Frederick Valley, or near the line of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, transport the limestone to their farms, where they burn it in kilns, and then offer the surplus for sale to their neighbors. The stone is brought either from the western section of the red sandstone or from the valley of the Monocacy, in Frederick, and is partly of the variety known as calico-rock, or Potomac breccia.

The region around Brookville and the valley of Hawling's River have likewise been enriched by the intelligent use of lime. Although naturally thin, and being composed in part of the magnesian minerals derived from serpentine and talcose slates, they have been transformed into some of the richest and most productive lands in the county. The region west of this gradually changes into the ophiolite, or serpentine formation. It consists of a series of rounded hills, running from the ridge on which Damascus, Cracklin-town, etc., are situated, and continued in sloping spurs towards the basin of the Patuxent River. This belt of country, which widens as it enters the county, proceeds southwestward, and maintains a breadth of about three miles, until it fades out before reaching the Potomac River. A wide strip of pine woods stretches along the greater part of its length, occupying a chain of low hills, on which the soil is the poorest and thinnest in the county.

The whole country is abundantly supplied with streams of water, which rise in the uplands, and stretch away towards the creeks and rivers by passing through the bottoms and around the hills. Five principal systems of drainage are found within its limits,—the Patuxent on the east, the northwest branch of the Potomac and Rock Creek on the south, Seneca Creek on the west, and the Monocacy on the northwest.

The Patuxent River rises in the corner of Parr's Ridge next to Howard County, in a region of high hills, very picturesque, and full of rugged rocks, disposed in almost endless variety. More than a dozen of its little tributary branches start from springs in the dark rocks, push their way in tortuous threads, as twisted as the arms of an octopus, leap over sharp bowlders, and whirl along as rapids in the wider gaps, until they have settled to a level low enough to unite with the waters in the deeper trough of the river. At first the river proper is a comparatively narrow creek, forcing its way into deep ravines between the hills, rushing violently through cracks in the rocks, and forming cascades by plunging from the bowlders which stand in its path. But after leaving the barriers west of Triadelphia it rapidly widens, and becomes a strong, full stream, running with great rapidity in a more steeply-cut channel. At occasional intervals it spreads (where the softer rocks have given way) into shallow basins, in the midst of a fine overgrowth of white and other oaks, and through almost impenetrable thickets of bushes, shrubs, and vines of various kinds. East of Sandy Spring the river has piled up for hundreds of feet back beyond its present channel vast areas of clay and reddish micaceous soil, which stand like cliffs and barriers on either side. From a remote period it has been the great sewer for the drainage of a large part of this and the adjoining (Howard) county.

During the great ice ages the amount of solid rock, in the form of bowlders, gravel, mineral paste, grit, and mud that it has contributed to the estuaries of the former Atlantic Ocean is only to be estimated by the enormous beds and deep deposits of these substances to be seen in crossing the counties of Prince George and Anne Arundel. Along the border of Montgomery County it can only be estimated as a broad, rapid creek; but at a distance of twenty-five miles south of this limit it becomes a large river, navigable for schooners and vessels of moderate size.

The Potomac River bounds the whole length of the western side of this county, and receives numerous tributaries from the adjoining hills, but its description properly belongs to the general belt of counties in and where it will be found.

The northwest branch of the Potomac River is but a small creek in this county. It rises in two principal branches, fed by several small brooks in the region southwest and south of Sandy Spring. It runs in a somewhat zigzag southeast course between the sandy and clay hills, through a rather depleted country in which the red clay and heavy soil abounds. After having pursued a course of about twelve miles amidst the tangled bushes and low woods, it passes beyond the boundary, two miles south of Burnt Mills.

Rock Creek.—The next system of drainage to be noticed is that of Rock Creek. This is an important stream, carrying a large body of water, fed by several tributaries along both banks, and supplying water-power to numerous grist and saw-mills. It rises in the region northwest of Brookville, in the midst of craggy masses of talcose schists, which are traversed by innumerable veins of white quartz. The ribs which form its source leap down from the silvery rocks in frequent cascades, cool and limpid, shaded by bushes, tangled vines, and canopies of ferns; then breaking into rapids as they strike the bowlders in their path, they finally spread out in a broad, active stream as the vicinity of Rockville is reached. The creek passes through a pleasantly diversified country, uncovering here and there along its margins the ledges of hornblende, gneiss, steatite, and sienite which underlie the soil. Along its banks the decomposing rocks yield red and yellow lands of decided fertility; a large part of these have been cleared, and while some parts have been worn out by crops of tobacco, others now comprehend some of the best-tilled farms in the county. The copious supply of water afforded by this stream and its tributaries has fed the trees and contributed towards the growth of a luxuriant vegetation. The original forests which here covered the land were formed of the grand old white oaks, with a numerous company of other oaks, of several kinds of hickory, of walnuts, tulip-trees, maples, gums, sycamore, and dogwood, with a varied retinue of bushes, flowering shrubs, and creepers. Now their successors, of less impressive size, still luxuriate in the rich alluvial soils of the bottoms, or spread along the misty summits of the hills. Everywhere the horizon is bounded by a stately belt of verdure, which gives variety and freshness to the dull uniformity of the plowed fields and denuded hillsides. After running in a south-western course for about fifteen miles, the creek crosses into the District of Columbia, and finally buries itself in the Potomac River within the limits of Georgetown. A great part of its bed is clogged by the bowlders of hornblende and gneiss which have been torn from the sides of the uplands by the furious floods which have penetrated the region.

Seneca Creek next claims attention as forming another separate outlet for the waters of the county. It rises by numerous tributaries in the high country bordering the fork of Parr's Ridge, and is separated from the head-waters of the Patuxent River by only the outlying barrier of talcose slates which curves from the vicinity of Damascus to Cracklinton, and continues thence to Mechanicsville and beyond. Some of its sources start in the dark mounds of serpentine rocks which contain the chrome-iron ore. The tributaries at its head bend in almost countless curves to evade the frequent hills and swells of surface studding that section. On the eastern side it receives three large branches,—the Whetstone, Long Draught, and Dawes' Branch, and on the western side the Little Seneca and the Dry Seneca, all of which are fed by copious and constant springs. Taken altogether, it is a long and wide-reaching stream, extending nearly across the entire width of the county, bending into sudden loops towards the west until Dawsonville is reached; next with equal abruptness it stretches south with fewer bends, and then straightening out, it empties into the Potomac River. It passes in most parts through a country abounding in round-top single hills and short knobs, although the whole system of swells belongs to a broad fold of the surface which runs almost to the Potomac River, and includes two minor folds, known as Oak Ridge and The Pines. This higher district is peculiar to the eastern side of the creek, and is chiefly built into the magnesian rocks, with thin and lean soils. On the western side, north of the Little Seneca, the rocks are chiefly talcose slates of green and red tints, largely invaded by veins of white quartz, and extensively shattered into joints inclosing angular fragments. "Between the Little Seneca and Buck-lodge branch the quartz is more porous, the pores lined with black oxide of manganese, and occasionally inclosing specular oxide of iron. In this direction the talcose slate varies in color from red to grayish and blue, assuming a more decidedly slaty character, and finally passing into the true clay-slate. About the region of the Dry Seneca, and stretching to the mouth of the Seneca proper, the rocks are red and gray sandstones and slates, whilst near the mouth of the Monocacy River, and between it and the Little Monocacy, the sandstone varies in color from gray to red." This rock also assumes a difference in texture and composition, ranging from a fine-grained, uniform sandstone to a gritty and uneven conglomerate. The creek, including its numerous windings, has a total length of about twenty-six miles, and, together with its tributaries, drains an area of more than one hundred and thirty-six square miles. At its head-waters the country is wilder, much diversified, and well pervaded with ledges and beds of broken rocks, but as the creek widens and takes on its well-settled form the region is more extensively cleared, farms appear on every hand, and the woodlands are more restricted to the tops of the hills and to the rocky alluvial basins of the stream. After crossing the Rockville turnpike it becomes a creek fully thirty feet wide, running through a well-defined trough, extensively bounded by alluvial banks, and continuing in a slowly widening channel until, near the splendid aqueduct which crosses it and carries the water of the canal, it becomes a full stream at least sixty feet wide, and almost equaling the Monocacy in its volume of water. The brown soil through which it passes in its lower division imparts some of its color to the creek, so that the stream is usually seen to have a rusty brown tint.

Besides the larger streams already described, a multitude of small branches pour into the Potomac River from the ravines opening out on that side of the county, and thus an abundant supply of water of various kinds is seen to be secured. But here as elsewhere the injudicious clearing away of the forests has laid the surface open to the sun, and the springs which formerly supplied the rivulets that fed the creeks and rivers have become dry, and a great volume of water has accordingly disappeared from the larger streams.

The Monocacy River has several small tributaries which rise in the slate-lands within the western part of the county. But the only considerable one of these is Bennet's Creek. It starts from many sources among the broad, round, clay-slate hills southwest of Damascus, and bending westwardly, passes behind the Sugar-Loaf Mountain to empty into the river. Like most of the other branches which have their sources in the slates, it bursts forth from cavities in the midst of the shattered rocks, and pursues its course in deep channels along narrow ravines, expanding but little in its course, and finally passing out into the wider stream through alluvial beds of its own construction.

The resources of Montgomery County are adequate to the wants of a large and varied population. Industries of nearly all kinds possible to an inland country can be successfully conducted within its limits. As already noticed, ample water-powers for driving mills and machinery are present in nearly all the larger streams. The Great Falls of the Potomac pours the heaviest volume of water to be found in the State. Broad belts of alluvial soil suitable for meadows and fitted for the grazing of stock are present in the northern and western sections, and the mild climate, pure water, and fresh air of the higher districts supply the first requisites for a healthy and thriving population. Gold, copper, and chrome occur in the metalliferous range of formations bordering the central belt of magnesium rocks; brown sandstones, granites, etc., for building purposes, abound within easy access of the canal, and fruit culture can be conducted to an immense extent.

The native animals of the region have been the black bear, gray wolf, panther, wild-cat, gray and red fox, raccoon, opossum, mink, marten, weasel, field hare, ground-hog, skunk, fox-squirrel, gray squirrel, flying squirrel, chipmunk or ground squirrel, common mole, star-nosed mole, shrew, white-footed mouse, jumping mouse, and several others of this group, the hoary and two other kinds of bats, the otter and muskrat in the waters, and the common rat and mouse in the barns and houses. The wild beasts have been exterminated, and so have the elk and caribou, but the red deer is said to be still a casual visitor of the wilder sections near the Potomac River.

The birds still form a numerous assemblage, rich in species, attractive in habits and song, and finely varied in plumage. The famous mocking-bird, with the brown thrush and meadow-lark, are at home here, with more than twenty varieties of warblers; several kinds of wading birds, and the belted kingfisher, the blue heron, the white egret, the bittern, lesser heron, night heron, fly-up-the-creek, and several other kinds find congenial hunting-grounds along the shores of the streams. The birds of prey, such as the golden and bald eagle, the fish-hawk, and a score of hawks and owls, add to the list, while the various swallows, martins, swifts, pigeons, doves, and woodpeckers serve to furnish a catalogue of forms of great diversity and eminent beauty.

The reptiles and fish likewise comprise numerous species of curious appearance or of value for food. Among the former, the great snapping-turtle, the slider, two kinds of mud-terrapins, the musk-turtle, the land-tortoise, the gray swift, and six-lined skink may be mentioned as conspicuous and well-known creatures. Of the worm-shaped reptiles, the dreaded rattlesnake and the copperhead still occur among the low rocks in the wilder parts of the back country, besides which three kinds of water-snakes, four varieties of garter-snakes, the blowing viper, the chain and milk-snakes, the great horse-runner and common black snake, the delicate green snake, and a dozen other species affect most parts of the region where vegetation grows thickly. Of frogs, most of the kinds common to the Atlantic region occur in moderate numbers. Thus two forms of toad, two tree-toads, the bull-frog, leopard frog, woods frog, savannah cricket, and spring frog are numerous in most of the low grounds and wet meadows. The crustaceans are represented by four kinds of crayfish, the fresh-water shrimp, and a host of sow-bugs, besides the minute forms peculiar to the streams and ponds.

The insects form an almost countless assemblage of both noxious and useful forms. Beautiful butterflies of large size and brilliant colors abound in the fields of clover, fly swiftly along the edges of the open woods or settle upon conspicuous flowers standing by the river's brink. Gay sphinxes protrude their long beaks into the throats of the tubular flowers, and four kinds of large silk-worm moths find a home in the forest or field. Attractive but noxious wood-boring beetles destroy the hickory, walnut, and oak trunks or limbs; and the fruit-trees are sometimes attacked by the Egeria, plum-b weevil, apple-moth, or web-weavers, and measuring caterpillars of many varieties. Of horse-flies more than a dozen kinds are more or less known; mosquitoes affect the country along the Potomac River and larger creeks, and the other flies, many of them studded with golden and silvery markings, make a host too great to enumerate. The broad-winged dragon-flies dash with unapproachable swiftness over the surface of every pond and creek, and the crimson-winged Heterinna balances itself over the waters of Rock Creek and the canal.

The next part of this belt which claims attention lies in Carroll County. It forms a triangular tract in the southeastern corner of the county of about ten miles from northeast to southwest, and of about six miles from northwest to southeast. On the east it is bounded by the north branch of the Patapsco River, and on the south by the west branch of the same river. It forms a part of the great archean belt of rocks which, crossing from Baltimore County, passes through Howard into Montgomery. Here, however, it is built into higher uplands, and is characterized by the prevalence of granitic rocks. These rise in high, broad domes, reaching to an altitude of more than four hundred feet above the level of the sea. The granites and gneiss are exposed in fine sections along the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad near Sykesville, standing at high angles in great dark, forbidding masses. These form but a few hills between the serpentine formation on the northeast and the metalliciferous belt on the west. Taken altogether, it constitutes a wedge of country embracing types of most of the mineral aggregations belonging to the oldest formations of the State. Within this small area may be found copper, soapstone, limestone, white quartz, and the minerals of the magnesian and chloritic series, in great abundance. Soapstone has been excavated in considerable quantities from a large quarry, and copper has been worked in the Springfield and adjoining mines. The limestone valley which is a continuous line with Marriottsville is a valuable addition to the resources of the neighborhood in supplying the lime as a fertilizer where it is much needed. Crossing the ore-bearing belt, the talcose and slaty rocks are reached, which characterize the region in general.

Carroll County, of which the preceding tract forms but a small corner, is one of the medium-sized but very productive sections of the State. It possesses an area of about four hundred and fifty square miles, and has a form somewhat like that of an anvil with the point broken off. On the north it is bounded by Pennsylvania, on the east by Baltimore County, on the west by Frederick, and on the south by Howard County. The surface of the country is broken by hills in ridges and domes, becoming higher towards Parr's Ridge, and then decreasing in height after the ridge is crossed. The hills are often very wide and rather blunt on top, grouped more or less in chains having a general southwest direction. Broad valleys lie between these, usually running from the direction of Pennsylvania, and intersecting smaller valleys and ravines at frequent intervals. A very large proportion of the county consists of cleared lands, on which are located extensive and highly productive farms. Large barns are to be seen in almost every section, surrounded by numerous outhouses, and with comparatively small dwelling-houses placed a few rods away, usually on some hillside or slight swell of the ground. In the near vicinity of these large hayricks or numerous stacks are conspicuous, and in the adjacent fields or meadows groups of well-kept cattle show the industry and care of the inhabitants. Grazing farms are especially numerous near the public roads which intersect the country in every direction, and along the railroads; and a vast supply of milk, cream, and butter is continually being transported to Baltimore and other cities and towns. Ice cream is also one of the manufactures of the country near the Western Maryland Railroad, and promises to become a great source of income in the near future.

Meadow-lands, derived from the decomposition of slate rocks, and, to a smaller extent, from limestone, spread away in broad tracts near the brooks and rivulets which intersect most parts of the county. The entire region is watered by long streams of medium width, but whose tributaries are so numerous that large sections are charged with a network of constantly running pure water. Almost every extensive farm between Parr's Ridge and the new red sandstone has one or more springs, sending forth a steady stream from a depression in the hillside or from the head of a ravine. As many of these descend from altitudes far above the general level of the surface, they acquire a force which drives them over the rocks in torrents and small cascades, and affords ample power for the numerous mills, factories, and tan-yards. Parr's
Ridge divides the county into two sections, the larger and more irregular one of which lies on its west side, stretching away to Sam's Creek and the Monocacy River. Several very wild tracts still remain to point out the original condition of the country. These are chiefly on the head-waters of the branches of the Patapsco River, on the east side of the county, among the outlying spurs of the ridge, but also in a few places at the source of Bear Creek and Big Pipe Creek. Approaching the ridge from that side, a high backbone of hills appears, which bends into broad curves and incloses wide, open basins of alluvial soil, inclosed like amphitheatres. Through these the various rivulets and brooks pass swiftly over bottoms but little interrupted by the broken rocks. But nearer their sources they pass through the gaps, reach the ledges of dark and hard hydro-mica schists, and at once begin to contend with the rugged barriers that would arrest their farther advance. Here a scene of great attractiveness presents itself. Huge masses of angular rocks rest against the sides and ends of the broken ridges, while above them project the remnants of former ledges, sharp and craggy, disposed at every angle. In the old bed of the stream stand the great broken pieces which have fallen from the crest above, and a scattered heap of fragments of all sizes lies along the depression below. Trees of numerous varieties, chief of which are the oaks, maples, birches, and hickories, range in unbroken lines along the upward slopes, casting deep shadows over the sunny nooks, and giving shelter to a host of shrubs, plants, and vines that intertwine and mix in deep confusion among their piercing branches. On every sheltered rock the green, gray, and purple lichens have painted frescoes of marvelous elegance and beauty, and, crowning all, a dozen forms of ferns have woven their graceful chaplets of exquisite green over the crown of each dripping bowlder. Sparkling little springs sprinkle drops of limpid water upon the slender grasses and delicate creepers, keeping all moist, and adding their quota to the brook which aids to swell the vigorous river. All the streams of water in this region rise high up the slopes, rush down rocky channels choked with loose fragments of stone, form rapids, torrents, and cascades at frequent intervals, and display unceasing activity in wearing their channels ever deeper as they descend. During times of heavy rain they carry down immense quantities of sediments, in conjunction with the washings from the hills, and spread them in layers over the flat lowlands. Thus the bottoms of these basins are rising year by year, and the best ingredients of the forest humus and the mineral soil are carried into these natural meadows, to feed the grasses and wild plants. The open spaces are covered deeply with the soft soil which has been poured upon them through untold ages, and in the dim, far-back past they formed a great chain of fresh-water lakes, which stretched from beyond the Pennsylvania boundary away down into Baltimore County. While these were pent up within their rigid bounds of earth and stone, broad marshes spread along the edges of the barrier of archean mountains on the southeast that kept back the oceanic waters a few miles north of Baltimore. Later, the melting of the great ice mass, reaching through the broad, deep valleys farther north, sent such vast floods of water into the midst of these lakes that an opening was made at their southern end, through which the waters found an outlet into the lower levels farther south. Thus the surface features of this region have been toned down near to the proportions that appear to-day, the tops of the ridges have been broken away, and the summits of the softer spurs washed into the form of rounded domes.

The region in which Carrollton Post-Office is situated discloses a scene of uncommon wildness. There the branches of the Patapsco River pursue their course in bewildering complexity, bending and turning back at unexpected intervals, and seeming to be ever in the way of the traveler. They drain the country across a width of more than ten miles, and carry a large volume of water into the north branch of the river. The ridges here are narrow and abrupt, everywhere set with broken rocks, some of the ledges of which stand like huge piles of ruined masonry on the edges of precipitous heights. Viewed from a distant hill, these broken ridges and spurs produce an effect of grandeur and variety. They stand in broken series, which seem to fade into others at lower levels, while those at the end terminate in spurs, which taper off and become lost in the general surface of the flat valleys. Crowned with trees of every variety of green, they roll away into the distance like the broken caps of huge waves in a sea of boundless verdure. Proceeding northward and westward, valleys of larger size appear in view. These are usually long depressions between the higher hills, underlaid by limestone, with deep soil of the highest fertility, and well supplied with springs and rivulets in which the water is clear, pure, moderately hard, and delightfully refreshing to the taste. Baughman's Valley is one well known for the fine farms and well-kept homes of an industrious and thrifty people. All the cereals and crops of the most favored portions of the adjoining States grow here in excellence and abundance. Fruit-trees of various kinds grow with ease, and yield fine crops of the best quality, and the smaller fruits are grown with equal facility. Grazing is practiced to a large extent, and large quantities of produce, added to the butter and milk, are transported from thence to the Baltimore market. The soil on the hills is derived from the mica-slates and talcose rocks, which, being decomposed, yield a light and deep stratum, which readily admits of high cultivation.

Between Westminster and Union Bridge is the garden part of the county. Talcose schists form the higher hills, the country rolls away in broad, flattened domes, and the bottoms and ravines are always traversed by streams of spring-water. The hills are to a great extent cleared of woodland, and large farms spread over uplands which are as carefully tilled as the meadows below. Limestone ledges project from the sides of the hills, and yield inexhaustible supplies of the richest fertilizing lime.

The country between Little and Big Pipe Creeks, and northwest of the latter, in which Middleburg and Taneytown are situated, forms a strong contrast to all the preceding districts. It rests upon and is derived from the new red sandstone rocks. The latter jut out in picturesque variety along the banks of the streams just mentioned, and lie scattered in indescribable confusion down the ravines through which they flow. Heavy rains and fressets grind these rocks into fine mud, which marks a trail wherever the floods carry the waters, and which stains the streams for many hours after they have subsided.

These sandstones, being soft and easily acted upon by the atmosphere, have been extensively denuded by moving water, consequently much rather flat country occurs where formerly the high domes uplifted their summits. The hills now generally appear low, wide, and separated by shallow bottoms. But along the Little Bear branch and on the upper sections of the Big Pipe Creek the hills are mixed with talcose slates, remain much more elevated, and furnish valuable water-powers from their more abrupt flanks. Taneytown occupies the centre of a tract about six miles square, based upon a red sandstone, somewhat mixed with slate. The resulting soil is thin, sandy, and sour, but little valued, and which has commanded relatively but a low price in the market. Careful limeing has, however, worked wonders with some of these depauperated lands, and brought them back to their original flourishing condition.

Limestone and Marbles.—These are so valuable, occur in such vast quantities and in so many places west of Parr’s Ridge that they demand more than a passing notice in this place. Beginning with the section a little northwest of Manchester, they continue south-west towards the Frederick County line, and across it to a short distance below New Market. At first they seem to occupy but a narrow belt of country, but gradually widen, until, near the line of the Western Maryland Railroad, they stretch over more than one-half the width of the county. Within this range an extraordinary number of varieties may be found. Every color between plain white and black veined with white occurs. Most of them are stratified, while a very few are so much contorted as to hide all trace of their type of deposition. In general they are very fine-grained, of close texture, strong, durable, and susceptible of a very high polish. Samples taken from the exposed surfaces of beds in about fifty localities have shown what a great treasure Carroll County possesses in these remarkable deposits. The weathered superficial parts of the beds form good stones for burning, and when these are cleared away to a depth of a few feet, varying according to the situation, new, clean surfaces of the massive marble are reached, suitable for dressing, trimming, and decorating buildings. On the western outskirts of Westminster large and deep quarries of limestone have been opened and worked to great advantage. Here they form the flanks of prominent hills, and are accessible for twenty-five or more feet above the level of the ground. These are much cracked and jointed, and probably do not yield large slabs or long monoliths, but they are very prettily veined and variegated with black or red through the white body, and take a polish sufficiently good for out-of-door work. Some of these have been used for doorsteps in the city of Baltimore, and they have proved both acceptable and durable. But it is chiefly as a fertilizer that these are most highly prized. Vast quantities have been broken into small blocks and transported in that form to great distances, or have been calcined in the kilns near at hand and shipped in the condition of lime. It is, however, a few miles farther west that the marbles are found in their finest and richest development. In the region around Avondale and in the vicinity of New Windsor the beds of marble seem to vie with each other in putting on their most splendid dress. Several quarries of wine-red rock, exceedingly close and fine-grained, capable of a very high polish, marked with veins or wavy lines of either black or white, resting on massive layers of great extent, invite the builder to employ that which in point of beauty and fineness is one of the most admired of building stones. About three-quarters of a mile north of Avondale, and in the same beautiful valley, a quarry of the deep rich red marble has been opened and excavated below the surface of the ground. It forms a large and very compact bed, of remarkably uniform texture. Blasting the surface has shattered and cleft much of the exposed upper part, but from the general appearance and disposition of the mass it seems capable of yielding very large monoliths, and might also be worked into slabs of almost any desired size. This bed seems to be more uniform in color than most of the others. Its ground tint is of the richest wine-red, toning in a few points to almost madder purple. It takes an exceedingly fine polish, and is admirably adapted for pedestals, altar bases, mosaic pavements, and for the most elegant decorations of churches and palatial residences. Another quarry, belonging to this same belt of rock, and only a few rods distant from the former, yields a bluish-purple or mauve-purple marble of similar character and quality. It takes a surface as fine as glass, and is varied by veins and wavy lines of brown, gray, or black. Large blocks can be easily secured, and it deserves to be held in high esteem for the richness and purity of its combinations of color.

From this point to New Windsor many other beds of marble occur, chiefly of white, streaked, veined, or spotted with some tint of gray, pink, red, or purple. But a particularly marked quarry is a large one, extensively worked for lime, on the property of Mr. Chew, in the first range of hills south of New Windsor. There the strata dip at a moderately high angle, spread from three to five feet in thickness, are quite long, and run deep into the earth. The upper layers are more or less stained with red, in many devices and patterns, while the more deeply-colored blocks are largely invaded by purple, somewhat mixed with green, in zigzag and wavy combinations. These fade out into greenish tints, becoming more blackish as they descend, until the extreme reached is dark gray, variegated, waved, and dappled with black, accompanied by some white. The next very prominent quarry occurs on the farm of Mr. Myers, situated about one mile south of the former. The stone there is of the same excellent quality, takes an equally good polish, and while varying somewhat as to the proportions of red, purple, and pink, presents some wonderfully beautiful patterns of color-figures on either a light or tinted ground. These latter are somewhat noted for the red pipe-clay which passes through them in belts between the layers of marble. This is of the kind that was formerly so much prized by the Indians, and tradition points to their having resorted to these places for their supply of the unwrought material.

From New Windsor to Big Pipe Creek the beds of marble are both numerous and varied. Some of them are small, and set into the earth rather than protruded from the hillsides. But they are none the less rich in stone of fine quality, and of peculiar and curious patterns of deep colors. So little has been the demand for these in the arts of construction and decoration that they have shared the fate of the coarser limestones in being broken and burnt for fertilizers. The farms next to the boundary of Frederick County, along Big Pipe Creek, are well provided with the finer marbles of the Tennessee variety. These have commonly a mixture of reddish brown, with purple, red, and white. Two patterns closely resemble the colored Castile soap, the one having the smaller diagonal spots arranged in loops and bends, while the other has purplish waves of different shades disposed in belts and irregular streaks. Some extremely fine, pure white marbles also occur in this neighborhood, and this region shares with the adjoining parts of Frederick in these treasures which nature has deposited so bountifully for the use of its inhabitants.

The limestones are properly the coarser and softer rocks of the marble group, and often invaded the ledges of the more valuable and harder beds, but in general they occupy the outward limits of the belt, more particularly on the east, and yield lime of great strength and permanence as a fertilizer. They are also much used for plaster and building, giving a good surface in plastering of rooms, and forming a tough and durable cement in the construction of brick walls.

Iron Ores.—Every natural division of the State has its peculiar types of iron ore, which are in general not to be met with in places outside. Thus the ores of the mica-slate and talcose belt of Parr's Ridge occur in quartz veins in the hard rocks. The brown haematites of the midland belt belong to the earthy series, and are confined, rather narrowly, to depressions in the body of the limestone valleys. The carbonates of iron of the hone series are peculiar to the clays of the tide-water belt, while the carbonates of the coalfields are of the black band and ball type. Dozens of other kinds occur within the limits of Western Maryland, but these have not yet proved to be in sufficient quantities nor of the proper quality for commercial purposes. The midland belt possesses immense deposits of brown haematites and smaller aggregations of specular oxide, and of magnetic oxide. Brown haematites abound in Baughman's Valley, and on the west side of Parr's Ridge from the Pennsylvania line to a point five or more miles south of Westminster. This form of ore accompanies the limestone formations, and generally occurs along the margins of the valleys, near the point of contact of the former with the talcose slates. It lies bedded in the brownish or reddish clay soil overlying the limestone. It has attracted a new attention within the last few years, and in consequence the old localities have been revisited, profitable deposits have been re-opened, high prices have been realized for neglected ore-banks, and a wide-spread remunerative industry has become established in this region. This widely-known and highly-prized hematite is of the limonite series, dark brown or blackish where oxidized, often ochreous when freshly broken, and with a chalky or earthy aspect when dried. It occurs in nodules, chunks, and masses, varying from the size of a large egg to that of a bushel measure. Pieces, and especially nodules, or shell-like lumps of about the size of a quarter-of-a-peak measure, are quite common and of great interest. These are apt to be mixed with the least portion of earthy or foreign matters, and to yield about sixty-one per cent. of pure iron. They are composed of an outer shell of brown iron ore, simple and clean, more or less rounded, and set all around inside with sharp-edged loops, with bunches of knobs, with slender, tapering, tubular stems, or with blackberry-like lumps arranged in groups. Some of these are of great beauty from the fine gloss and splendid iridescence of their rich, deep purples, blues, greens, and bronze. Frequently they are filled with a series of chambers of a cavernous pattern, coated with a film of glossy deep black. This ore is apt to be arranged in more or less spherical shells, which exhibit a circle or circles of denser minerals wherever the surface is broken across. The lumpy masses partake also more or less of this shelly character, and most of this class of ores show that their development has proceeded in somewhat concentric lines. Most of the diggings thus far pursued have been superficial, very few of them having penetrated below a depth of from thirty to forty feet. The ore is extracted from beds, seams, or pockets in the limestone, or from spaces in the talcose slates where the limestone formerly existed. These ores seem to be inseparably connected with the limestones. They were originally derived in part from them, and in some places fade into them by almost insensible degrees. Persistent search is constantly revealing new localities in which these ores occur, and wider experience is determining with increased certainty the probability of their presence in large deposits. Similar localities in Pennsylvania have displayed practically inexhaustible stores of this same class of ores, and doubtless some of the beds recently opened in the central parts of Carroll County will prove equally extensive.

A variety of this iron ore has been raised for several years past from a deep shaft opposite Avondale, on the line of the railroad. It has now penetrated to a depth of over one hundred feet, and seems to be incaulcably productive. It is placed on the side of a limestone basin, directly next to a high hill of shattered talcose slate. A stream of water runs through the alluvial basin which overlies the white and variegated limestone. The ore is rather less nodular than that from the northern part of Banghman's Valley, and is somewhat lumpy and less coherent than the former. It is, however, a rich ore, and is shipped from the railroad station in large quantities. The same kind of ore has likewise been taken in large quantities from the section lying about two and a half miles west of Westminster, and also near the suburbs of that city. It contains a certain proportion of manganese, and has been worked from almost the first settlement of the region. A brown hematite belonging to the same group has also been found near Brighton, in Montgomery County. The samples thus far exhibited are rather extensively mixed with a gange rock which holds pockets and seams of the ore in close embrace. It occurs in the metamorphic rocks, and has narrow wedges and layers of limestone spread through the mass. The deposits need deeper excavation in order to prove the value and extent of the metal there present.

The specular oxide (or red oxide of iron) also is found within the limits of Carroll County. The metalliferous range which courses along the east side of Parr's Ridge is the natural resting-place of this form of the metal. The heavy talcose schists near their line of contact with the older archean rocks are charged with great seams and beds of quartz. In these the pockets and veins of this somewhat silvery-looking oxide occur in great variety and beauty. The highly-polished surface of the metal, as it branches and spreads out through the milky-white quartz, presents a very attractive appearance. Exposure to the atmosphere renders it more black and destroys the lustre of its surface. No very extensive deposits of it have thus far been reported, although it is quite widely distributed. It accompanies the copper-bearing veins at Mineral Hill, it has been broken from quartz near Sykesville, and is not infrequent in the rocks near Carrollton Post-Office and southeast of Manchester. It is a difficult and expensive ore to work, because of the hard matrix in which it is imbedded, and has yet to be found in larger masses in order to prove a profitable metal here.

The magnetic oxide of iron is a black or black-gray mineral, often quite massive, and turning to a black powder when crushed in the mill. It is one of the richest of our iron ores, and sometimes yields as much as seventy per cent. of the metal. Much of it is mixed with the oxides of titanium and of manganese, which lessen its purity and lower its value. Some varieties are highly magnetic, and hence the name magnetic is given to such as possess that property. It belongs to the copper-bearing series of rocks, and is most extensively mined in the vicinity of Sykesville, and is smelted at the furnace near that place. The talcose rocks along the eastern side of Parr's Ridge form its chief resting-place, but it has been neglected or overlooked in most of the other localities in this region. It is found in masses or pockets in the metamorphic rocks, and occurs there also in the form of grains or octahedral crystals.

Copper has been mined at the Springfield, Florence, and Mineral Hill veins, and near Finksburg. It has been at various times actively carried on at all of these places, as well as at a few others in the neighborhood of Sykesville, but since the rediscovery and opening of the vast deposits at Lake Superior operations have ceased at all of these mines. Other metals, such as gold, silver, zinc, and lead, have been found in small quantities in the metalliferous belt of both Carroll and Montgomery Counties, but not as yet in profitable quantities. Gold ore has been found near Brighton, in the latter county, and a gold-mine is now being worked west of Brookville, about two miles from the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal.

Frederick County.—The Blue Ridge Belt consists of Frederick County alone. It forms a tract of country extending from the Monocacy River and Little Pipe Creek on the east to the summit line of the South Mountain range on the west. The total area is about seven hundred square miles. It is about thirty-two miles in length from north to south, by twenty-five miles from east to west. In form it is somewhat of an irregular trapezoid, with an uneven triangle taken from its eastern side next the north. The South Mountain ridge separates it from Washington County, while the Potomac River forms its southern boundary. Montgomery County touches it along the southeast, Carroll County stands next to it on the east, and Pennsylvania on the north. The Catoctin range of mountains runs through its whole length from north to south, and forms the dividing line between two great valleys of great beauty, diversity, and fertility. That on the west is the Middletown Valley, while the other on the east is the Frederick, or Monocacy Valley. The former is not a deep trough scooped down to the base of the mountains, but it is a series of intervening foot-hills, which originally constituted the minor elevations of the great group of ranges connecting the Blue Ridge with the Catoctin. At the northern extremity these swellings rise to equal altitudes with the primary ranges, and fade into them by imperceptible degrees. The effect is to build there one great mountain mass, with three principal ridges rising only a few hundreds of feet above the inner depressions, but inclosing minor valleys of enchanting beauty, and throwing off spurs at intervals of from one to three or more miles.

The valley slopes from the central part of Hauver's District, widening as it runs towards the south, and gradually expanding and lowering as it gets nearer to the swellings of the Catoctin range. It is traversed throughout two-thirds of its length by Catoctin Creek, and is plentifully watered in all parts by rapid brooks and branches originating in springs. An unlimited supply of the purest mountain water, poured from the sandstones and slates, is ever present, as well for running mills and factories as for the direct uses of man and animals. Farmers are thus enabled to place their dairies upon streams of perpetual cool water, and every home is accordingly supplied with an abundance of well-kept milk, cream, butter, and cheese. The valley is one of great loveliness, and ranges over a large tract. It is about thirty miles in length by nine miles in its greatest breadth. Beginning at the northern end, it seems to be contracted out of existence by the spurs of abrupt high ridges which press into it from the right and left. But as it is followed towards the south the hills gradually open, become round-top broad swellings, falling lower at every grade, until near the Potomac River they rise to scarcely more than one hundred feet above the alluvial lowlands.

The soils are derived from the decomposition of sandstones next the mountains, or of slates, talcose schists, quartz, and trap rocks upon the more central lines. On the north, and in a few places along the flanks of the South Mountain, decomposing epidote adds another ingredient to the soil, and contributes to its fertility. The Catoctin Creek has built for itself a path of surprising variety, with a tortuous channel cut out of the hard sandstone and slate rocks. It rises by half a dozen brooks of great activity, high up the eastern flank of the South Mountain, in Catoctin and Hauver's Districts. In the midst of untamed grand scenery, where high peaks rise to an altitude of more than two thousand feet above the level of the sea, where the great white sandstone rock-masses have been split and riven asunder with titanic violence, and the dark heavy slates have been pitched into craggy piles of threatening aspect, there the little streams come creeping out of the cliffs in the rocks, and leaping, as freed spirits just escaped from prison, to the terrace below, dash against the fragments and boulders which stand in their way, and force a deep and rugged channel, ever widening as they run. Their advance is strangely attractive. Not by one even and continuous line of water do they quietly press along, but basin by basin, as every new stage is reached, dashing with impetuous force against broken ledges, leaping over huge bowlders which have pitched from the frightful chasm above, creeping between the tangled branches of broken, fallen trees, then roaring beneath the overlapping jaws of the precipice farther down, and then bounding along still lower until the distant valley is reached. Tributary rills add their quota to these at every stage, running out of the mossy and vine-clad banks, from the midst of dense thickets of graceful shrubs and flowering bushes. Here the beech grows, with its fresh lichen-painted gray and white bark, its neighbor being the fringe-fingered spruce, clad in scaly bark of deep brown, with its companions, the birch, peeled by the tearing winds, the chestnut, oak, the maple, and the tulip-tree.

Other branches come rolling into the widening creek from between the sharp mountain spurs, bending around their rocky flanks to find a more peaceful path, and distributing nourishment to the rank undergrowth in the little valleys which they have helped to cut. The Catoctin runs over a course of more than twenty miles from its farthest source, becomes a moderately wide, rapid creek after reaching the base of Middletown Hill, and thence continues widening and flowing in the bottoms until finally it enters the Potomac River through an alluvial basin. Besides the tributaries of the Catoctin, there are two long branches, which rise, likewise, in the South Mountain ridge, flow southeast, and empty into the Potomac. The longest of these is the Little Catoctin. It is a narrow but vigorous creek, with a full body of water running swiftly between the rolling hills, and furnishing power for several flour and saw-mills. That nearer the mountain is an active little brook which runs over the bowlders in the ravines of the farms next the ridge, and comes out bright and clear along the road running through Knoxville. All of these were originally the native places of the speckled trout, that found a congenial home in the little gravelly basins and deeper trenches in the dark sandstone or slate rocks. At present the valley is mostly cleared, and belts of trees rest here and there in rocky places, where the surface is more abruptly broken, or where the soil is too full of large surface bowlders to be made readily available for tillage. The greatest proportion of the Middletown Valley is covered by large farms in a high state of cultivation. Wheat, rye, oats, Indian corn, and forage plants are raised in vast quantities, and large stores of hay, placed in stacks near immense barns, indicate the extensive provision made for the numerous horses and cattle kept by the industrious inhabitants. Large distilleries have also been settled in various parts of the valley, and the production of whisky from the abundant cereals of the region furnishes immense quantities of liquor for exportation. Grazing is also carried on to a fairly large extent, and extensive droves of beef-cattle may at all times be seen in the fields fattening for home consumption, but chiefly for transportation to Baltimore, Washington, and other markets. The greater part of the region is based upon the talcose slates. These are largely invaded by veins of quartz, some of which are of enormous thickness, and the surface of the fields in many places is so full of the fragments of this white rock as to be a great hindrance to the rapid cultivation of the soil. Decomposition of the talcose rocks and the less ready disintegration of the quartz yields a soil more or less chocolate colored, but light, porous, easy to till, and well supplied with the natural nourishment of the cereals.

Wells cut into this rock to a depth of thirty feet or more generally furnish a permanent and abundant supply of water. This is often rendered a little hard by the presence of magnesia; but the taste is sweet, and no unhealthful influences have been attributed to its permanent use for drinking.

This is not one of the limestone valleys, such as those on the other side of the ridge. It belongs to an older system of rocks, and the only limestone yet discovered within its limits is a small bed situated at the western base of the Catoctin range, on the canal, near the mouth of Catoctin Creek. Viewed from one of the more central spurs at the entrance to some of the gaps leading over the South Mountain, the valley presents a picturesque and highly-attractive scene. Instead of a monotonous trough with nearly level bed, curving at the sides directly from the mountains, a series of bold reliefs appear, varying in proportion and arrangement as one or other side of the Catoctin Creek is observed. At the upper end it forms an acute triangle, and becomes lost in the high spurs which stand in wavy lines to unite the Blue Ridge with the Catoctin. Here the forests cover the principal part of the higher ridges; wave after wave of varying green leads off the perspective, until the distant horizon blends into the universal blue of earth and sky. On the south the beautiful groups of houses composing Middletown, with its white spires standing up in the midst, rise out of the hollow and from behind the hills, like a bird ready to take its flight. Bolivar, Burkittsville, and a dozen other villages and little towns nestle between the rolls of surface, almost buried in the sea of waving grain, or only half disclosed among the belts of tall oaks and other woods which decorate the fields, while still more southward the broad opening valley spreads its wide mouth to receive the Potomac, and becomes lost to view in the spreading channel of the mighty river. North of this valley, but placed at a much higher level, the truly mountain-valleys, but of small size, find a place. The larger and nearer one of these is Harbaugh’s. It is situated to the east of the extremity of the former, and is separated from it by a scalloped ridge, or series of knobs, terminating in spurs. These taper acutely on their inner ends, and thereby open a passageway for the streams and roads. It is a diagonal eroded basin, having a northeast by a southwest direction. Its base is only a few hundred feet below the summit of the general high levels of the Catoctin range. It has a length of about seven miles by a width of one mile. In crossing its lower end abrupt spurs appear on both sides. These rise in terrible majesty, loaded with heavy projecting ledges of gray, greenish, and blackish rocks, threatening to fall at any moment from the startling precipices into the road below. The mountains are heavily wooded with numerous varieties of trees, of which the chestnut and oaks predominate. Chestnut-oak is here a fine, abundant, and conspicuous tree. In the gap of Owen’s Creek, leading up to this beautiful valley, some of the most romantic scenery in the county is to be found. The Catoctin Mountain is cleft in a sinuous line, broken at intervals by the downfall and erosion of sandstones and slates; huge masses of cracked and pointed rocks slant off at every angle, or form beetling cliffs of enormous size far overhead; wide, open spaces, strewn with fragments of rock and bowlders, appear at frequent intervals, in which the busy little creek comes tumbling down from the terraces above, broken into foam by striking against the ledges in its way, or pouring in cascades over the sandstones blocking its path. The limpid water of the stream shines like molten silver where the sunlight strikes it in the openings between the trees, and many a moss-covered bank projects from the terraced slopes, where the beech-trees lend their graceful branches to shade the pools in the quiet bayed-out nooks. In the wider openings a few pines lend variety to the woods, groups of hemlock offer a still stronger contrast of fringy foliage in the midst of broad-leaved trees, and the cucumber-magnolia decorates the rich spots on which vines, creepers, and ferns form luxuriant masses of fresh green.

The purity and coolness of the atmosphere in this region, combined with the moist exhalations from the tangled growths along its basins, offer most refreshing retreats from the heat and dryness of the summer temperature. A considerable part of the valley and adjoining slopes is already occupied by farms of promising fertility, and the deep alluvium of the lower levels is well watered and rich in elements most important to the growth of cereals and grasses. On the very rocky ridges the trees grow far apart in the soil which has accumulated in the cracks and cavities, and from these places the lumbermen and tanners derive ample supplies of wood and bark. Leaving this region and passing towards the east, four other small valleys, running in the same general direction, occupy the deep depressions between the spurs of the Catoctin. These are Eyler’s, Hampton, and two smaller ones which stretch off for a mile or more in the direction of Pennsylvania. The two former are the larger, and are two miles or more in length by about a half-mile in width. All of them are highly picturesque, and placed in the midst of startling and romantic scenery. They occupy the old cracks in the mountain summits, where the floods and streams of past ages have widened the gaps and ground the slate, sandstone, and epidote rocks into rich alluvial soil. Accordingly, pockets of rich earth along the sides of the ridges, kept in place by ledges and fragments of rock, support copious forests of many kinds of trees, while the trough below receives the richest supply of plant food in the transported sands, clays, and humus, and responds in a vigorous outgrowth of ash, oaks, hickory, maple, tulip-trees, etc., and an endless accompaniment of bushes, plants, vines, ferns, mosses, and lichens. Leaving the valleys of the Catoctin side of the mountain mass, proceeding towards the west, and crossing the upper end of the Middletown Valley, the roads traverse the eastern flank of the Blue Ridge. Rising by steep grades the summit is reached, in the midst of farms growing abundant crops of Indian corn and well supplied with orchards of apples and other fruits. A few straggling peach-trees have attempted to develop in the corners of the fences, but at best have only been able to struggle for existence, and to yield small, unpalatable peaches of uninviting aspect. A high, broad plateau stretches out before the eye at this point, and the view is limited by the forest-covered high knobs, connected with ridges, which form the horizon. After ascending to the top and going beyond the flat cultivated lands, the side of the mountain slopes rather steeply into a lovely, well-tilled basin, known as Mount Zion Valley. The common milk-weed grows in astonishing abundance over the cleared slopes, and showers its silky, plume-like seeds all over the region reached by the drift of the winds.
A descent of about one hundred and forty feet reaches the bed of the valley, in the midst of clover-fields and fertile meadows. This depression, placed so high in the great chain of the South Mountain, is about two and a quarter miles long by three-quarters of a mile wide. The boundary line separating Frederick from Washington County passes along the eastern flank of this valley from north to south, consequently the depression is all in the latter county, although still within the limits of the Blue Ridge Belt. Several fine brooks rise in the bed of the valley, and lend a delightful moisture to the air while contributing to the fertility of the soil and stimulating a most varied growth of valuable timber-trees, such as hickory, oaks, walnuts, and maples. A deep dark soil fills the moist woods, where, in the midst of lichen-covered and fern-set bowlders, a thousand bright flowers, rustic vines and creepers adorn the varied scenery. Wild grapevines grow luxuriantly here in the rich depressions, and yield ample supplies of the native grapes. A great gorge leads out between two high abrupt spurs, traversed by an active stream of limpid water. Crossing this stream a few rods farther on, in a southern direction, the mouth of the gorge is passed and another valley, of character very similar to the last, is reached. Its bed is, however, rather more flat, and the bounding ridges are very steep.

On the eastern side of this trough, known as the Bull-Tail Valley, away up near the summit, stands the celebrated Raven Rock. It is not black in color, but derives its name from the ravens which made their homes upon it when the country was first occupied. These birds have long since changed their habitations, and have fled away from the face of man by degrees farther west, until not one seems left to represent the species among the ranges of our eastern mountains. The rock is an immense swelling of jointed white Potsdam sandstone, projecting from the flank of the abrupt mountain spur, in the midst of the thin chestnut forest. It has been rounded off by the heavy storms and rains which have driven against its faces and broken off the sharp cliffs of its upper corners. Time has softened the glaring whiteness of the rock, and gray tints have been added by the fringes of ferns and the patches of lichens which have settled in every inequality of its surface. This little valley is scarcely more than three miles long, by a half-mile wide, but it is full of romantic scenery, shady dells, immense craggy rocks of white, gray, green, and black, disposed in the wildest confusion, in the greatly varied forests or woodland gaps. Dogwood and pawpaw are common growths in the lower parts of the basin, and laurel abounds in thickets along the watered hillocks. Coal has been dug from a bed of blackish slate in a hillside near the northern end of this valley. It served well for blacksmith's uses, and was reported to resemble anthracite in its hardness and general appearance. Unfortunately, only a single deposit has been discovered, but nowhere else than in the shaly slate, and this was only excavated in a quite small bed.

Mountains.—The mountain ranges of the Blue Ridge Belt deserve special mention because of the important influence which they exert upon the adjacent country. Standing up as barriers to the clouds, they aid in giving direction to the masses of moisture which form areas of precipitation of rain and snow. On the western faces they rise in general quite precipitously, while on the eastern they mount by a series of gradual slopes of fairly easy ascent. Only in the most northern divisions are the roads excessively steep, and there the gaps or chasms between the spurs and knobs generally open out in a series of terraces, forming resting-places at occasional intervals. Frequently an avenue rises gently along the projecting flank of a ridge, leading up to a chasm nearer the summit, through which it passes to the next stage above. The highest summits of the South Mountain range, as it appears in this State, are met with on the western side, overlooking the Hagerstown Valley. There at the most northern extremity the well-known High Rock rises beyond Pen Mar Park to an altitude of two thousand feet above the level of the sea. The view from this peak is very extensive, and takes in a vast range of country, reaching out into the three States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. A charming country lies spread out before the eye from this point, including the richest regions in the great valley which crosses the three States before mentioned, and takes in to the southward the most varied and romantic parts of the Shenandoah basin. The mountain-side is here strewn with huge bowlders and fragments, the shattered remnants of colossal rocks of the Alp that once rose far above any point now reached by the loftiest pinnacle of this region. On this side of the range, also, two or three high knobs, only a few miles farther south, rise to altitudes of two thousand two hundred to two thousand three hundred feet above the level of the sea. Some of these are almost flat on top, the shattered rocks which formerly rested there having been carried away by the torrents and tempests, and the summits thereby worn off and leveled. On the outer limits of the chain short spurs and ridges have been split off from the ancient mass, and these form the outliers from which the foot-hills swell away into the broad valleys. The South Mount-tain range, when viewed alone, appears to form an undulating line of nearly horizontal ridges, sloping gradually, for a few miles, to be successively more rounded, and then by more abrupt summits, until the whole series of swells is lost in the misty blue of the distance. It is a series of high and very narrow parallel folds, which become a single ridge on the south, and having a general width of less than a mile in that part of its course. This view is, however, somewhat deceptive, since it presents only that part of the system which rises above the beds of the high adjoining valleys. It forms what appears to be only the larger western division of a great fan-shaped synclinorium, or series of depressions, of which the Elk Ridge is the extreme western member and the Sugar-Loaf group the eastern. Both of these outer divisions are superficially detached from the great central body of upfolds, but formed of the same rocks, having continuity throughout along lines below the surface, and produced by the same set of continental forces as those which let down the valleys. The same tremendous agencies have likewise squeezed together the two great chains on the north, breaking enormous cracks and chasms along and across their course, throwing them into curving spurs running nearly east and west, forcing the underlying older rocks, such as the epidotes, porphyries, and anigydaloids, to the surface in huge ranges, and twisting the whole series of strata far out of place. At the southern end of the South Mountain the ridges rise generally to a height from eleven to thirteen hundred feet above the level of the adjoining valley, while farther north several of the more single knobs reach an altitude of nearly five hundred feet higher.

The Catoctin forms a less elevated but wider, alternately contracted and expanded ridge, sloping in general rather gently along its eastern side, and, as usual, more abrupt on the western. It is well butressed by swelling hills along its whole length, and rises very slowly from the domes, which roll away and become lost in the valley of the Monocacy. It forms a highly picturesque body of mountains as the upper part of its course is pursued; but the lower end, near the Potomac, is rather monotonously blunt and flat, except where relieved at the Point of Rocks by the ragged black slate masses which have been torn asunder by the terrific forces that opened a way through them for the great river. The high billows of the range are succeeded at occasional intervals by sharp ridges and knobs. These rise with some irregularity from a height of about nine hundred feet above the level of the sea, until nearly half-way up the chain, at High Knob, an altitude of fifteen hundred and thirty feet is reached, while two or three outstanding knobs towards the north are reported to rise to a height of sixteen hundred to seventeen hundred feet. Probably the highest of these is Round-Top, which towers in magnificent altitude at a distance of about three and a half miles southwest of Emmittsburg. Eagle Mountain is another single spur, standing out from the great body of the range, on the right of the grand gap of Owen's Creek. On the side of the gap through which the turnpike runs from Frederick to Middletown the Catoctin becomes lowered to a level of about eight hundred and seventy feet above tide. At least seven openings between the spurs make easy entrances for the roads which cross into the Middletown Valley. These rise through comparatively easy grades, are remarkably even and well kept, and open out broadly wherever the swelling terraces of the mountain permit. Only in the most northern division, where the two ranges unite, are the roads steep and difficult, and even there they are so wide and excellent as to greatly facilitate the crossing of such sudden heights. The most conspicuous rock on the higher surfaces, and which lies broken and scattered in endless confusion, is the Potsdam, with its related sandstones. It forms enormous beds above and in the gaps, and crops out at frequent intervals in scattering crags and beetling summits. Hard, compact talcose slates, grading into aluminous sandy rocks, constitute the body of the mountain, while its central core and inner base is found to be filled up with the metamorphosed slaty porphyries, epidote, anigydaloids, and quartz. These hard, almost volcanic rocks have been so distorted and torn by the expansive power of heat that their broken and disjointed fragments are spread around in all directions, and in part may be found in masses lying all along the flank of the higher levels. At intervals of every few miles, and occasionally near the gaps, spurs and knobs stand off, as if monster sentinels to guard the approaches to the peaceful valleys below. These afford a wide view of the lowlands beyond, each having its own peculiar panorama, and no two presenting precisely similar features. At the southern extremity the Potomac basin and Sugar-Loaf Mountain bound the distance; viewed from nearer the middle of the range, the broad valley and its many villages and towns, besides the picturesque city of Frederick, form the central group, while the Linganore hills, the winding Monocacy, and Parr's Ridge fill out the picture; likewise towards the north an almost interminable collection of short ridges, hills, belts of forest, villages, and hamlets, half concealing the network of slender streams, creeps away into the red sandstone and gray slates on the horizon. The lovely valley of the Monocacy lies in full view from several of the high central prominences. In the spring and early summer it is a country full of beauty and bloom. Rich soils, more varied than can be found in any other equal area within the State, yielding abundant crops of all the cereals, fruits, and products of the farm, luxuriant meadows, and extensive dairies characterize the whole of this favored region.

In addition to these, a healthful climate, an exhilarating atmosphere, and a permanent supply of pure water in springs and streams renders the region best calculated to support a large, healthy, and thriving population. The valley is not a simple depression between two ranges of heights, but is a broad, water-worn basin, flat and rolling by turns, less elevated than its counterpart on the other side of the mountains. Swells of highlands and a few ridges push into it from the Catoctin, and high billows range along the eastern side of the Monocacy until they meet the higher uplift of the Sugar-Loaf. It constitutes an area having a width of ten to fifteen miles, and a length of about thirty miles, the lowest level being in the bed of the river, at an altitude of about two hundred and eighty feet above tide. The general average of the surface may be computed to be about four hundred feet above the sea, with a gentle downward slope from the north towards the south, and with a more decided pitch from the sides towards the middle line. This causes the drainage of the whole country to descend into the river, which in its turn empties into the Potomac. The Monocacy is the principal stream in the region. It is a small but long river, not more than a creek in the upper part of the county, but which becomes more than one hundred feet wide in the part near its mouth. It is a moderately sluggish stream in its lower divisions, but rapid and full near its sources. In the great springs near Gettysburg, Pa., are its principal heads, and from thence it bends among the rocks and hills in perpetual windings, until it finally has cut a more decided channel out of the red sandstones of Frederick County. After entering fully into that system of rocks, it spreads out in frequent alluvial basins, into which it has poured the sediments appropriated throughout its upper course. After receiving the waters of Double Pipe Creek it becomes much wider, and passes through a wide channel, bordered by thick bushes, scattered trees, and thickets of greenbrier. It receives a greater number of tributaries than any of the smaller rivers of Maryland, and thus contributes an endless supply of moisture to the whole valley through which it runs. Some of these creeks are of large size and drain wide areas of country.

The principal ones on the east are Piney, Little and Big Pipe, Israel's, Linganore, and Bennet's; and on the west Tom's, Owen's, Hunting, Big and Little Tuscarora, Carroll's, and Ballenger's Creeks. Those of the latter division are chiefly rapid mountain streams of great beauty and clearness. Most of the northeasterly tributaries pass through the new red sandstone soils, and carry down large quantities of red sediment, which discolors their waters and stains the country through which they flow. In the northern part of the valley the red sandstone stretches across its whole width, and on the east passes over into Carroll County. But after reaching the vicinity of Frederick City it lies to the westward, becomes narrowed to a width of about two miles, and finally thins out as the Point of Rocks is approached. One of the principal factors in producing the fertility and capabilities of this charming valley is the boundless store of limestone which rests beneath so much of its surface. On the west side of the Monocacy a strip of blue, with some white limestone begins near the Potomac River (having a general breadth of two miles), and runs north by a little east several miles, crossing the Monocacy at the mouth of Israel's Creek, and tapering to a point in the vicinity of Woodsboro'. Besides this, the beautiful breccia, or calico-marble, starts at Mechanistown, in the midst of the red sandstone, runs south for more than three miles, disappears, then reappears in a new guise southwest of Frederick City, and spreads out in a broad area reaching to the banks of the Potomac River. In this southern end of the valley it has become more silicious, includes larger fragments of coarser rocks, and is not so homogeneous in texture, and not always having the pebbles so firmly cemented together as in that from the upper end. East of the river Frederick County shares with Carroll in the beds of fine marble which pass southwest across Sam's Creek to the vicinity of Union Bridge. These form quarries of all possible dimensions, are abundantly supplied with marbles which take a fine polish, and which can be taken out in monoliths of large dimensions. Only a few of them have been opened deep and far enough to show their capabilities, but such as have had enough of the surface mass removed show bodies of generally solid, broad, and long blocks in even strata. These are often of marvelously beautiful colors and combinations of patterns. Bright reds occur almost plain, and often veined or variegated with black, brown, and white. Salmon-colored or orangy-yellow marbles also occur of similar patterns, likewise the varieties commonly known as Tennessee and Vermont marbles, and others, such as the clear black veined with white, lead color or mauve traced with black, and mottled, spotted, and waved with brown, purple, liver-color, etc. Besides these, there is a pure white statuary marble of fine grain, massive and free from grit. Near Emmitsburg a green variety, resembling verd-antique, occurs in large quantities; while in and below Mechanicstown a bewildering range of varieties of breccia, composed of deep and clear-colored fragments of purple, yellow, drab, brown, white, etc., and of all sizes, are easily obtainable. These can be selected in pieces of almost any useful size, and the supply seems to be practically inexhaustible.

For many years these choice marbles have been broken to fragments for burning in the lime-kilns. Fashion has not yet called them into her celestial train amidst the favored beauties of the decorative arts. Builders send abroad for the blocks and slabs which are to adorn palatial mansions, while these elegant objects, so cheap and easily obtained, are made to do the service of coarse limestones in supplying nourishment to the soil.

Iron, Copper, and Other Metals.—Iron ore is found in large quantities in many parts of the valley. It is chiefly some form of brown haematite or limonite which overlies the limestone and is imbedded in the clay or in the ochreous soil. About three miles south of Mechanicstown, near the foot of the Catoctin Mountain, the fibrous and chambered variety occurs in beds and deposits of vast extent. This has been dug and smelted for a period of more than eighty years, and still sustains a good reputation for quality and for tractability in the furnace. The crude much resembles that found in the limestone regions of Washington County. It has the same flaky layers, twisted and rolled back in every direction, and a purplish tinge to the fracture of the more solid parts. A rusty powder rests between the layers or fills the cavities of the cellular portion. It is also accompanied in the beds by nodules of phosphate of iron associated with brown ocher. In this region particularly the ore is characterized by being mixed with an appreciable amount of the carbonate of zinc, which melts when the metal is being fused, and forms a coating on the inside of the furnace. This makes an available form of the oxide of zinc, but it becomes a serious obstacle in the manufacture of the iron unless removed from the walls of the stack. The close proximity of limestone for the flux, and of large bodies of wood for the charcoal, make this deposit of ore immediately available for smelting. A similar deposit of brown haematite is found under almost equally propitious circumstances near the base of the same ridge of mountains, not far from the Point of Rocks. The primitive forests no longer remain, but ample supplies of the ore might still be obtained from the same set of beds. Much of this latter is of the variety known as "pipe ore," the cavities of which are more or less occupied by the earthy phosphate of iron. A very compact and rich brown haematite is found in quantities near the Monocacy, about four miles north-east of Frederick City. It has a more metallic aspect than those previously mentioned, is very heavy and dense, and often incloses small crystals of opaque white quartz.

Specular oxide of iron also occurs east of the Monocacy River, in the metalliferous belt passing through the country from Middleburg, in Carroll County, to New Market. Very rich specimens of this beautiful ore have been extracted from pockets in the talcose slates in the neighborhood of Liberty and New London. These have not yet, however, been fully opened, nor sufficiently laid bare to determine the amount of ore possibly present. The absence of large tracts of woodland from this section seems to prevent iron manufacturers from erecting furnaces on the spot, and a lack of active local interest hinders the developing of the mines, and so no attempt is made to transport the ore to localities favorable for smelting. A similar specular oxide has likewise been found along the summit of the Catoctin ridge. These ores are rich in iron, and would form important additions to the resources of the county if they were shown to be present in large quantities. The magnetic oxides of iron have also been found in the copper-bearing belt which passes to the south of New Market. These also occur in pockets or masses in the talcose and slaty rocks, and in the joints of the limestone. Some of the varieties are very rich in metal, and might prove very profitable if discovered in large quantities. Copper is very widely distributed through the quartz and next the limestone beds in the talcose slates and new red sandstone formations east of the Monocacy and south of Little Pipe Creek. It sometimes accompanies the magnetic oxide of iron which enters with slate into the masses of mica-slate. The silicates and carbonates of copper are found near Middleburg, New London, Liberty, etc., and between the two branches of Pipe Creek. But the most promising region for this metal is that drained by the Linganore Creek. The principal rock there is the talcose slate, embracing numerous detached beds and ledges of limestone set into the strata. The latter are always associated with the ore, and wherever they are found stains of copper appear on their surface or in the cracks. Good ore generally has a position between these two kinds of rocks, but is commonly most abundant near the outer limits of the limestone. Rich ores have been extracted from the Dolohyde mine, near Liberty, and at other points in this vicinity, also near New London, in the same formation. The oldest of these workings was begun as early as the time of the Revolution, and has been continued at intervals ever since. A lack of minute information with regard to the relations and form of the masses or pockets has proved an obstacle in the successful development of these mines. New and particular experiences with this class of deposits will alone determine how far these formations will prove profitable, and to what extent the metal can be worked. Copper exists also in the older rocks of the Catoctin summit. Pieces of the native ore have been picked up in Harbaugh’s Valley, one of which weighed fourteen pounds. It is not to the native metal, however, that attention need be called, since it is quite improbable that deposits of it can be found in the class of rocks prevailing in this part of the country. More reliance may be placed upon the indications of sulphur and carbonates of copper, which here may prove to be stored away in the central division of the mountain chain.

Sulphur of lead, or galena, has been detected in the limestone region near Unionville; but only small pieces have thus far been secured. It occurs, also, in the Dolohyde copper-mine in small quantities. Oxide of zinc is found associated with the brown haematites of the Catoctin region, and it is obtained in large quantities as a furnace product from the Catoctin Iron-Works.

Gold and silver have been detected as minute particles in some of the older slates and metamorphic rocks, both of the metalliferous belt and mountain range. The structure of these regions, however, renders it very unlikely that either of these metals will be found there in profitable amounts.

Roofing slates of good quality are present in several localities within the talcose schist region on the eastern side of the county. Among the Linganore hills several quarries of chiefly local interest have been opened, but near Ijamsville, directly on the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, large beds of even texture and dark-blue color have been worked for many years. These produce excellent thin plates of good quality, which improve in size and firmness as the beds are worked to greater depths. Slates of an entirely different character occur both in the Catoctin and Blue Ridge Mountains, next the roads leading towards Hagerstown. These are tough and very strong, easily and naturally split into slabs of four inches or more in thickness, may be obtained in pieces of the largest size, and are of a nature particularly well fitted for pavements, caps of walls, sills, and for the outside of buildings generally.

A remarkable feature of the county, and one of its most curious monuments, appears in its southeastern corner, near the Monocacy River. At that point representative rocks of three great geological periods centre, and a great fold of the surface has built an isolated group of mountains. These are merely the lateral outliers of the great upthrust produced by the contracting force which raised the Catoctin and Blue Ridge. But here it has assumed a more local elevation, and constitutes a triple-crested mountain, with a short ridge flanking it on the west. The summit called distinctively Sugar-Loaf is the most southwesterly, the intermediate one is called Round Top, and that at the other end, or northeasterly, is Mount Airy. About three-quarters of a mile to the west stands the nearly straight hog-back called Green Ridge, while beyond its northern end may be seen three minor single knobs of much less altitude. This section forms the place of junction of the primordial series with the new red sandstone and rocks of the Azoic formation, the former being represented by the Potsdam sandstone, constituting the uppermost layers of rocks and overlapping the talcose slates, while the brown sandstone fills the intervening valley, and conceals the ends of the great layers of white sandstone. The grand Sugar-Loaf rises in magnificent prominence to a height of thirteen hundred and seventy feet above the level of the sea, and gives a commanding view of all the country lying east and south to nearly as far as Washington. It is most appropriately named Sugar-Loaf, since it is built from base to summit of the plain white sandstone, which glintens with crystalline brightness in the sunshine.

The white rock is set together in vast walls of immense thickness, forming a curved front bristling with crags and rugged buttresses, like the torn flank of a huge fortress. On top great piles of the rock stand detached from the main mass, and project in frightful crags over the abyss beneath. In spite of the solid masonry which forms the whole body of the peak, it is covered everywhere, even upon the summit, with a growth of trees, which in the distance lends a rich contrast to the white rocks and spots of brown soil. Green Ridge is likewise well named, for it is a verdant bilow, standing with refreshing brightness in bold relief beside the dark soils and light stream of the Monocacy. On the southwest side of the group colored sandstones and silicious conglomerates form large beds, and offer beautiful building-stones, which would make superb substitutes for the much-used Scotch granites.

Fauna and Flora.—Great diversity obtains in the natural productions of the Blue Ridge Belt. Everywhere it has at some time supported a varied population of great beasts, of the smaller animals and birds, and of the unnumbered host of creeping things, while a rich and abundant representation of the floral tribes has added grace and beauty to the picturesque landscape. The great American elephant at one time roamed over the fertile valleys, while the elk, caribou, and red deer grazed in the open areas of the forests. Besides those, the bear, panther, wild-cat, gray wolf, two kinds of foxes, raccoon, opossum, ground-hog, and most of the small animals now common to the eastern side of the United States found a home in one or the other parts of this varied region. The beaver especially was formerly abundant here, and built dams across the creeks and river. Unhappily, with the increase of population new demands for cleared lands drove away many of the interesting animals, such as the beaver and elk, and the culpity of thoughtless men caused the extermination of all the animals most valued in the chase. Of the birds, a vast assemblage once tenanted the lands where now only a few scores can be met with in the longest trip. The wild pigeon still returns in diminished numbers to the vicinity of its former “roosts,” but the great birds have chiefly been destroyed, together with the raven, the Carolina parrot, the large white heron, the fish-hawk, and a large company of the sweet warblers and bright-feathered songsters of smaller size, but of inestimable value and gratification. Butterflies and brilliant insects abound, the injurious as well as the useful. But the removal of the forests has opened the way for a thousand crawling enemies to agriculture, while the thoughtless impulses of the population have destroyed numerous species useful and ornamental.

Flora has been lavish in the beauty and variety of her gifts, but the loose rich humus resting in the shadows of the heavy old forest has been swept away, and with it the primitive fairies which charmed the senses on the mountain-side and in the open valley. In their stead, however, still remain a remnant of the azaleas, magnolias, kalmias, orchids, asters, and sunflowers, in company with the blossoming thorns, viburnums, spireas, dogwoods, and other showy bushes. Judicious planting of trees year by year will bring back some of these lost beauties, but will do even more in retaining and supporting the moisture so much needed to keep the little streams, and through them the creeks, in their former more active condition as sewers of the country.

Coal.—Indications of the presence of coal have been met with in various parts of the new red sandstone formation in the valley of the Monocacy. But the chief localities which have given promise of deposits of this important fuel have been in the ridge of hills at the foot of the Catoctin Mountain, sometimes described as the red hills. This is at the head-waters of the Tuscarora Creek, runs off in a southeast direction, and constitutes the Chapel Ridge. It is formed chiefly of the breccia, or calcico-marble, associated with shale of the reddish-brown sandstone, penetrated more or less by broken blocks of the blackish hornblende trap. The region extends to near the Point of Rocks, where it blends with the talcose slates and becomes lost. Specimens of anthracite coal have been exhibited which were reported to have been taken from some outcrops of blackish shale in these hills. Great doubt has, however, been thrown upon the authenticity of these deposits by the attempts of unscrupulous persons to pass off unquestionable specimens of foreign coal as the products of this section. Carbonaceous shales do undoubtedly occur at the Yellow Springs, six miles northwest of Frederick City, between the branches of Big and Little Tuscarora Creek, but these do not belong to the true coal-bearing series of rocks. The breccia and blue limestone, associated with micaceous sandstone, inclose a bituminous shale, which is charged with impressions and remains of carbonized plants, including thin seams of apparently real anthracite coal. This shale sometimes outcrops at the surface of the ground, and elsewhere seems to be enveloped by the limestone and micaceous sandstone. The ledges of breccia form extensive outcrops on the more elevated places, and inclose a band of blue bituminous limestone. The general direction of this formation concurs with that of the adjoining mountain, and the strata dip in a northerly direction at an inclination of about forty-five degrees. It has been traced throughout a length of three miles, and proved to have a width of about one mile. Excavations have been made in it to a depth of twenty feet, and the adjoining gray sandstone has been penetrated about forty feet. Horizontal drifts have been run through various distances to the belts of coal, but the thickest reached has not exceeded two inches. Fuel of such a nature being so very valuable in the vicinity of a large city might naturally attract the attention of capitalists, but a very thorough examination has shown that these beds do not belong to the carboniferous, or true coal formation, and that accordingly no large important deposits of this mineral need be expected in this region. The specimens examined from other parts of the new red sandstone belt have been fragments of calamites or other plants, having the black color and somewhat the appearance of coal, but possessing none of its most valuable properties.

Washington County, and the Great Valley.—This county is proportionally the longest and narrowest in the State. It extends from the summit line of the South Mountain chain to the western base of Sideling Hill; the creek of that name separating it from Allegheny County. It stretches from east to west over a distance of forty-four miles, and its greatest length from north to south is about twenty-eight miles. Pennsylvania bounds it on the north, and the Potomac River separates it from Virginia on the south. Its general outline suggests the shape of a boot, the heel being at the bend of the South Mountain near its northern extremity, the toe at the Potomac River next to Elk Ridge, and the top of the leg at Sideling Hill. The entire area of the county is about four hundred and sixty-three square miles, of which more than three-fourths are included in the Hagerstown Valley. At Hancock the county is contracted to a width of about one mile and a quarter by the great bend in the Potomac River.

The county may be properly divided into two natural sections, of which the smaller and most western belongs to the Appalachian Belt, while the eastern and larger, forming one of the grand divisions closely connected with the Blue Ridge Belt, is the Great Valley.

The Great Valley.—This great feature of the central mountain system forms the most important part of the territory of Washington County. It is a broad depression lying between the South Mountain range on the east and the North Mountain on the west. Its breadth between these two ridges is from twenty to twenty-three miles, while its length from north to south is about twenty-eight miles. That part of it within these limits is known as the Hagerstown, or Antietam Valley. No natural boundary separates this from its northern extension, called the Cumberland Valley, in Pennsylvania, but on the south it is detached from the Shenandoah Valley by the basin of the Potomac River. No depression of the surface of equal magnitude, beauty, and fertility exists on the eastern side of the United States. It forms also the principal valley within the State of Maryland, and yields to none in productiveness of the soil and in the grandeur and variety of its scenery. It is not a simple trough circumcised by two great elevations of surface, but minor waves of uplift traverse it in various parts, running mainly from north to south. Nor is it a single hydrographic basin, for the Antietam River runs through its principal depression on the east, and the Conococheague River drains the section on the west. On the northern end the eastern division is set with high swells of surface, some of which rise into spurs running parallel to the main body of the South Mountain. The general level of the valley is probably somewhat more than five hundred feet above the level of the sea, and in the more northern parts rises to about seven hundred feet, while its southern extremity, near the Potomac River, slopes down to about two hundred and seventy-five feet.

On the west the Conococheague River winds in great loops through a somewhat less elevated basin, but where the country rises into an abrupt ridge along the belts of slate rocks. Almost the whole valley is spread with large farms of unsurpassed fertility. Being so generally underlaid by limestone, the soil is particularly well adapted to raising cereals and grasses, and accordingly it produces the largest crops of wheat and other grain to be met with in the State.

The limestone is chiefly of the strong, compact, dark-blue variety, invaded by seams and veins of white; but in certain sections, as between Sharpsburg and Boonsborough, drab, yellowish-red, pale blue, and white occur in large beds. Many of the varieties from this section are very fine and massive, they take a fine polish, and can be taken out in monoliths of almost any required dimension. Between Keedysville and Boonsboro' a very hard, dense, bluish, wavy limestone forms a belt about five hundred feet wide, running from northwest towards the southeast, which may be removed in large slabs, and is highly esteemed for pavements and for buildings. It is called knuttle, is easily wrought, and proves to be an attractive and most enduring building-rock. In the neighborhood of Keedysville many varieties of stone suitable for industrial purposes are quarried. About one-half mile south of this place a species of fine-grained calcareous rock, white or yellowish in color, marked with wavy lines and zigzag streaks of brown or black, is extensively quarried, sawed into blocks, and dressed. It is a most novel variety, is easily worked, takes a good surface, and may be taken out in thick slabs of immense size. The ledges, angular hills, and masses of limestone rock, particularly in this part of the valley, are so striking as to arrest the attention, and give a highly picturesque effect to the landscape. A white, coarse-grained, distinctly crystalline limestone also occurs in this vicinity. It is really a hard marble, and is said to take a good polish. 'South of Boonsboro' a fine variety of this white marble abounds, which is remarkably free from impurities and foreign elements. It equals the Tuscan statuary marble in purity of color and evenness.
of texture, while it takes a fine polish, and readily admits the chisel of the sculptor. As these latter rocks have not yet been sufficiently developed, it will be necessary to penetrate deeper into their mass to reach the large blocks best adapted for fine monuments and sculpture. The auroral blue limestone, which forms the underlying bed of nearly the whole valley, the chief exceptions being the slates of the Conococheague belt and of the base of the Elk Ridge and South Mountain, belongs to the most extensive formation of this rock in North America.

Caves and Caverns.—A great variety of curious cavities occurs in this limestone, which lines the basin of the Great Valley. This is of the same kind of rock as that in which the Mammoth Cave, the Laray caverns, and all the celebrated caves of the Eastern United States occur. No correct idea can yet be formed of the number and extent of the cavernous spaces which lie concealed in the almost fathomless rock which underlies this valley. Sink-holes and openings in the surface of many farms, and particularly in the neighborhood of Williamsport and Hagers-town, attest the presence of a former deep underground drainage; and even now small streams of water are said to disappear beneath the surface and become lost to further observation. In the vicinity of Keedysville the yellowish calcareous rocks are cavernous, and cavities of a few feet in diameter are frequently discovered. These have usually been excavated by currents of spring and rain-water, carrying a certain amount of carbonic or other acids in solution, and softening and transporting the materials of the rock into which they find an entrance.

The most considerable and well-known caves at present accessible in this valley are those at Cave-town, on the Western Maryland Railroad, about seven miles east of Hagers-town. They are situated in a ridge, along the flank of which the railroad runs, the summit of which rises more than eighty feet above the track. The limestone composing the hill is of two kinds. The upper, or sandy strata, called "rocklime" by the quarrymen, mixed with silicious and other impurities, is from five to fifteen feet in thickness; the lower and bed-rock of the country is the well-known blackish-blue compact limestone, so rich in lime, which is the most highly-prized fertilizer to be found in Washington County.

The entrance to the larger, or Bishop's, cave is a hole formed by the falling in of the wall of rock, leaving an aperture ninety-two feet wide and eight feet high. It is entered at a point about twenty-five feet above the level of the railroad, and is nearly one hundred feet west of Cavetown Station. A great deal of debris has fallen into the mouth of the cave, occupying an area of at least one hundred feet wide by thirty feet long and thirty deep. The first cavern entered forms a large hall, fairly well illuminated by daylight, sloping inward about twenty feet to a nearly level floor. It is almost circular, has a diameter from north to south of two hundred feet, a length of two hundred feet from east to west, and a height varying from thirty-five to forty-five feet. Formerly the walls, ceiling, and floor were studded with an endless variety of stalactites and stalagmites of almost every pattern and peculiarity. Unfortunately, the easy access to this cave made it ever open to the vandalisms of curiosity-seekers, and accordingly it has been rifled of all the smaller-sized specimens which once belonged to it. Possibly by the planting of trees upon the hill, and by the consequent return of dripping moisture, it may be once more restored to its pristine beauty and splendor. Fortunately, two objects of interest still remain. The principal one of these is in the southwest corner of this first hall. It consists of a series of Venus' baths, arranged in terraces, rising to a height of about twenty-five feet next the wall, and covering an area of more than nine hundred square feet. The larger basins composing the group are placed above and behind; they are in the form of oval rosettes, with a raised rim about one foot high; forming the borders, and the cavities in them about six to nine inches deep, filled with limpid water. The smaller ones gradually extend forward from these at lower levels, and become shallower as they advance stage by stage.

They are also scalloped, and taken together form a piece of fountain-work only excelled by the great basins of similar shape which adorn the valley of the Yellowstone, in the United States National Park. In this cave, however, these baths have been made by the deposit of layers and rims of calcareous matter, while in the latter the material deposited is partly silicious. This group of basins is now badly disfigured by dirt and mud-stains, which hide its chief beauties, but it is capable of being made as clear and pure as it was originally. The other object is a large stalagmite, cylindrical, somewhat tapering, standing erect, and being about six feet in diameter and ten feet in height. It stands on the right, beyond the middle of the hall, a solitary column, the sad and silent witness of the ravages of the past. Going to the end of this first chamber, a hole is reached, about four by seven feet in diameter, leading into an uneven cavern, varying in width from ten to forty feet, with a rising floor, the summit of which contracts the cavity at a point two hundred feet from its entrance, and forms a narrow passage with a downward slope into the next room beyond. The floor of this third cavern is somewhat scooped out, but has a general downward slope towards the rear or western end. The roof at this point descends, slopes nearly concurrently with the floor, and thus produces a narrower passage, which leads down to a cavern with a low ceiling. This latter is situated about three hundred and twenty-one feet from the mouth of the cave, and is mostly occupied by a pond of clear and motionless water.

Apparently this water occupies the whole basin of this inner chamber; it has no visible outlet, and the rocks of the ceiling descend to within a very few feet of its surface. Its bed slopes downward very rapidly at an angle of scarcely less than 45°, so that it appears to be very deep at only a few feet from its first accessible margin. The temperature of the water was 55°, while that of the air in the first hall was 59°, and that outside of the cave 84°. In the second chamber, and on its north side, is a hole leading to a cavern a few feet distant, which runs parallel to the large cave. This is a long, narrow chamber, which descends and terminates at each end, like the bag of a purse. It is one hundred and fifty feet long, about thirty feet high, and from ten to fifteen feet wide. Here, as in the larger one, the walls and floor have been denuded of all their objects of interest, and now only the stumps and vestiges of stalactites and stalagmites remain to indicate their former presence.

Close by this scene of wreck and ruin one almost unmolested cavern still remains to attest the beauties of these wonders of nature. It is entered from above at a point above three hundred and fifty feet south of Bishop's Cave, and is entirely disconnected from the latter. The opening into it has been artificially enlarged, and a series of steps broken into the limestone to render the descent into it less difficult. Upon entering, it is seen to be an enlarged horizontal crack in the rock, about two hundred and forty feet in length, but contracting so rapidly at intervals that a person can hardly squeeze through into the open spaces beyond.

Although small, it is a perfect gallery of splendid objects. In every direction the eye rests on beautiful and bright forms of crystalline groups, which only require adequate illumination to bring them out in indescribable brilliancy. This gem-studded chamber might well be styled the Crystal Grotto, for it is literally a cabinet of crystals of almost endless variety and great expressiveness.

The fauna and flora of the caves are very limited. In the first chamber of Bishop's Cave the common striped squirrel, Tamias striatus, runs about in the area reached by the light, and here, too, may be found a few of the insects which belong to the limestone region outside. But in the dark chambers the hoary bat, Lasiusus cinereus, is the only animal occupant; while in the damp humus a few insects of the Thy- sanuran, or springtail group are found in the vicinity of a meagre growth of minute lichens. No living objects have yet been found in the waters of these caverns, and they appear to be destitute of the wingless crickets and various blind insects which occur in the Mammoth and other caves.

Water-courses.—The valley is well supplied with brooks and rivulets running from springs or bursting from fountains in the rocky hillsides. The latter are remarkable for the large and strong volume of water formed so near their sources. To this circumstance the inhabitants are indebted for the superior water-powers which drive their mills so near the heads of the streams. As the porous nature of parts of the limestone rocks forming the hills allows the formation of large cavities, the underground drainage is caught and stored in places above the general level of the region, and these pour a perpetual outflow through the avenues worn along the old cracks, until an outlet is reached in some ravine or depression at the point of least resistance.

The Antietam River, which rises in Pennsylvania, near Gettysburg, has its source in one of these vigorous outbursts from the side of a hill. At all seasons of the year, and in times of drought as well as during the periods of rain, this class of streams supplies the same abundance of limpid water, while similar sources which simply swell up from the ground are sensitive to prolonged changes of weather, and either fail or flush, in conformity with prevailing physical conditions. The former are evidently supplied in large measure from the nearer mountains, and form a portion of the surplus of the permanent underground water-system. This supply is not derived chiefly from the rainfall, although it may be increased beyond the average measure by additions from such sources. But, as the water comes from distant localities, and from considerable heights, it is found to rise high above its external source, and to be steady in its supply. "The Cold Spring, in the immediate vicinity of Hagerstown, possesses in these respects sufficient interest to deserve the attention of tourists. It pours forth a large steady volume of cold, clear water, sufficient to supply the needs of a large bathing resort, and it is noted for its purity and mineral strength. When exposed to the influence of the sun, the excess of carbonic acid which it contains, and which renders it a solvent of the limestone rocks, escapes, and an offlorescence of neutral carbonate of lime is precipitated along its course. It is probable that formerly these streams were still more abundant than at present, for on both sides of their actual course there are broad and deep deposits of this calcareous sediment. Moreover, in consequence of the copiousness and temperature of the streams of this kind, they never freeze; and the Antietam, which is supplied in this way at every stage of its progress through the country, furnishes a very large amount of never-failing water-power." The tributaries of this river which belong to Washington County rise chiefly between the outlying spurs of South Mountain, the few branches that rise on the west side being only two or three of quite small size, and of little importance. On the northeast, however, a large tributary, proceeding from the mountain chain by several branches, passes through the Fourteenth and Ninth Districts, and makes a fork with the main branch of the river below Leistersburg. Next, and most important of them all, the rapid, romantic Beaver Creek rushes from the mountains through more than a dozen channels, drains a tract of country thirteen miles long, and carries a large stream of water into the river at a point three miles north of Keeedysville. The only other tributary of much importance is the interesting, but short, Little Antietam. It rises in several sources from the limestone hills northeast of Rohrersville, bends around to the northwest, and passing Keeedysville through a wide, stony channel, glides into the greater Antietam. Probably the most romantic stream in the valley is Israel's Creek. It rises in the ridges adjacent to Rohrersville, pursues its way south between high ledges of broken rocks, over rapids and miniature cascades, and finally rushes down the embankment beneath the canal to enter the Potomac River. The next large water-system has its outlet through the Conococheague River. It is not so broad and extensive as the Antietam; much of its course lies in Franklin County, Pa., and it rises in that region. That part of it in Washington County is broad, rapid, intensely winding, and full of sediment in its lower course. It follows in part the division between the limestone and the slate; but in its upper division it is not confined to either, and is deflected out of a direct course by the hard layers in the limestones with which it comes in contact on its way towards the south. Abundantly supplied by short branches from both sides, at intervals of every two or three miles it is reinforced by new volumes of water, and after passing through the town of Williamsport it empties into the Potomac River. The Little Conococheague is a small, long creek, which rises in a gap of the North Mountain, receives another branch from the region of Clear Spring, flows south, and also empties into the Potomac. It runs through a picturesque region, in a basin of its own construction, at an average distance of about three miles from the base of the mountain ridge, and receives several small tributaries at its headwaters near the Pennsylvania line.

Williamsport is situated in the vicinity of a rich agricultural region, where the limestone soils spread out widely, where also the fertile bottom-lands of the old bed of the Potomac stretch along the canal; but also next the slate ridge, where the surface soils are thin and of less agricultural value. Tiaber of large size and superior quality formerly covered the greater part of the ridges and bottoms in this section; but it has been greatly thinned out within a quite recent period, and is now replaced in part only by second-growth trees of less value than their predecessors. An important production of this region is the massive black slate, which abounds at a distance of about five miles below the town. It is compact, strong, of fine texture, breaks into even slabs, and takes a high polish. The choice limestone rocks of this vicinity share the characteristics of some of those found on the eastern side of the valley. They are white, or of some tone of drab or yellow, appear fine-grained, take a good polish, and are accessible in fairly large slabs. The principal rock, however, is the blue limestone, which rests in immense beds of unmeasured depth, and shows evidences of being extensively cavernous. No large caves have yet been actually discovered there, but the numerous sink-holes which exist in the farms extend to unknown depths, and indicate a connection with an extensive system of underground cavities, at present apparently too dangerous for exploration. One of these larger sink-holes, at the base of South Mountain, near Cavetown, is remarkable for not being connected with any visible outlet beneath, and accordingly for being always nearly full of water. It consists of a circular, funnel-shaped cavity in the limestone, about one hundred feet in diameter, of unknown depth, filled with clear water, which keeps an almost uniform level regardless of the variations in the seasons.

The central parts of the valley are rolling, and the folds of surface rise higher on both sides until the mountain regions are reached. At the southeastern extremity Elk Ridge rises in majesty, and forms the western boundary of the narrow but charming little basin known as Pleasant Valley. It is an old crack between the two mountain uplifts, which has been eroded and scooped out until it slopes down into a depression somewhat lower than the Great Valley, of which it is but a minor outlet. On the east the South Mountain builds its boundary wall of the flinty sandstone, chert, and slate, while on the west Elk Ridge piles its huge walls of white sandstone in a ridge seven miles long, and then bends in a few rods to contract the upper end of this romantic little inclosure. Along these high walls of jointed rock bee-ting cliffs stand out in threatening attitudes, while the mountain base is buttressed by masses of heavy masonry. In the valley great bodies of dark slates and cherty limestones raise their heads in startling attitudes; the surface is strewn with fragments of rock which once fitted into the cliffs beyond; the stream threads its way with audible murmur among the sharpcornered slates and sandstones, and the bowlders are overhung by the branches of graceful shrubs and trailing creepers. It is a fruitful corner, set in the peaceful solitude of the mountain embrace. Daily the mist curtain of early morn rests over it; the dark shadows of growing daylight deepen as the mountain walls are brought into sharp relief; and later every rock, spar, and cliff is lighted into glorious splendor by the glowing flashes of the midday sun. Lovely vistas delight the eye, both in the valley and on the mountain-top. Towards the north the frowning brows of the precipitous ridge project in severe contrast to the open expanse of the widening valley, which stretches off in endless variety of reliefs until lost in the dim blue of the distant horizon. While away off southwards the opening gap guides the eye out to the basin of the broad Potomac, then up the winding gorge of the opposite mountains, until the scene slides into the swelling waves of the hills beyond and is lost in the dark borders of the far-reaching forests.

On the west the imposing summit is crowned by Maryland Heights; here in the midst of crags and rugged sandstone masses the eye takes in long miles of charing perspective on the channel of the shining river, and over roll after roll of mountain and hill, resting in peaceful sublimity and beauty, until distance levels all into one universal tender gray.

The minerals of the valley are of but few kinds.
No copper, gold, or silver need be expected in profitable amounts, but iron ore of the brown haematite variety abounds near the Potomac River, about two miles west of Sandy Hook. It is of the species called pipe ore, or sometimes limestone ore, and yields metal of excellent quality, well adapted to the manufacture of bar-iron.

The animals of the county are essentially those of the Blue Ridge Belt. The elephant, elk, caribou, and beaver were formerly residents of the valleys and uplands, but they have long since disappeared. Among the vegetable productions, the cucumber magnolia and rhododendron are conspicuous, while the golden lilies, asters, sunflowers, and the generally known flowers and flowering shrubs of the eastern slope of the continent are well represented. The usual trees of the same region belong here, while on the higher and more exposed mountain summits the spruces and pines of a more northern climate begin to appear.

Appalachian Region.—This great belt of country extends from the summit of the North Mountain chain to the western extremity of the State. It includes the western end of Washington County and the whole of Allegany and Garrett Counties. It stretches from east to west in a direct line over a distance of eighty-five miles, and its greatest breadth from north to south is on its western boundary, and is about thirty-six miles; while on the cast it is about eight miles in Allegany, and narrows to one and a quarter miles in the western part of Washington County. No less than fifteen mountain ranges cross this long strip of country, and those in the western division form the highest lands in Maryland.
The lowest levels appear next the basin of the Potomac River at Cumberland, where they grade down to a point scarcely five hundred feet above the sea. The highest altitude attained is on the summit of the Great Savage Mountain at Altamont, which rises to an elevation of more than two thousand seven hundred feet above high tide. West of Sideling Hill until the city of Cumberland is passed the mountain ridges are all broken into spurs or backbones of variable length. They have been generally compressed with great force, and are consequently high, narrow, and abruptly elevated. The surface between them forms elevated valleys of moderate simplicity, broken only by slight swells, and traversed by water-courses which have cut their way through winding ravines in deep channels, often encumbered by broken masses of slate and sandstone. Every valley is supplied with its stream of water, usually rapid and pure, running from the north over a rocky bed, increased by several small tributaries near its source, and emptying into the Potomac River. Some of these have cut their way through gorges in the spurs, in the midst of great rocky ledges, overhung by heavy cliffs, overgrown with bushes, ferns, and trailing vines. Near their sources they tumble in wild confusion over the remnants of shattered rocks, in torrents and cascades, and run through wild spots of indescribable attractiveness.

The beginning of the Appalachian region forms
the small western division of Washington County.
After crossing the Hagerstown Valley and proceeding towards the west, up the side of the North Mountain, a point is reached on the summit near Fair View, at an altitude of sixteen hundred feet above the level of the sea. Here the eye may roam almost unobstructed from the region of sunrise to where the sun sinks below the western horizon. Viewed during the early morn, the mist is seen hovering over valleys and hiding in the water-courses; a few purple and orange clouds streak the sky beyond the mountains, and the green foliage of the nearer forests seems moistened by a bath of dew; but as the sun lifts his golden face above the edge of the higher uplands, the smoky fleeces rise from the streams of water, the mountains unveil, and the foliage glinters as if studded with countless gems.

On the west, in the nearer valley, the narrow chasm of Licking Creek lies beneath the eye; across the broad, high valley, raised into swells and low ridges, the town of Hancock now crops out on the rounded hillsides and then settles down into the adjacent ravine; as the view is lifted a stage higher the heavy back of Tonoloway Mountain, flanked by Round Top beside the canal, arises; and then still higher, behind them all, the great lofty backbone of Sideling Hill ridge sets up a forest-fringed barrier, beyond which the vision cannot penetrate. A few miles to the left the placid bosom of the Potomac River gleams like molten silver in the clear light, while along its margins the tall, spreading sycamores and branching maples join with the dark oaks and glossey-leaved gum-trees in tracing their images down into the limpid water. In the neighborhood of Hancock broken rocks, and occasionally bowlders of white sandstone, lie scattered over the flanks of the hills or rest in piles along the beds of the ravines. Ridges of brown, gray, and olive sandstones and slates project with massive front from places where the torrents of by-gone periods have torn their channels, while on the precipitous sides of the ridges, and from the walls of the frequent gaps, pale cliffs stand out with forbidding sharpness, or threaten to fall from the overhanging heights.

On the Virginia side of the Potomac the country is very rugged, and broken by frequent low ridges of the shattered sandstones and slates; but it is wonderfully picturesque, and the hills are covered by forests and verdue as far as the eye can reach. Frequent shallows in the river open good fords, which form the principal avenues of travel across the country. The absence of bridges, which appears a serious obstacle to the progress of the stranger, is apparently but little felt by the inhabitants of the region. At most times the stream seems to be only moderately rapid, and not at all too swift to be crossed by horses and cattle; but when heavy rains fall on the mountains beyond, it becomes a roaring flood which carries everything before it. Three miles west of Hancock the remarkable knob called Round Top stands at the southeastern angle of Tonoloway Ridge. It rises on that side somewhat in the form of a rounded cone, but from heights in the rear it is seen to be a short backbone extending back in a gradual slope for more than a mile. This detached dome is notable for the singular manner in which its rocky mass has been folded, and for the superior cement limestone that it contains. Here the heavy limestone and sandstone layers forming the rocky skeleton of this huge dome have been bent back and up three times in the lower half of the mass. The result has been to force the cement layers into closely compressed loops, doubling and increasing its thickness accordingly. At the same time the eastern side of the beds has received a diagonal twist, which has thrust them off in a projecting keel at nearly right angles to the rest, and opened a seam along that line.

These cement limestones are mainly of a bluish or drab color, interstratified with other limestones, and with drab and olive sandstones and slates. The cement rock is now excavated from nearly horizontal drifts or tunnels, ranging from eight to twelve feet in height, and fully as much in width, one of which has been pursued quite through the end of the mountain. A part of the great thickness of these layers is owing to a double fold of the thickest portion of the rock being brought in close contact with a second and shorter one. The rock is closely bent together, and fully exposed in at least six outcrops within a distance of scarcely more than six hundred feet along the canal. It appears to be present in practically inexhaustible quantities. The hydraulic cement is calcined, ground, and prepared in a large mill, situated on the spot, and is sent from thence by canal and railroad to all parts of the country. It has a high reputation with United States engineers and master-builders in various parts of the country, who have used it extensively in the construction of large buildings for the government, and for various public works, besides those of the aqueducts, locks, and walls of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal. Nearly half-way up the steep front of this mountain there is a thick layer of calcareous spar of great purity. It is chiefly ribbed with parallel series of narrow, columnar crystals, remarkable for their length. Above this stratum of spar, a nearly square hole leads into a cavern hollowed out of the unfolded limestone by the tremendous forces which have crushed the mountain. and split wide open the beds of stone. This cave has never been adequately explored. It is reported to have been the abode of a family of black bears, which were traced into it and finally destroyed. It is supposed to be of enormous length, and to be formed in part of vast fissures extending to fearful depths.

This region varies greatly as to its capacities for agriculture. On the sides of the slate hills the soil is thin, and not supplied with the moisture necessary for the production of large crops. This is also the case in a less marked degree of the blunt ridges capped by the white conglomerate. But on the limestone bottoms and throughout the alluvial basins a deep fertile soil prevails, which yields abundant crops of clover, cereals, and Indian corn. The streams here are of small size, although springs are numerous, and send forth little brooks in many directions. Three creeks wind in tortuous channels across this narrow belt of country, and contribute their quota of fertilizing elements to the narrow valleys through which they run. They are the Big and Little Tonoloway and Deep Creek. Like all the other streams of this region, they run in deep channels through the winding gullies and ravines between the hills, are moderately rapid, and flow for the most part over broken rocks and scattered bowlders.

The majestic Sideling Hill ridge, which forms the most westward summit of Washington County, is a grand, high backbone of red and brown sandstone, capped and flanked by the Oneida white sandstone, and is picturesque, precipitous, and in places almost inaccessible. Its summit near the turnpike rises above an altitude of sixteen hundred feet, and affords some of the finest views of scenery to be had in this country. Looking east the eye takes in the whole of the Potomac Valley as far as North Mountain, and rests successively upon three or more prominent and beautiful mountain groups set in the intervening landscape. The minerals of this section are of few species, and have not yet been discovered in large quantities. Most important of them all is the specular oxide of iron, which occurs near Sideling Hill, in the calcareous shales. It has not yet been properly developed, but future investigations may determine its presence in profitable amounts. The general color of this ore is red, while bright scales of the dark metal project from the surface of the lumps.

Coal has always been an object of special interest to the people of this part of Washington County. It has been frequently reported as occurring in various places where the black shale crops out at the surface of the ground. Notwithstanding the adverse reports of several competent geologists, extensive drifts were pierced into the precipitous flank of Sideling Hill, next to where the grand, picturesque gorge of the creek opens into the basin of the Potomac River. Several of these have been excavated at a great height above the bed of the creek, and at a heavy expenditure of money and time. The result has been an accumulation of large piles of black, bituminous, decomposed slate and shale, which has proved but a poor substitute for the much-coveted anthracite coal. No true coal-measures exist in this county; the position of the geological series would place them above all the formations found within its limits, and hence they would occur upon the surface and not below.

Sulphuret of iron is met with in small pieces, or in crystals bedded in the slate and limestone rocks, but it has not been found in masses or quantities large enough for commercial purposes.

Gold, silver, zinc, copper, and lead have not thus far been discovered in useful amounts, and the formations peculiar to the country are not in favor of their being so found.

Limestones suitable for agricultural purposes, besides the cement rock, appear in immeasurable deposits, but no true marbles belong to this region. Purple, brown, olive, and white sandstones of compact texture and fine grain abound, and can be obtained of any workable size. Glass-sand of pure white color is found, both in the rock and disintegrated, in vast beds along the western flanks of Tonoloway and of Sideling Hill.

 Allegany County has an area of about five hundred square miles, and extends from Sideling Hill Creek on the east to the ridge of the Great Savage Mountain on the west. Its general outline is somewhat that of a bent gourd, with the bowl on the east and the handle running diagonally on the west. It is bounded on the north by Pennsylvania, and separated on the south from West Virginia by the Potomac River. Its length from east to west is about thirty-two miles, and its greatest width from north to south is twenty miles. The surface of the country on the east is frequently broken by abrupt, moderately elevated mountain ridges, with intervening narrow valleys; but on the west it rises to nearly the highest elevation reached in the State.

The first stream reached after crossing Sideling Hill is the romantic Sideling Hill Creek. It rises in Somerset County, Pa., runs along the base of the mountain, and has pierced through numberless obstructions of rock, bluff, and bowlder until it has conquered a deep wide channel all the way to the Potomac. At intervals along its path masses of the heavy-jointed brown sandstone stand in solid masonry as majestic bluffs, while next beyond a broad bayed-out basin rests as it has been worn from the strata by the power of the rushing floods. Occasionally the great mountain swells push into its channels, throwing out huge buttresses of rock, and forming tremendous precipices of the jointed white Oneida sandstone, where the struggling creek labors to force its way through the labyrinths of stone. For wild, undisturbed solitude the basin of this stream has scarcely a counterpart in the State of Maryland. In the midst of half-concealed hollows, from which there seems no outlet, Nature has lavished unnumbered gifts. On the one side a glen appears, overgrown with the little forms of varied shrubs, penetrated by alleys bordered with richly-colored flowers. Beyond this, the green banks, which bend over the ledges of rocks, overflow with the frisky ends of trailing vines, while water, trickling down through the tangled moss, feeds the roots of broad tufts of graceful ferns. In the open avenues whole beds of the rich rhododendron grow, next to where the groves of maple and birch luxuriate in the moisture-laden breezes. There, too, on the slopes of rich humus, along the ravines, the kalmias and azaleas grow in company, and interlace their branches in endless confusion.

A broad, gradually rising valley stretches from this creek to Town Hill, a distance of about five miles. The bed of the whole section is brown sandstone, yielding a soil productive of ample crops of Indian corn and oats. The ridge is a repetition of Sideling Hill, but rather less elevated. Beds of black decomposing shale, similar to those previously mentioned, are also met with in this ridge, and have likewise tempted adventurers to dig for coal. But these do not belong to the coal-bearing series, and will not be found to yield that mineral.

Beyond this several ranges of lower mountains, of similar character, enter the county from Pennsylvania, and cross this entire width of region. Of these, Green Ridge, Polish Mountain, and Warrior Mountain stand in close proximity to each other beyond Town Hill, and between these narrow, high, uneven valleys rest, through which small creeks run and transport the drainage of the country into the Potomac. The ridges are composed of closely-pressed strata of the same blue and drab limestones, red sandstones, and variously colored slates as those previously noticed, and on their summits occurs the white sandstone or gray conglomerate. Most of the valleys are two miles or less in width, while that between Warrior and Martin's Mountains is expanded to a breadth of about four miles.

In the latter the red slaty sandstones prevail, and they are also found in the succeeding valleys until the city of Cumberland is reached.

Warrior Mountain is largely built of the massive cavernous limestone, and contains numerous species of fossils peculiar to this formation.

The caverns are known to form subterranean reservoirs of large size, storing the water which finds an outlet at the base of some ridge or hill. In such cases vigorous and permanent springs burst forth, and produce streams which afford the only reliable water-power of the region. Usually the temperature of these springs during the cold season is higher than that of the surrounding atmosphere, and accordingly they are rarely found to freeze, even in the severest weather. This important condition permits the running of the mills throughout the whole winter, at times when it is found impossible to do so in many other localities. Murley's Branch is one of the streams which rises under similar conditions at the western base of Warrior Mountain. After supplying power for several mills, and flowing through a flourishing region, it bends around to the east to pass through the gap in that mountain, then winds south and unites with Town Creek in the pleasant valley below Gilpintown. The upper parts of this and the next two adjoining valleys are distinguished by the presence of mineral springs, both sulphur and chalybite. Adjoining Flintstone, at the base of the gap in Warrior Mountain, a white sulphur spring of ample volume and of great clearness and mineral strength appears. Several others of the same type are also present between Green Ridge and Polish Mountain, particularly on the Carroll estate. Four of these issue from a fissiliferous slate rock which forms the bed of the valley, and although appearing limpid and free from sediment, nevertheless precipitate all along their margins the deposit known as "white sulphur." The temperature of these springs is 47° or 48° F., and a chemical analysis by experts establishes the presence of carbonic acid gas in large proportion, of sulphurated hydrogen, and of useful proportions of magnesia, muriate of soda, sulphate of lime, carbonate of lime, and of chlorides in small quantities.

Situated as these springs are in the fertile and beautiful valley of Fifteen-Mile Creek, at a distance of about sixteen miles east of Cumberland, in the midst of a region of invigorating and pure air, together with the facilities offered by the proprietor of the establishment there, should make the locality one of the chief resorts for invalids and tourists who seek for health and pleasure in more distant and far less accessible places. Most of the valleys are seated at an elevation of seven hundred to seven hundred and fifty feet above the sea. These and the cleared parts of the ridges are covered with farms, on which good crops of wheat, rye, Indian corn, oats, and potatoes are commonly raised. Apples, pears, and the common kinds of small fruits succeed well, and the alluvial bottoms are adapted for the grazing and raising of cattle and farm-stock. Springs are numerous along the flanks of the ridges, where they usually give rise to active little brooks which transport their waters to the larger creeks. The mountains are still overgrown with ample forests on their summits and sides, and these are composed of the yellow and spruce pines, with some groves of white pine and large areas of chestnut. On the deeper and moister soils the white, chestnut, and other oaks, together with the magnolia or cucumber-tree, the sycamore, sour-gum, tulip-tree, hickory, maple, and especially the false locust, grow luxuriantly.

The sugar-maple still grows abundantly in some localities, from which the farmers obtain their annual supply of the maple-sugar. Various flowering trees and small shrubs abound in the sheltered parts of the mountain gaps and in the ravines, among which the dogwood, fringe-tree, hawthorn, haw, Judas-tree, and calico-bush are very conspicuous. But the most magnificent of all, the great rhododendron, forms extensive thickets in the avenues among the trees, and adds its massive bloom to the sweet scent of the delightful azaleas. Along the alluvial levels of the Potomac the region is made gay by groups of bright heads of the native yellow lily, and by numerous varieties of pink, purple, and golden crowns of the ever-present asters and sunflowers. The Virginia creeper, Clematis, green-bric, and other climbing and trailing vines overspread the rocky nooks with waves of refreshing verdure.

Beyond Evitt's Mountain the city of Cumberland rests in an open amphitheatre, set around with high hills and prominent blunted mountain-domes. The Potomac River in making its long bend to pass around Knobby Mountain touches this city and receives the waters of Will's Creek. The latter occupies the bed of the great and startling gap in Will's Mountain, on the western side of Cumberland. This tremendous chasm has a width of five hundred feet at its base, and the abrupt mountain flank on its east side rises to a height of eight hundred feet above the creek. On this side the red sandstone lies at the base and stands up like a great wall, while on the opposite shore the white sandstone is seen in long, heavy walls of immense thickness, which are continuous with the side of the mountain and curve over its summit. The blue limestone forms the end of this ridge next the city, and crops out at various points on the hill beyond the creek. At this point, also, a large bed of the black magnesian limestone stands out prominently, and is quarried for the purpose of making hydraulic cement. This is calcined in kilns near the spot, and is then packed in barrels for exportation. Some of the limestones are slightly bituminous, and are often crossed by wide seams of quartz, which more strongly resist the atmosphere and elements, and are thus left standing in prominent belts, while the adjoining rock is worn away. Such features often constitute great buttresses of fantastic shapes, extending down from great elevations, and always form attractions to the observant and curious. One of these, of more than usual interest, is situated on the northwest slope of Will's Mountain, only a few miles beyond Cumberland. It has been a standing object of awe to the ignorant and superstitious, who dread to be near it during the evening or night, and who have given it the significant name of Devil's Sliding-place.

Crossing Will's Mountain through the valley of Braddock's Run, the higher ridge of Davis Mountain is reached, and then a descent is made into the great Potomac and Allegany coal-basin. It is an oval valley, sloping from the north towards the south, with the rocky sides curving upwards to form the crests of the mountains. On the western boundary the great Savage Mountain forms the highest ridge, while on the eastern side Dan's Mountain rises to a somewhat less elevation. Between these the present general surface of the valley drops down to a depth of five hundred feet below the summits of the ridges. In this county, between the Pennsylvanian line and the Potomac River, it has a length of about twenty miles and a width of five to six miles. This is the centre of Allegany's greatest activity, and along its slopes and swells the miners' houses crop out at frequent intervals, where the rugged surface has been denuded of the forests which once gave shade and moisture to the earth. In the midst of the rocks, on the hard, thin soil, the miner's family lives and manages to raise a few potatoes and some vegetables to eke out the scanty fare which the region supplies. All summer long, and until the icy cold of winter has stopped the canal, he works beneath the ground, cutting out the black mineral for transportation to other and distant places. Square holes in the sides of the mountains and in the ravines, kept open by supports of timber, lead to the beds from which the coal is taken. About twenty-seven square miles of area were originally occupied by the seams of this fuel, of which the main stratum, or great bed, fourteen feet in thickness, is the eighth in the descending order, and rests at a distance of about two hundred and seventy-seven feet below the surface.
Enormous quantities of this important mineral are being removed every year, and the rate of excavation is so rapid as to make it appear likely that this principal bed will be exhausted within the next half-century. The coal is of the semi-bituminous kind, containing from seventy-two to eighty-three per cent. of carbon, is jet-black and glossy, and is taken out in blocks often as large as a man can handle.

The valley is traversed by a number of streams, the principal of which is a fine large one, the George's Creek, that winds and bends in a deep channel from north to south, and empties into the Potomac River. The other streams are chiefly its tributaries, and generally rise on the mountain flanks, both east and west, wearing their way through deep channels in the hard sandstones and shales, until they finally become merged with the creek. Towards the northern end of the valley Jennings' Creek and Braddock's Run have cut their way in deep channels through gaps in Dan's and Will's Mountains, and dashing over broken rocks in the midst of startling scenery, they unite with Will's Creek in the great chasm a few miles from Cumberland. The mountains of this region are all quite massive, have been folded into chains of high, broad domes by the enormous pressure which raised them into the air chiefly after the coal period; but before that time marshes bordering the ancient ocean permitted the growth of a dense and rank vegetation, which supplied the material for the beds of carbonaceous mineral, since proved to be such useful fuel. This part of the country is of little interest as to its agricultural capacities, but it is full of remarkable scenery, and contains an ample store of carbonate of iron in connection with its coal-measures.

Garrett County.—Upon crossing the summit of the great Backbone Mountain, Garrett County is reached. It is the most elevated and compact mountain region in the State; the surface is all greatly elevated, and its outline is that of a broad triangle, whose hypotenuse is on the southeast, and is bounded there by the Potomac River. Its western boundary is a straight line, about forty miles long next to West Virginia; on the north it is equally straight, stands next to Pennsylvania, and is about thirty-two miles long. It has an area of about six hundred and seventy square miles, and is traversed from northeast to southwest by six long chains of mountains and two or three spurts running off from their sides. The country is supplied with great numbers of small brooks, most of which are torrents; and its principal river is the Youghiogheny, a rapid stream that rises at the fork of the Little Savage Mountain, and winding northwest through Pennsylvania, empties into the Monongahela River. At least two important coal-basins occur in this region, both of which are now being developed. The most easterly lies between Meadow Mountain and Negro Mountain, forming a long triangular trough, whose widest part is on the north, next Pennsylvania, and the narrow end is on the south, intersected by the valley of Deep Creek. It is about seventeen miles long by from two to five wide; and, like the coal-bearing valley of Alleghany, is a downward curve of broad and narrow strata of shale, sandstone, coal, limestone, conglomerate, and iron, resting one above the other in a regular series. The same is the case with the deeper and wider coal-basin which occupies the northwestern section of the country between Keyser's Ridge and Briery Mountain. It is an extremely uneven basin, broken into many small divisions by Winding Ridge and various spurs and knobs, and is traversed from south to north by the Youghiogheny River. This valley extends across the boundary lines of both Pennsylvania and West Virginia; but within the limits of Garrett County it varies in width from five to eight miles, while its length is co-extensive with the width of the western boundary of the State.

The former of these valleys is known as the Meadow Mountain coal-field, and the latter derives its name from the Youghiogheny River, which runs through its lowest level. Neither of these basins contains strata of coal at all comparable to the great fourteen-feet bed of the Alleghany Valley, and in some parts of each of the former the eroding waters have carried away vast sections of the coal-rocks; but at least four strata of coal have been detected in both, three of which beds average four or more feet in thickness. Besides the coal strata so important to this section, argillaceous iron ore occurs in large quantities. On Bear Creek a good quality of the oxide of manganese is present, apparently in large quantities, and on the western flank of Winding Ridge an extensive deposit of clay contains nodules of the carbonate of iron in connection with a layer of calcareous earth. At the same place may also be found a mineral composed of lime, clay, and the oxide of iron, well adapted for the production of a strong hydraulic cement.

The country is one of great attractiveness, from the fine resorts for health and pleasure which abound everywhere in the midst of fine scenery and pure air and water. Beautiful meadows of fresh green called glades are present almost everywhere along the mountain-tops, and the speckled trout still lives in the limpid streams which course through these uplands. During the warm seasons these glades are decked with a numerous collection of showy and bright flowering plants, which delight the eye and continually attract the attention. Among these the yellow lily, cardinal flower, phlox, asters, and smaller sunflowers may be cited, together with the fine flowering shrubs and trees, such as the cucumber magnolia, collinsonia, zeoethora, monarda, and rudbeckia. The sugar-maple also flourishes upon the mountain-sides, and yields its annual supply of syrup to the farmers who collect it. Wild beasts were formerly numerous in the rugged, rocky ravines and forests of the mountain-sides, but these have been mostly exterminated; and now in their stead may be occasionally found the red deer, raccoon, opossum, rabbits, and several varieties of squirrels. The wild turkey and pheasant are still tenants of the more secluded woods, and small game is yet to be found in the wilder spots. The glades produce rich grasses in great abundance, upon which the sheep and cattle are fed, and consequently the country is noted for the superiority of its mutton, as it is, also, for the fine quality of its well-named “Glades butter.” Rattlesnakes are still to be found in the wild rocky parts of the ravines, and a general list of the reptiles of the region would include most of those common to the Allegany belt at large. But the tops of the highest ridges are tenanted by creatures, although becoming more uncommon, such as the Canada porcupine, the white rabbit, and some mice, which belong properly to the Canadian fauna. The flora also, as represented by its trees, has much the same character, and may be distinguished by the northern spruces, hemlocks, and pines which grow in the exposed woods. Fish formerly abounded, among which the native trout was the most beautiful and desired, but over-fishing and neglect of the rivulets have depleted the streams, so that only small numbers can now be found where formerly the waters were almost overstocked with them. Rye, buckwheat, and oats are leading productions of the farms, and tobacco is raised to some extent on newly cleared lands. Cattle are raised in large numbers for export, and may be seen grazing in herds on the wide-spread ing meadows, while long trains of cars are continually being sent off loaded with well-fattened stock from this county. Thus, with all its peculiarities of surface and soil, built upon and out of the massive rocks which lie but a few feet beneath; with bracing breezes, pure air, good water, and extensive ranges of grandly picturesque scenery along the valleys and across the mountains, joined to its immense mineral resources, Garrett County possesses first-class advantages for attracting and sustaining a large and healthy population, while capable of receiving and providing for the ever-increasing number of summer residents and tourists who crowd thither for health and pleasure.

Potomac River.—Connecting all the counties which form the principal body of this great western tract, the historic and celebrated Potomac is at once the grandest and most remarkable surface feature of Maryland. It is in most respects both a river and a bay. Two great divisions, marked by peculiar individualities, distinguish it into the Upper and Lower Potomac. The former lies outside of the territory included within the foregoing description; but it may be briefly noticed as the estuary or bay-portion of the river, or that subject to the rise and flow of the tides of the ocean. It extends from the city of Georgetown to Chesapeake Bay, a distance of one hundred and twenty-five miles.

Below Alexandria it expands to a width of nearly two miles, and all along its winding course receives the waters of wide creeks, which increase its breadth, and spread out into broad, picturesque estuaries upon the lower levels. Some of these bodies of water are from three to five miles wide in conjunction with the river, while the outlet of the Potomac at its mouth forms a bay nearly eight miles wide, which stretches from Point Lookout to the opposite shore in Virginia. In the first part of its course below Washington the banks are composed of clay and sand bluffs, which rise to a height of fifty or sixty feet; but as it proceeds the high border lands gradually slope and wave lower, and finally fade out in points and bars. Before entering this bay-like division the river has left the region of primitive rocks, and from that point to its mouth passes only through alluvial and earthy beds of the upper secondary and tertiary periods.

But that part of it which belongs to the region included in the western counties is the river proper, usually called the “Upper Potomac.” It remains at present all beyond the reach of the tides, and probably it has never been affected by them.

Swift and powerful, it rushes in imperturbable grandeur through a channel of its own construction, cut out of the largest mountains in the State. In forming almost the entire western boundary of Maryland, it constitutes also the water border of the western counties. Away up among the high mountain summits where West Virginia touches the great Backbone range, marked by the Fairfax stone, this youngest of our great rivers bursts forth from the sandstones and shales of the carboniferous strata. The region is one of marked interest from the variety of striking objects which it presents. Hill-tops of mountain height, and loftier than the Blue Ridge, shaped by the tremendous floods of past periods, stand between the crests of the summit ridges. Broad belts of hemlock, spruce, and the northern pines bound the highest horizon, and form a dark background for the oak, chestnut, maples, birches, and poplars of the less elevated positions. A most picturesque scene stretches out before the eye as it takes in the winding valley with its silvery thread of water, here and there arrested by a ledge of dark rocks, then flashing the sunlight from the torrent or rapid, or leaping in foaming cascade to the basin scooped in the rocks below. In the deep solitude of the wilderness, where broken masses of rock lie spread around in endless confusion, where the forests are choked with the trunks and branches of the fallen trees, and the moistened slopes are covered with the matted foliage of the vines and creepers; there, too, where the flowering shrubs and sweet-scented ferns weave chaplets and plumes of the tenderest green over the crowns of the weather-worn bowlders, this bright streak of water pursues its onward course, ever forward and downward, with a ceaseless impulse towards the sea. It is the great outlet for the waters which reach the surface in a territory nearly two hundred miles in length, while its tributaries on the north side cross nearly or quite the entire width of the State, its great South Branch in Virginia, with the Shenandoah and a dozen smaller rivers and creeks, draining an area fully twice as great. Indeed, the South Branch is the principal member of the upper river, and to it is largely due the wide expanse of water which it discloses before passing beyond the high mountains. Soon after leaving the head-waters it has worn a deep trough into the firm rocks, torn away huge pieces from the hard ledges, and resistlessly rasped and dug its way downward along the flank of the huge Backbone Mountain until the foot of the great coal-basin has been reached. Its course has hitherto been northeast, it has spread out into a broad creek with shallow but limpid water, running over a strong and pebbly bed, now it makes a broad curve around to the west, then resuming the former course and bending north it receives the waters of a fine branch, the Savage River; another bend is made and the George’s Creek adds its narrow stream to the quickened flood which rushes on with new energy. It is now a vigorous and strong creek, able to contend with the obstructions that press in its way. Two miles above the former it had taken a new direction, going in a general southeast course; this is pursued for a distance of about eight miles, during which tearing its way across the end of Dan’s Mountain, and then flows on to New Creek. The slope of the country now favors another change of direction, and accordingly the river rushes away northeast through its shallower trough, interrupted by frequent rapids between the ridges of Dan’s and Knobby Mountains, a distance of twenty miles, when it bends abruptly around the spur of the latter mountain and touches the city of Cumberland. Will’s Creek now adds its quota of water, and the river passes down on the east side of Knobby Mountain. Here it is charged with islands near the Virginia shore, and soon bends into the form of the letter S, to pass through the gorge in Evitt’s Mountain. It is now in the very heart of high, abrupt ridges, where barriers must be crossed at right angles. Running in a straighter line towards the southeast, it rushes through the gorges of Martin’s, Warrior, and Town Hill Mountains, surrounded by most romantic scenery, decorated in all directions by a boundless stretch of verdure-clad hill and dale. In the interval it has been joined by the great South Branch, and the two have united their waters to dash on with renewed energy in rending the hills and distributing nourishment into the valleys farther away. Having passed Town Hill, it flows in long uneven loops towards the northeast, cutting its way through the dense body of Siding Hill, and gliding in perfect silence over the wreck of mighty ledges of rock, now lying as scattered bowlders over its bed, it bends once more and runs down the valley of the Tonoloway to where the little town of Hancock stands out upon the hills.

The beautiful dam which feeds the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal has been passed, the arched rocks and the cement-beds of the Round Top have been left behind, and the beautiful, clear river, as smooth and placid as a lake, glistens in the sunshine, and reflects the images of the grand old sycamore-trees that line its banks. Still broad and shallow, pursuing its course over the planed edges of the sandstones, slates, and limestones that lie across its path, it makes a long sweep towards the east, by a little south, until the spurs of the North Mountain are reached. At this point it has broken through a deep gorge, in the midst of a wild, rugged, and most romantic country, to become involved in difficulties which it could only surmount by passing suddenly around the unyielding rocks and forming a long narrow loop. After bending twice more, it strikes the heavy slates at Williamsport, admits the copious current of the Conococheague River, is unable to penetrate farther in the same direction, and is obliged to turn west and retrace nearly three miles of the distance previously gained. A great struggle for mastery now goes on between the river and the limestone-beds, with their layers of chert and strata of dense slate. Thus the river is compelled to run diagonally in a general southeast direction, and to bend back upon itself six times before its conflict with these hard rocks is over. Through an expanses of country more than twenty-five miles in length it has gained and lost, and at best has been obliged to follow the course of the Great Valley, and to submit to its conditions. But now, after Harper's Ferry is reached, the great rapid stream is favored by the tremendous down-slide which split the South Mountain from summit to base, and an avenue is open into the region on the east. Objects of fresh interest now appear on every hand. On the north side the majestic pile of castellated rocks, chimney peaks, the profile of the giant face, and the great arching strata of Maryland Heights rise in overpowering grandeur overhead. On the opposite shore the town of Harper's Ferry is seen straggling up, as if to reach the summit of the mountain bluffs, on the side of which the celebrated Jefferson's Rock is perched. Across the Shenandoah, more than a quarter of a mile distant, the spur called Short Ridge slants precipitously to the brink of the rapids, covered to the very top with close-set trees, between which huge piles of the mountain sandstone lie in indescribable disorder. As far as the eye can reach in this direction spurs, ridges, and peaks stand thrust together in close proximity, hiding all but the two lovely valleys through which the waters of the two great rivers find their outlet. An enormous but unimproved water-power now appears in view, the Potomac becomes fully one-third of a mile wide, and a heavy flood passes over a sloping but nearly flat channel.

The prospect down the river is now indescribably beautiful. The South Mountain, rock and tree clad, stands in silent majesty in the foreground; the Point of Rocks rises as a rocky bluff upon which to rest the eyes; the opposite shore waves away in vast, rounded swells of upland; the mighty river rolls in silvery brightness, losing itself in the mist-softerned verdure of the far-off landscape, while all the features of hill, valley, woodland, and plain blend into the tender blue of the scarce bounded distance. Still gradually widening as it runs, and preserving a south-east direction, the river receives the Monocacy at the outset of the delightful Frederick Valley. A wide, open tract enlarges the view of a luxuriant and picturesque region. The splendid viaduct for the canal over the Monocacy, the highly-cultivated hills on the borders of Montgomery County, and the triple crown of white sandstone of the Sugar-Loaf Mountain stand out as if sculptured monumental objects in the midst of the soft-toned landscape. The river now makes a wide bend in passing the hard slate rocks, and then enters the brown hills of the new red sandstone formation. From this point the slopes gradually increase in steepness, and for a distance of eighteen miles rise and fall in long serpentine waves. About four miles from the beginning of this sandstone its extreme altitude is reached in rocks which rise abruptly to an altitude of more than one hundred feet above the river. A new surprise now bursts upon the senses. The summits of the ridge are made of uplifted crags and chimney-rocks, reaching far above the tops of the tallest trees, resting upon long lines of natural brownstone masonry, and decorated at every turn by tufts, plumes, and festoons of lovely plants, ferns, and creepers. Long wall-like ridges of this picturesque rock, set in a background of far-reaching foliage, appear at frequent intervals along both shores of the river, and here its waters are interrupted at three or four stages by islands which have settled in its path. After passing the new red sandstone ridge, the river has set through its own valley of near eight miles the whole bed and surface of the country has been pressed together with such violent force that the former body of a huge mountain has been shattered into jointed fragments, in part carried away, and only its broken base left in the trough of the river. Throughout this distance rapids succeed each other in such quick succession that the bed of the stream is gradually lowered to a depth of eighty feet.

The Great Falls of the Potomac now appear at the lower end of this scene of ruin. A fall, thirty-five feet in height, now precipitates an enormous volume of water; this is divided into three principal cascades of uncommon grandeur, which, after boiling and chafing amidst the terrible rocks of the deep basin beneath, dash with uncontrollable violence through cahons of their own digging, and sweep out in a broad torrent through the channel below.

On either shore of this great scene of desolation piles of shining rock thrown on end project high into the sky, and send off craggy ledges from the base of every towering peak. The jointed rock fills the whole region as far as the eye can reach, and the prospect is rendered still more wild and impressive by the thinly spread-out forests which straggle over the broken ledges. Nowhere else in the State, if indeed anywhere on the eastern side of the continent, can a more sublime and awe-inspiring spectacle be seen. It is of such an unusual type in this part of the United States, and so remarkable, that the mind is directed first to the region of the Rocky Mountains to find its counterpart in structure and sublimity. The remainder of this division of the river keeps on for fourteen miles, which take it to Georgetown. In this part of its course it has steadily forced its way through the granitic rocks, spread out into a deep channel nearly three-quarters of a mile wide, until, after gathering into a series of cascades at its lower falls, and gliding along over bowlders and broken stones, it finally becomes lost in the waters of the alluvial basin at the head of tide-water.

The most characteristic expressions of this river are in the freshness, vigor, and variety which it everywhere displays. It crosses the Appalachian region in a direction which brings it in direct contact with every geological formation that belongs to the eastern slope of the continent. It winds its way through them all, or only yields where harmony is indispensable, in conformity with unalterable physical conditions. As a continental force its career seems but of yesterday. The ages had been steadily preparing for its advent. Cool morn of a long geological day, succeeded by the glowing heat of an equally protracted noontide, had been followed by the long evening twilight of the carboniferous era. Heavy mists and long periods of rainfall had saturated the low hills and set rivulets to running in the ravines and bottoms. But now the mighty mountains are upfolded, an axis separating the basins of the east from those of the west is built high into the air, and cracks have opened in its flanks to let loose the imprisoned waters of the subterranean cavities. From the end of one of these the young giant arose and burst forth with all the energy of a new life. Pushing aside the deep soil which rested around, and forcing apart the bits of rock that stood in the way, it soon worked a deep path out and along the dark mountain-side. Plunging, butting, and leaping against the ridges standing in its path, a narrow trough was cut away up in the midst of the highest uplands, and then gradually working, forced its way down to the lower levels, until the sea was reached beyond the lower hills. As the ages have rolled on it has pursued its onward course in nearly the same direction, ever deepening its channel and spreading so wide that it has been at one time a roaring flood of more than two miles in breadth.

From the time of Washington to the present it has been recognized as the great avenue leading to the West, and its great usefulness in the future will depend upon the skill and judgment with which it is employed to facilitate commercial relations between the two sides of a continent.

CHAPTER II.
THE ABORIGINES.

The Algonquin Stock—The Iroquois—Warlike Susquehanoughs—Capt. Fleet's Expedition—The Jesuit Missionaries—Treachery of Trueman and Washington—Murder of Susquehanough Chief and Bacon's Rebellion—The Senecas and Shawnees of Western Maryland—Indian Manners and Customs.

The Indians anciently occupying the vast expanse of country lying between the Atlantic and the Mississippi, and reaching from the St. Lawrence to the Gulf, have been classified by ethnologists, according to the affinities of language, into three great stocks. The first was the Algonquin stock, the most numerous and wide-spread of all, whose territories extended north as far as Hudson's Bay, and south to Pimicco Sound, and from the coast to the Mississippi, and in the northwest as far as Lake Winnipeg. The tribes of this stock were numerous. Among the most important were the great nation of Leni Lotape, or Delawares, the Chippewas, Ottawas, Pottawatomies, Mohegans, and Shawnees. To them also belonged all the New England tribes, and most of those of Maryland and Virginia. South of the Algonquins, occupying part of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and the Gulf region, was the Muscogee stock, comprising the Natchez, Uchees, and Creeks, forming the Muscogee Confederacy, and the Yamassee, Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Seminoles.

In the midst of the Algonquin territories, thrust in like a wedge, its base resting on the St. Lawrence and Lake Huron, and its apex reaching North Carolina, was the powerful Iroquois stock, comprising the famous confederacy of the Five Nations, the Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagoes, Cayugas, and Senecas. To the same stock, though not confederate with them, belonged the Hurons, the Susquehanoughs, and the Tuscaroras, which last tribe in 1712 joined the confederacy, which was thenceforth known as the Six Nations. ¹

The Iroquois, though less numerous, were the bravest, the fiercest, and the most intelligent of all, and were the terror of the surrounding tribes. It is these who have furnished the typical Indian of romance: grave, taciturn, patient in suffering, unyielding in action, defiant in death; faithful to friends, remorseless to foes; adroit in all the arts of the chase; cunning in strategy, surprises, and ambuscades; fierce and vindictively cruel in war. They possessed a higher degree of political and military genius than the rest; and their famous league seemed to correspond with their proportions, sounding from them as a voyage in a vault. They were clad in bear and wolskin, wearing the skin as the Mexican his poncho, passing the head through a slit in the centre, and letting the garment drape naturally around from the shoulders.

"Some have cassocks made of beares' heads and skinnies that a man's head goes through the skinner's neck, and the ears of the beare fastened to his shoulders, the nose and teeth hanging down his breast, another beare's face split behind him, and at the end of the nose hung a paw; the halfe sleeves coming to the elbowes were the neckes of the beares, and the armes through the mouth with paws hanging at their noses. One had the head of a wolves hanging in a chaine for a jewell, his tobacco pipe three-quarters of a yard long, prettily carved with a bird, a deere, or some such devise at the great end, sufficient to beat out one's brainers."
Smith has given us a spirited sketch of one of these gigantic warriors, "the greatest of them," thus attired:

"The calfe of whose leg was three-quarters of a yard about, and all the rest of his linens so answerable to that proportion, that he seemed the goodliest man we ever beheld. His hayre, the one side was long the other shave close, with a ridge over his crowne like a cock's comb. His arrows were five quarters long, headed with the splitters of a white chrystall-like stone, in forme of a hearte an inche broad, and an inche and a halfe or more long. These he wore in a wolfe's skinne at his backe for his quiver, his bow in the one hand and his club in the other, as is described."

All the territory now comprised in Cecil, Harford, Baltimore, Howard, Carroll, Frederick, and Montgomery Counties was the favorite hunting-ground of this formidable tribe, which scourd all the country between the Delaware and the Potomae, and spread terror and dismay through the distant and less warlike tribes of Southern and Western Maryland and parts of Virginia.

About the year 1621 the pinnace "Tiger," with twenty-six men, was sent from Jamestown, under the direction of an experienced trader named Spilman, to trade for corn with the Indians near the head of navigation on the Potomae. Arriving opposite the present site of Washington City, Spilman left five men on board of his vessel, and with the remainder landed among the Nacostines, or Anacostian Indians, who lived in that vicinity. Soon after, he was attacked by the Indians, and all of his party were either killed or taken prisoners, and among the latter was Capt. Henry Fleet. Remaining in captivity for several years, Fleet returned to England, where a contemptuous writer thus mentions him:

"Here is one, whose name is Fleet, newly come from Virginia, who being lately ransomed from the Indians, with whom he hath long lived, till he beth left his own language, reporteth that he hath oftentimes been within sight of the South Seas; that he hath seen Indians besprinkle their paintings with powder of gold; that he had likewise seen rare precious stones among them, and plenty of black fox, which of all others is the richest fur."

By his flattering representations he induced, in September, 1627, William Cloberry, a prominent merchant of London, to place the pinnace "Parmour," of one hundred tons burden, under his charge. He returned to the Indian town of Yowacomoco (afterwards St. Mary's City), where he had lived with the Indians, and traded largely with them for furs. He made a number of voyages across the Atlantic with cargoes of fur, and, with Gov. Leonard Calvert, before landing his company, made a reconnaissance of the Potomae as far as Piscataway. From his "Journal of a voyage made in the bark "Virginia" to Virginia and other parts of the continent of America," it is evident that his trading operations brought him into communication with many of the most powerful Indian tribes of Southern and Western Maryland. Arriving at Yowacomoco, he learned that one Charles Harman had been trading with the Indians of that region for furs during his absence, and had succeeded in securing three hundredweight of beaver-skins by representing that Fleet was dead.

"This relation," he says, "did much trouble me, fearing (having contrary winds) that the Indians might be persuaded to dispose of all their beaver before they could have notice of my being in safety, they themselves having no use at all for it, being not accustomed to take pains to dress it and make coats of it. Monday, the 21st of May (1621), we came to an anchor at the mouth of the river, where hastening awhore I sent two Indians in company with my brother Edward to the Emperor, being three days' journey towards the Falls."

By the 26th of May he "came to the town of Patomack" (Potomae Town, supposed to be, at the mouth of Potomac Creek, in Virginia), and on the 1st of June, "with a northwest wind, we set sail, and the 3d we arrived at the Emperor's." There was but little friendship, Fleet relates, between the Emperor and the Nacostines, "he being fearful to punish them, because they are protected by the Massomacks, or Cannyda Indians." The 13th of June Fleet "had some conference with an interpreter of Massonack, and of divers others Indians that had been lately with them, whose relation was very strange in regard to the abundance of people there, compared to all the other poor number of natives which are in Patomack and places adjacent, where are not above five thousand persons, and also of the infinite store of beaver they use in coats. Divers were the imaginations that I did conceive about this discovery, and understanding that the river was not for shipping, where the people were, not [nor] yet for boats to pass, but for canoes only."

The neighboring Indians endeavored to dissuade Fleet from his design of penetrating into this new country, but he declined to listen to their representations, and sent his brother and two trusty Indians with presents to the chiefs of this region.

"I find the Indians of that prosperous place," he says, "are governed by four kings, whose towns are of several names,—Tonhoga, Mostieum, Shaunsetown, and Moserahak,—reported above thirty thousand persons, and that they have palisades about the towns, made with great trees, and with sennfolds upon the walls. On Monday, the 25th of June, we set sail for the town of Tonhoga, where we came to an anchor two leagues short of the Falls, being in the latitude of 41°, on the 26th of June. This place, without all question, is the most pleasant and healthful place in all this country, and most convenient for habitation, the air temperate in summer and not violent in winter. It abounds with all manner of fish. The Indians, in one night commonly, will catch thirty sturgeon in a place where the river is not above twelve fathoms broad. And as for deer, buffaloes, bears, turkeys, the woods do swarm with them, and the soil is exceedingly fertile, but above this place the country is rocky and mountainous like Camdiana. The 27th of June I manned my shallop and went up with the flood, the tide rising about four feet in height at this place.

"We had not moved above three miles, but we might hear the Falls to roar about six miles, by which it appears that the river is separated with rocks, but only in that one place, for beyond is a fair river. The 3d of July my brother with the two Indians came thither, in which journey they were seven days going and five days coming back to this place. They all did affirm that in one palisado, and that being the last of thirty, there were three hundred houses, and in every house forty skins at least, in bundles and piles."

On the 11th of July he received a visit from "seven lusty men, with strange attire," of haughty language and demeanor, who called themselves Mos-tikums, but who, as Fleet afterwards learned,

"were of a people three days' journey from there, and were called Herecheeneces (Iroquois?), who with their own beaver, and what they get of those that do adjoin upon them, do drive a trade in Camdiana at the plantation, which is fifteen days journey from this place."

The Susquehannoughs, or Minquas, or Andastes, or Conestogues, or Gaudastogues, as they were sometimes called, were engaged in active hostilities against the colonists and friendly tribes from the first settlement of the colony on March 27, 1634. The policy of the early settlers of Maryland was to treat the Indians with justice, moderation, and kindness, and to buy the land from them. The settlement of St. Mary's was purchased by Leonard Calvert for a quantity of axes, hoes, and broadcloth, articles of real value to the Indians, who, indeed, were the more ready to part with the territory from the fact that they were suffering from the continued inroads of the fierce Susquehannoughs, who had harassed them so cruelly that they had already determined to abandon their lands and seek safer homes elsewhere. Some were allowed to remain on part of the purchased territory, and their wives and children were employed as servants in the settlers' families; others were allotted reservations, with full rights of hunting and fishing in the woods and streams. They very cheerfully submitted to the dominion of the whites for the sake of the protection against the Susquehannoughs, which their ancestors tried to purchase from Smith with the offer of perpetual subjection. The friendly Indians were protected against their enemies and secured in the enjoyment of their rights, and many of them, such as the Yaocomicos, Potopacos, Pisicataways, Patuxents, and others, rarely wavered from their amicable relations. The two strong and warlike tribes of Maryland—the Nanticookes and Susquehannoughs—preserved an independent existence, and at the time of the first settlement of the province there was a feud between them, and the former, as well as the latter, were often invaded by the Iroquois. As if this were not enough, the Nanticookes were frequently embroiled with the whites, and war was several times declared against them. Under this double pressure they yielded at last, and requested to be put on the same footing as the Pisicataways. The Iroquois, however, continued to harass them, and finally brought them under subjection. About the middle of the eighteenth century, by advice or command of the Six Nations (who stipulated in a treaty with the province that the Nanticookes should be permitted to leave Maryland and settle where the Six Nations should appoint), a portion of the tribe left the province, carrying with them the bones of their ancestors, and removed to Otseiningo (now Binghamton, N. Y.), where they joined some fragments of the Shawnees and Mohicans, and made a league under the name of the Three Nations. Others seem to have settled in Wyoming, Pa., and others again, if the theory be correct which identifies the Conoys, or Kanawhas, with the Nanticookes, to have removed to the vicinity of the rivers which now bear their name. As late as 1852 a remnant of the tribe (about one hundred) was living on Grand River, north of Lake Erie, in Canada West.

The interposition of the colonists in behalf of the peaceable and friendly tribes of Pisicataways, Patuxents, and Yoamacos had from the first secured the hostility of the Susquehannoughs, who took occasion as they followed the war-path against their savage enemies of the south, or the back settlers of Virginia, to strike a blow at the unprotected Marylanders; and at times they organized expeditions with the express purpose of surprising the frontier plantations, mur-

1 Father White's Narrative, pp. 36, 37.

2 Mr. Davis, in his "Day-Star," says "the territory of the Pisicataways, whose prominent chief bore the title of emperor, was bounded in one direction by the country of the Susquehannoughs, in another by the region of the Patuxents. It also embraced a part of the country bordering upon the Patapsco, and upon the Potomac, including Pisicataway Creek, and probably the sites both of Washington and of Baltimore." The confederates of the Pisicataways were the Dongas, Mattawomans, Chaptico, and the Mattawas. The latter tribe inhabited the lands near Baltimore.

3 The Patuxents, whose principal seat was upon the river of that name, included a large number of smaller tribes, remarkable for their friendliness towards the whites.
dering their occupants and plundering their dwellings. Even the devoted and fearless Jesuit missionaries who were engaged in converting the Indians to Christianity began seriously to think of abandoning their station on the Patuxent River and establishing themselves at Potopaqo (Port Tobacco), which was less exposed to the ravages of this cruel and warlike tribe.

Friendly relations having been re-established in the beginning of 1639 with the Patuxent Indians, the Jesuit missionaries immediately improved the favorable circumstance by dispersing themselves among the Indians in such places as seemed to be most favorable for the general diffusion of Christianity. The annual letter of 1639 says,—

"Father Andrew White is distant" from St. Mary's City "one hundred and twenty miles, to wit: at Kittamaquindi, the metropolis of Piscataway, having lived in the palace of the king himself of the place, whom they call Tayac, from the month of June, 1639. . . . The salvation of Maquouenou being despaired of, Father Andrew White betook himself to him [the Tayac], and being treated by him very kindly at the first interview, so attached the man to him that he was afterwards held by him in the greatest love and veneration; of which thing this is the strongest proof that he was unwilling that the father should use any other hospitality than his palace. Nor was the queen inferior to her husband in benevolence to their guest, for with her own hands (which thing the wife of our treasurer also does willingly) she is accustomed to prepare meat for him and bake bread, with no less care than labor. "So not long after the coming of Father White to his palace, the Tayac was in danger from a severe disease; and when forty conjurers had in vain tried, every remedy, the father, by permission of the sick man, administered medicine; to wit: a certain powder of known efficacy mixed with holy water, and took care, the day after, by the assistance of the boy whom he had with him, to open up one of his veins for blood letting. After this the sick man began daily to grow better; not long after became altogether well. Restored from the disease entirely, of himself he resolved, as soon as possible, to be initiated in the Christian rites; not himself only, but his wife also and two daughters; for as yet he has no male offspring. Father White is now diligently engaged in their instruction; nor do they slothfully receive the heavenly doctrine, for, by the light of heaven poured upon them, they have long since found out the errors of their former life. The king has exchanged the skins, with which he was heretofore clothed, for a garment made in our fashion; he makes also a little endeavor to learn our language. "Having put away his concubines from him, he lives content with one wife, that he may the more freely (as he says) have leisure to pray to God. He abstains from meat on the days in which it is forbidden by the Christian laws; and men that are heathens who do otherwise, or are of that name, he thinks ought to be called bad Christians. . . . But the greatest hope is, that when the family of the king is purified by baptism, the conversion of the whole empire will speedily take place."

The writer then proceeds to describe the execution of an Indian convicted of the murder of an Englishman. The culprit was converted to Christianity before his death, which he met with fortitude, and his remains were buried with the solemn rites of the Catholic Church. The writer adds,—

"No one, however, was more vehemently moved at the sight of the dying neophyte than the Tayac, who afterwards earnestly insisted that he too should receive the gift of baptism. The thing being considered in council, it appeared that it would be for the greater glory of God if it be deferred a little until it could be performed with splendid display, in the greatest solemnity, and in the sight of his countrymen; his wife also, and his children, coming to a participation of his joy and gladness. The king, at length, won over by the attentions of the Catholics, and greatly delighted with their prolonged hospitality, returned home, the same Father White being his attendant, whither as soon as he came he gave command to his people to prepare the church by next Pentecost, the time appointed for the next baptism. On that day, at Kittamaquindi, the Governor and other distinguished men of the colony contemplated honoring by their presence, and by whatever other means they can, the Christian sacraments and the second better birth of the Tayac, a merciful God causing this thing to turn out to the good of all,—to his glory, to our reward, and to the salvation of the whole tribe."

The Tayac mentioned in the last letter as king or emperor of Piscataway was also called Chittamacon, or Chitomachen. The latter appears to have been his proper name, and Tayac an appellation expressing his rank or dignity. He had been represented as a chief of great power, exercising authority over several of the neighboring tribes. His capital, called Kit-tamaquindi, was at or near the present village of Piscataway, about fifteen miles from Washington City.

The annual letter of 1640 gives an account of the baptism and marriage of this barbaric prince. So important was the event considered, that we find Governor Calvert and others of the principal men in the colony making a journey into the wilderness to be present at it. As an incident in history it may be placed beside the baptism of Pocahontas, which has so often inspired the artist's pencil. As that ceremony secured for Virginia the friendship of the great chief Powhatan, so the baptism of the Tayac gained for the infant colony of Maryland the good will and alliance of the most powerful of the neighboring chief-tains, without whose friendship its existence would probably have been seriously imperiled. The letter runs,—

"In this mission this year have been four priests and one coadjutor. We stated last year what hope we had conceived of converting the Tayac, or the emperor of what they call Piscataway. From that time, such is the kindness of God, the event has not disappointed the expectation, for he has joined our faith, some others also being brought over with him, and on the 5th of July, 1640, when he was sufficiently instructed in the mysteries of the faith, in a solemn manner he received the sacramental waters in a little chapel, which, for that purpose and for divine worship, he had erected out of bark, after the manner of the Indians. At the same time the queen, with an infant at the breast, and others of the principal men, whom he especially admitted to his councils, together with his little son, were regenerated in the baptismal font. To the emperor, who was called Chitomachen before, was given the name of Charles; to his wife, that of Mary. The others, in receiving the Christian faith, had Christian names allotted to them. The Governor was present at the ceremony, together with his secretary and many others; nor was anything wanting in display which our means could supply.

"In the afternoon the king and queen were united in matrimony in the Christian manner; then the great holy cross was erected, in carrying which to its destined place the king, Governor, secretary, and others bent their shoulders and hands; two of us in the mean time chanting before them the litany in honor of the Blessed Virgin."

In the mean time the Susquehannough Indians continued their depredations, for the records exhibit for many years lamentable accounts of the murders, house-burnings, and robberies committed by them upon the inhabitants of the territory now embraced in Montgomery, Ann Arundel, Prince George's, Baltimore, Harford, Cecil, and Kent Counties. In 1662 the colonists were at peace with the Susquehannoughs, but both of these were at war with the Senecas, who were devastationg the few scattered settlements of the English along the western tributaries of the Chesapeake Bay.

In the spring of 1662 they penetrated as far south as the head of South River, which seems to have alarmed the Council, for they ordered all the powder and shot to be seized for the use of the colony, and that scouts should be sent to the head-waters of all rivers emptying into the head of the bay, with orders to arrest or kill all Indians found there. The troubles with the Senecas grew worse, and on July 4, 1663, the Council was informed by the inhabitants of Baltimore County at the head of the bay that the Indians had recently murdered two of the settlers, and another near Patapsco River, with two youths whom it was believed they had either killed or carried off. For nearly twelve years a fierce war was kept up between the Susquehannoughs and Senecas, success being mostly on the side of the former tribe; but a more formidable enemy than even the Senecas had by this time invaded them,—the smallpox, which first appeared among them in 1661, and whose ravages became terrible. In 1673 they only numbered about three hundred warriors, while ten years before they had been able to muster seven hundred; and probably the mortality was even greater among the women and children.

When the Hurons, who were of Iroquois stock, were finally overthrown, the survivors fled for refuge to the Andastes, or Susquehannoughs, from whom they had before received promises of assistance. The protection thus afforded seems to have been resented by the Iroquois Confederacy, or Five Nations, and war being declared between them and the Susquehannoughs in 1662, the warriors of the latter tribe carried such devastation into the land of the Senecas (one of the Five Nations) that these were forced to seek the aid of the French. The Dutch writers, under date of 1661-62, relate that the Susquehannoughs, or Minquas, though they had suffered severely from the smallpox, had engaged in a war with the Senecas, and that "in May, 1663, an army of sixteen hundred Senecas marched against the Minquas and laid siege to a little fort defended by a hundred men, who, armed with firearms and even cannon, relying, too, on speedy aid from their countrymen, and from the Marylanders, with whom they had really made peace, defended themselves vigorously, and at last compelled the Senecas to raise the siege." The war between the Andastes and Iroquois continued for many years, with almost constant victory for the former. But disease accomplished what the Five Nations could not, and the reduced tribe was finally defeated, the Relation of 1676-77 speaking of the Andastes as utterly exterminated after a resistance of twenty years. That Maryland took part in the final defeat of this heroic nation is evident from the language of the Iroquois deputies at the treaty of Lancaster in 1744. "We do not remember," they say, "that we have ever been employed by the Great King to conquer others; if it is so, it is beyond our memory. We do remember we were employed by Maryland to conquer the Conestogues (Susquehannoughs), and that the second time we were at war with them we carried them off."

The Susquehannoughs having been reduced by disease and warfare to about three hundred warriors, in 1674 were terribly defeated by the Senecas, and driven from their homes at the head of the Chesapeake to the territory formerly occupied by the Piscatawys, near the Maryland and Virginia boundary, the latter tribe having been removed by the Assembly to lands on the Potomac River, near the present site of Georgetown, afterwards in Frederick County. Here they established themselves in an old Indian fortification. Here the Senecas pursued them, and did some damage to the plantations on both sides of the river.

In the summer of 1675 a white man was found lying covered with wounds at the door of his house near Stafford, Va., and the corpse of a friendly Indian by his side. Before dying he declared that Indians had been the murderers. Col. Mason and Capt. Brent at once collected a party of militiamen, and followed the trail up the Potomac and across that river into Maryland.
Here the party divided; the detachment under Brent found a wigwam belonging to some of the Doage tribe, surrounded it, and summoned the inmates to come forth. A chief obeyed, and was at once shot dead by Brent. The others within rushed forth, and all, ten in number, were shot down, only a boy being spared. In the mean time Mason's party had also found and surrounded a wigwam, and as the Indians came out at his summons they were fired on and fourteen killed, the firing only ceasing when a chief running up to Mason called out that they were Susquehannoughs and friends. The survivors denied all knowledge of the murder, which they said had been done by a marauding band of Senecas. Shortly after these several other murders were committed on both sides of the river, and terror and excitement prevailed. Disbelieving the innocence of the Susquehannoughs, or desirous of ridding themselves of their neighborhood, the Marylanders and Virginians organized a joint attack upon their fortress, the Virginia troops being led by Col. John Washington (great-grandfather of Gen. George Washington), Col. Mason, and Maj. Alderton, and the Marylanders by Maj. Thomas Trueman, one of the Governor's Council. The Maryland force were assisted by Piscataway, Chapteco, Matavoman, Pannunky, and Nansemy Indians. On Sunday morning, Sept. 25, 1675, the Maryland troops appeared before the fort, summoned the chiefs to a parley, and charged them with the recent murders, which they solemnly denied, laying the blame on the Senecas. These, they said, were now near the head of the Patapsco, and they offered guides for their pursuit. During the conference the Virginians had joined the Marylanders, and their commanders reiterated the charges, which the Indians persisted in denying, insisting that they were friends, and as proof of their assertions showing a silver medal with a black and yellow ribbon—the Baltimore colors—and certain papers which had been given them by Governor Calvert as a safe-conduct and pledge of amity. Trueman, it is said, professed himself satisfied of their innocence, and promised that no harm should befall them. On the following morning, however, Capt. Allen, who had been sent to one of the scenes of recent murder, returned, bringing with him the bodies of the victims, and arrived at the camp while the conference was being held with the chiefs. The passions of the militiamen were roused to fury by the sight of the mangled bodies, and the Virginia officers demanded the instant execution of the chiefs, Col. Washington, according to the testimony of a witness, being particularly furious, shouting, "What! should we keep them any longer? Let us knock them on the head."

Despite the reluctance of Trueman, five of the chiefs were bound, led away, and tomahawked, one only being spared. The remainder in the fort bravely defended themselves for six weeks, after which time, their provisions giving out, they made their escape by night.

For this breach of faith Maj. Trueman was cited before the bar of the Lower House, and Robert Carville, attorney-general, Messrs. Burgess, Cheseldyn, Stephens, and others brought in articles of impeachment against him, addressed to the proprietary, and supported by affidavits. These charge, first, that he caused the chiefs to be seized and executed after they had come out under assurance of safety, and had shown the paper and medal as evidence of their being friends to Maryland. Secondly, that he caused the execution without previously obtaining the proprietary's authority. Thirdly, that he failed to procure a signed declaration of the Virginia officers that the execution was by their advice and consent. They therefore conclude that Trueman had broken his commission and instructions, and pray his lordship and the Upper House "to take such order with the said Maj. Thomas Trueman as may be just and reasonable."

These articles and depositions being laid before the Upper House, Trueman was brought to trial on May 27, 1676, before the Lord Proprietary, Col. Samuel Chew, chancellor and secretary, and Cols. Wharton and Tailler, sitting as a court of impeachment, and it was voted, nemine contradicente, that the accused was guilty of the first article of impeachment, and the Upper House was requested to send a message to the Lower House, desiring them to draw a bill of attainder against him. The bill was at once drawn and sent to the Upper House, which on the 1st of June responded by a message saying that the penalties therein prescribed were far too light for "so horrid a crime" and breach of the public faith. That if Trueman escaped so lightly the justice and dignity of the province would be brought into contempt, and the Indians set an example of bad faith likely to have disastrous consequences. That, moreover, the Assembly will be looked upon as countenancing rather than abhorring the acts of Trueman.

To this the Lower House replied that circumstances were shown at the trial that extenuated the conduct of the accused; for instance, "the eager impetuousity of the whole field, as well Marylanders as Virginians, at the sight of the Christians murdered at Mr. Hinson's," the identification of several of the chiefs as the murderers, and the necessity of the act to prevent a meeting. They therefore refused to recede from their former position.
The Upper House on the 12th answered that the bill was a attainder only in name; that they never would consent "to inflict a pecuniary punishment upon a person accused of murder by one house and condemned by the other; and that it was against their privileges for the bill to be pressed on them any further." The Lower House unanimously decided that Trueman, though guilty of the charge, was not deserving of death, and the Upper House remaining firm, he escaped his deserved punishment. He was, however, dismissed from the Council.

It has been said that the Indians left in the fort after the massacre of the chiefs defended themselves until their provisions gave out and then escaped by night. They went with the fires of rage and revenge burning in their hearts, and marked their southward march by a track of devastation and slaughter. At least sixty settlers paid the penalty of that deed of treachery and cruelty. One of them was a servant of Nathaniel Bacon, of Virginia; and this aroused Bacon, a man of bold and adventurous spirit, to apply for a commission to raise and command a force against the Susquehannoughs, the consequences of which were the utter crushing of the tribe and the revolt which bears Bacon's name in Virginian history.

A remnant of the Susquehannoughs that had been carried off by the Iroquois in a war with that nation must have maintained a separate existence, for we find that Penn, in 1701, entered into a regular treaty with Conodoagtok, king of the Susquehannoughs, Minquays, or Conestoga Indians; but it would seem that on this occasion a representative from the Onondago tribe was present. As a subject tribe we meet with the Susquehannoughs for many years in the negotiations of the league, and though some of them appear to have been removed to Onoghnage, a little band remained at Conestoga, where, joined by some Nanticookes, they formed a small village. In 1763, we are told, "that they were still at their old castle, numbering only twenty, inhabiting a cluster of squallid cabins, living by beggary and the sale of baskets, brooms, and wooden ladles. An Indian war (Pontiac's) then desolated the frontier, and the Paxton boys, suspecting these poor wretches, and finding in the Bible sufficient commission to destroy the heathen, attacked the village, and killed six of them, the only occupants at the time. The fourteen survivors were taken to Lancaster by the sheriff, and shot up in the jail-yard for protection, but they could not escape the Paxton boys, who, while the townspeople were at church, burst into the jail and massacred the helpless objects of their fury." Thus perished at the hands of a cowardly mob the last remnant of that once powerful and noble tribe which had lorded it over the whole of Maryland, and which had often vanquished the fiercest and most formidable of the Indian confederacies.

The Indians that roamed over the upper counties of Western Maryland belonged to the Shawnee tribe, a subdivision of the Algonquin group. According to a tradition of recent origin, the Shawnees, or Shawanese, were primarily identical with the Kickapoo nation; but they moved eastward, and a part are said to have remained in 1648 along the Fox River, while the main body, met south of Lake Erie by the Iroquois, were driven to the banks of the Cumberland River.

The basin of the Cumberland River is marked by the earliest geographers as the locality of the Shawnees, who connected the southeastern Algonquins with the western, and there is authority for the statement that they were inhabitants of this territory before the settlement of the Europeans on the continent. In 1682, when Penn made his celebrated treaty with the Indians, in the neighborhood of the present city of Philadelphia, the Shawnees were a party to the treaty in common with other tribes who composed the great nation of Algonquins, and they must have been considered a very prominent band from the fact of their having preserved the treaty in their own possession, as we are informed that at a subsequent conference held with them and the Mingoes many years afterwards, probably in 1701, by the Governor of Pennsylvania, the Shawnees produced this treaty written on parchment.

It would seem that after the treaty of 1682 a part of the Shawnees lived near Winchester, Va., but that the principal band removed from their hunting-ground in Kentucky, on the Cumberland River, to the headwaters of one of the great rivers of South Carolina, perhaps the Congaree; and at a later day four hundred of them who had wandered in the woods for four years were found a little north of the head-water of the Mobile River, on their way to the country of the Muscogees, or Creeks.

In the year 1684, La Salle, a Frenchman, set out on a second expedition for the discovery of the mouth of the Mississippi, but before he had effected his object he was murdered by the Indians. In 1694, M. Iberville set out on a voyage of the same character, and on the 14th of August a basket was found in the possession of some Indians containing a paper upon which the names of many individuals belonging to La Salle's expedition were written, and a letter addressed to M. D. Zanti, from which it was learned that he had decended to the sea with twenty Canadians and thirty Shawnee Indians from the river Wabash. This appears to have been on the first expedition of La Salle, which was of course prior to the one above mentioned, which was in the year 1684, but how long before is unknown. Thus it seems that previous to the year 1684 some of the Shawnees lived on the Wabash, but what became of the thirty Shawnees who accompanied La Salle we are not informed; it is thought, however, that they made their way into Florida or Texas, and never returned to the Wabash country. About 1678 seventy families of the Shawnees removed from South Carolina and settled on the Susquehanna River, in Pennsylvania. Others of the same tribe soon followed, so that the number of fighting men of this tribe in Pennsylvania in 1732 amounted to seven hundred, half of whom were from the South. This number, it is presumed, only included the band that had gone to South Carolina; but as it is evident that these seven hundred warriors did not include all the Shawnees, the remainder can be accounted for by another band, referred to by Cadwallader Colden, who, after remarking, in 1745, that the Shawnees were the most restless of all the Indian tribes, says that one tribe of them had gone to New Spain (now Florida). This band of four hundred and fifty, who were found north of the head-waters of the Mobile River, probably never returned to Pennsylvania, while the band which had lived near Winchester probably removed to the Alleghany, near Fort Duquesne, and afterwards to Cape Girardeau, between the Whitewater and Mississippi Rivers.

The Iroquois claimed sovereignty over the Shawnees, and drove them to the West, where they took active part in the various Indian wars that from time to time broke forth in vain attempts to stay the progress of white civilization. In 1731, rejecting the English missionaries, they negotiated with the French, and gave early aid to them in the final struggle; but in 1758 they were won over by the appearance of Gen. Forbes. After the fall of Canada they joined Pontiac, and were active in hostilities till subdued by Bouquet. In 1774 they participated in the battle of Point Pleasant, and in 1779 twice repulsed the attacks of Col. Bowman. They joined in the peace of 1786, but under English influence took part in the Miami war, in the campaigns against Gens. Harmar and St. Clair, till they were finally reduced by Gen. Wayne, and submitted under the treaty of Greenville in 1795. The main party were at this time on the Scioto, but some had crossed into Missouri, where the Spaniards gave them land. Another band moved South. In the war of 1812 some of the bands were won by the English. Urged by Tecumseh and his brother, the Prophet, they endeavored to unite all the Indians of the West against the Americans, but those in Ohio remained faithful. The Missouri band ceded their lands to the government in 1823, and the Ohio band in 1831. In 1854 the band of Shawnees proper in that part of the Indian Territory now included in Kansas numbered nine hundred, on a reservation of one million six hundred thousand acres; but by treaty the tribal relation was ended, and the lands were divided in severalty. Besides these, there were in 1872 ninety in the Quapaw agency, and six hundred and sixty-three in the Sac and Fox agency.

Of the region bordering on the Upper Potomac, however,

"there is no history," says a distinguished writer, "either written or oral, to enlighten us as to the events of an epoch earlier than about 1725.

"At that date there was located in the province of Maryland, at the junction of two streams known as the Cohongaronta and the Caicuctucue, an Indian town, which also bore the latter name. The town of Caicuctucue was built on the ground lying between these streams, from their confluence to a point some distance up the river Cohongaronta, the greater portion of the town being located upon the site of the west side of the present city of Cumberland. Other towns were dotted along the river's bank for a distance of more than forty miles, the most easterly being the present site of Oldtown, Allegany Co., Md. A century ago the settlement at that point was called 'Shawanese Oldtown,' but of late years the explanatory prefix has been entirely dropped, and the place is now simply known as Oldtown. Other villages were scattered about between the Virginia and Pennsylvania lines, two of which were not far distant from Caicuctucue. One of these was located in the narrow valley, three miles westward, on the banks of Braddock's Run, on what is now known as the Eddies' place, and within a few yards of the line of the present National road, just where it is crossed by the Eckhart Railroad. Within the memory of men now living there were many relics of this village in existence.

"The ground was heavily timbered throughout that valley, and a clearing of several acres had been made there, in which were still to be seen the remnants of the small huts used by the natives. Just across the ridge, in Cash Valley, was another village of the same character, and still another of greater dimensions was situated near the spot on which Cresaptown stands, probably a little nearer the river. The date of the decline and fall of the town of Caicuctucue is left to conjecture, but it was abandoned prior to 1751, as is shown by the earliest map of this region, made in that year, which simply marks the territory in question as 'Abandoned Shawanese Lands,' and at that time 'many bands of Indians of other tribes, with scattered lodges, were found here by the hardy pioneers, whose venturesome spirits led them so far beyond the limits of civilization, while the Shawanees thickly peopled the banks of the Ohio and the Monongahela west of the Alleghanies.' "

In its day and generation, however, Caicuctucue was a town of respectable dimensions, built after the fashion of Indian villages in general. It was simply an aggregation of cabins or wigwams, constructed by fixing saplings in the ground in a circle and tying the flexible ends together at the top, so as to form a conical cage or frame-work, which was covered with skins or sheets of bark. A better style of house, such as the chiefs used, was constructed by inclosing an oblong space in the same manner. Holes were cut in the sides for windows, and an opening left at the top to allow the smoke to escape, the fireplace occupying the centre part of the floor. Mats of grass or rushes were sometimes used to partition off an apartment. The mode of fortification was by inclosing the whole town, or a part of it, including the chief's house, with a strong and close stockade. Within this stockade was the council-fire, around which they gathered to discuss public matters or for religious ceremonies.

The land about the village was held in common, but to each family a portion was allotted for cultivation, the agricultural tasks devolving upon the women. Each family delivered a part of the crop to the chief, and it was placed in a general store-house to be used for the chief's subsistence, for the entertainment of guests, and as a reserve in case of scarcity or siege. They cultivated maize, beans, tobacco, and several varieties of the melon and gourd. The confederate tribes exercised common rights of forestry over the surrounding wilderness; but certain natural boundaries, such as rivers and streams, distinguished the territory of each from its neighbors.

The tribe was subject to its chief, who had absolute power over his people, and whose authority descended in the female line. When the chief died he was succeeded by his brother of the same mother, or failing a brother, by his sister's son; the alleged reason being that descent derived through the mother is certain, while that through the father was uncertain. This custom would seem to point to a time when conjugal fidelity was rarer among the women than the early writers represent it. Next to the chief, or "king," of the tribe was the werowance, or general, who had command of all expeditions, whether peaceful or hostile. Such warriors as had distinguished themselves in council or battle were honored with a title which the early travelers and historians give as cockarouse, and these, with the chief, the werowance, and a "medicine-man," or conjuror, formed the ordinary council of the tribe.

This medicine-man was a person of great importance, combining in himself the functions of physician and magician, as is generally the case among savage tribes, who look upon disease as the result of a hostile incantation or the anger of a malignant or offended spirit. They were usually initiated into their profession by a long period of preparation, including protracted fasting, solitude, severe penances, and frequently the administration of narcotic drugs. This regimen produced hallucinations, in which medicines or charms were revealed to them by spirits, and a hysterical or epileptic tendency superinduced, which, under nervous excitement, readily gave rise to paroxysms.

Their modes of powwowing were various, but usually began with drum-beating, shaking of rattles, and chanting by the assistants, and furious dancing and gesticulation on the part of the conjuror, until he was seized with convulsions, real or simulated, and rolled upon the ground with face distorted and mouth foaming. Sometimes he h找回d forth his oracle in this condition, and then it was understood to be a spirit that possessed him speaking with its voice; at other times he fell prostrate and apparently lifeless, and did not deliver his oracle until he recovered his senses, when he announced that his soul had quit他的 body and journeyed to the world of spirits, whence it brought the desired answer. In their medical practice they combined these conjurations with treatment of a more orthodox sort, administering drugs, using scarification, catarization, and other remedies; and in both capacities they were regarded with great veneration. These medicine-men also took a prominent part in the religious ceremonies, solemn fasts, and other rites. These had mostly reference to the change of seasons and other events, the chief feast being at the maize-harvest, while others signalized the return of certain sorts of migratory game, the ripening of certain fruits, etc. Their festivals were celebrated with various ceremonies of a symbolical character, with singing, dancing, and a grand banquet.

Neither at these festivals nor in their ordinary life did these Indians use any beverage but water, sometimes sweetened with the sap of the sugar-maple, until after they had learned the use of spirituous liquors from the whites; and to these, Father White tells us, the Maryland Indians had at first a great repugnance, though afterwards drunkenness became a prevalent vice with them. The custom of smoking tobacco was universal among the tribes at the time of the first arrival of the whites. It was regarded, however, in a far different light from the same practice among ourselves. Tobacco was a sacred herb, a precious gift of the Great Spirit to his children, and the act of smoking had always something of a ceremonial or even religious character. In some tribes the chief, standing at the entrance of his cabin at sunrise, saluted the first appearance of the solar disk with solemn wafts of smoke from his pipe. In councils and other ceremonies the calumet played an important part. It was solemnly lighted by the chief, who gave a few whiffs, sometimes directing these to the four cardinal points, and then opened the matter for consideration; the pipe was next handed to the second in rank, who in turn took two or three whiffs, and then delivered his opinion, and thus the pipe made the circuit of the assembly. A large and ornamental pipe was kept in each village for the ceremonious reception of strangers, whose peaceful or hostile intentions were known by their reception of it. The chief of the village filled and lighted the peace-pipe in the presence of the visitors, and after smoking a little handed it to their principal men. If he refused to smoke, it meant that their intentions were hostile, but if he received and smoked it, it was a sign of peace, and it was passed alternately according to rank between hosts and guests. These pipes were adorned with feathers and wings of birds, and whatever other ornament their fancy could devise, and served also as credentials to traveling ambassadors, and, like the herald's tabard of feudal times, was a safe-conduct even among foes.

At the time of the arrival of the first colonists the Maryland Indians clothed themselves in skin, mostly of the deer, which the women had the art of dressing extremely soft and pliant. Some, according to Smith, used ingeniously-woven mantles of turkey-feathers. Their weapons were bows and arrows, painted with pieces of deer-horn, the spurs of the wild turkey, or flints skillfully chipped to the requisite shape and keenness; hatchets of hard stone-ground to an edge and grooved for the attachment of a handle, and war-clubs of hard wood, sometimes edged with flints. As defensive armor they had shields of bark, and Smith mentions a kind of light target used by the Massawomekes, made of small sticks woven between strings of hemp and silk grass, and proof against arrow-shots. The introduction of firearms, however, rendering these simple contrivances useless, they were gradually abandoned. They soon learned to buy improved arms, implements, and clothing from the Europeans, giving in exchange furs and peltries, and getting coarse, heavy cloths, hatchets and knives of steel, guns and ammunition, and pieces of iron out of which they cut lighter and better heads for their arrows. Though iron ore was abundant, none of the Indians had the art of melting it, their skill in metallurgy being limited to the manufacture of rude articles out of native copper, and occasionally gold. Penn's description of Indian manners and customs is as graphic as it is accurate.

"Of their manners and customs," he says, "there is much to be said. I will begin with children. So soon as they are born they wash them in water, and while very young, and in cold weather to choose, they plunge them in the river to harden and embolden them. Having wrapped them in a cloth, they lay them on a straight thin board, a little more than the length and breadth of the child, and swaddle it first upon the board to make it straight,—wherefore all Indians have flat heads,—and thus they carry them at their backs.

"The children will go very young, at nine months old commonly. They use only a small cloth round their waist till they are large. If boys, they go a-fishing till ripe for the woods, which is about fifteen; then they hunt, and after giving some proofs of their manhood, by a good return of skins, they may marry, else it is a shame to think of a wife. The girls stay with their mothers and help to hoe the ground, plant corn, and carry burdens; and they do well to use them young, which they must do when they are old, for the wives are the true servants of their husbands. Otherwise the men are very affectionate to them.

"When the young women are fit for marriage they wear something on their heads for an advertisement, but so as their faces are hardly to be seen but when they please. The age they marry at, if women, is about thirteen or fourteen; if boys, seventeen or eighteen; they are seldom older.

"They are great concealers of their own recentments, brought to it. I believe, by the revenge that hath been practiced among them; in either of these they are not exceeded by the Italians. In sickness they are impatient to be cured, and for it give everything, especially for their children, to whom they are extremely natural. They drink at those times a tea, or concoction of roots in spring water; and if they eat any flesh, it must be the fellow of any creature. If they die, they bury them with their apparel, be they men or women, and the nearest of kin fling in something precious with them as a token of true love; their mourning is blacking of their faces, which they continue for a year. They are choice of the graves of their dead, lest they should be lost by time and fall to common use. They pick off the grass that grows upon them, and heap up the fallen earth with great care and exactness. These poor people are under a dark night in things relating to religion; to be sure the traditions of it they have only, yet they believe in a God and immortality without the help of metaphysics; for, say they, there is a great king that made them, who dwells in a glorious country to the southward of them, and that the souls of the good shall go thither, where they shall live again. Their worship consists of two parts, sacrifice and canties; their sacrifice is their first fruits, the first and fattest buck they kill goeth to the fire, where he is all burnt, with a mournful ditty of him that performeth the ceremony, but with such marvelous fervency and labor of the body that they will even sweat to a foam. The other part is their canties, performed by round dances, sometimes words, sometimes songs, then shouts; two being in the middle tent begin, and by singing and drumming on a board direct the chorus.

Their postures in the dance are very antique and differing, but all keep measure. This is done with equal earnestness and labor, but great appearances of joy. In the fall, when the corn cometh in, they begin to feast one another. There have been two great festivals already, to which all come that would. I was at one myself. Their entertainment was a great set by a spring, under some shady trees, and twenty fat bucks with hot cakes of new corn, both wheat and beans, which they make up in square form, in the leaves of the stem, and bake them in the ashes, and after that they fall to dancing. But they that go must carry a small present in their money; it may be sixpence, which is made of the bone of a fish; the black is with them as gold, the white, silver. They call it all wampum. The justice they have is pecuniary; in case of any wrong or evil fact, be it murder itself, they atone by feasts and presents of their wampum, which is proportioned to the offense or person injured, or of the sex they are of; for in ease they kill a woman, they pay double, and the reason they render is that she can raise children, which men cannot do. It is rare that they fall out if sober, and if drunk forgive it, saying it was the drink and not the man that abused them."

Their mode of warfare was altogether of the guerilla sort, consisting chiefly of surprises and ambuscades, in which they displayed great skill and cunning. Such a thing as a pitched battle between two armies in the open field was contrary to all their notions of good strategy. When a hostile expedition had been determined on by the chief and leading warriors in council, it was made known to the tribe, who celebrated the occasion by a solemn dance, in which the warriors, bedizened in paint and feathers, stated their past or projective exploits, and imitated in expressive pantomime the shooting, tomahawking, and scalping of their foes. On the appointed day they set out in one or more parties, moving, as they approached their destination, with extreme wariness to prevent discovery, marching often by night in single file, slipping from shadow to shadow, or gliding through the forest so stealthily that hardly a twig snapped or leaf rustled under the tread of a moosed foot, until at a given signal they burst upon the village with terrific war-whoops. Those of their foes who survived after the rage of slaughter was glutted they made prisoners, and reserved for death by the most cruel tortures their ingenuity could devise; in inventing and enduring which the Iroquois—who, indeed, have the credit of introducing the custom—seem to have surpassed all others. Instances are recorded of the tortures of distinguished warriors lasting for days, a sort of contest arising between the power of cruelty to inflict and that of fortitude to endure. In the intervals of torment the victim would sometimes smoke his pipe and talk on indifferent matters with his tormentors; while amid his suffering he sang his own exploits, or derided the unskillfulness of his torturers, and taught them devices for inflicting more exquisite pain. Women were sometimes tortured, but usually they were tomahawked or shot, unless the captors wanted women, in which case they were adopted into the tribe.

One of the most noted species of ornament, which answered all the purposes of a circulating medium among the Eastern Indians, was wampum. This consisted of small circular bits of sea-shell, smoothly ground and polished, with a hole drilled through the centre of each, by which it might be strung or attached ornamentally to the belt or other parts of the dress. The "quahog," or round clam, furnished the principal material for this coin, the variegated purple portions of the shell being much the most valuable. The great labor in preparing it was the boring, which was effected by a sharp flint.

"The wampompeague," says Gookin, "is made principally by the Block Islanders and Long Island Indians. Upon the sandy flats and shores of those coasts the milk shells are found. With this wampompeague they pay tribute, redeem captives, satisfy for murders and other wrongs, purchase peace with their potent neighbors, as occasion requires; in a word, it answers all occasions with them, as gold and silver doth with us."

To effect a clearing and secure a crop with such rude implements of stone as they possessed appears to us almost an impracticable undertaking; but we are assured by early writers that they obtained as large a yield from a given quantity of ground as can be produced by the assistance of all modern conveniences and contrivances.

Two dishes greatly in vogue among the Indians, says Brownell, have maintained their popularity among their European successors. Green corn, the ripening of which was celebrated by a national dance, is sought as eagerly as when it supplied a grateful refreshment to the red men, eneulated, as Smich describes them, by their spring diet of fish and roots. A preparation denominated "succotash," consisting of maize boiled with beans and flavored with fat bear's meat or fish, still remains a favorite dish.

It is a singular fact that the use of milk should have been entirely unknown before the advent of the whites, although there were various animals in the country from which it might have been procured. This fact has been adduced as a strong argument against the hypothesis that immigrants from the nomadic tribes of Tartary have mingled with the red race in comparatively modern times.

A favorite article of diet was a cake made of maize, beaten as fine as the means at command would permit, mixed with water, and baked upon a flat stone, previously heated in the fire. These cakes, it is said, were called "Shawnee cakes," the name, in the course of a few years, being corrupted into the "Johnny-cake" so well known in the South and other sections of the country at the present day.
"The lands in the vicinity of Cumberland," says Lowdermilk, "are rich in Indian relics, and an interesting collection of stone pipes, tomahawks, rings, tablets, quirts, etc., has been made by F. M. Offset. These were taken from graves which were opened by various persons. Among the banks of the Potomac the curious may still find these graves, and the writer has himself assisted in the exploration of a number of them. The custom of the Indians was to lay their dead upon the surface of the earth, and to deposit beside them their bows, arrows, tomahawks, and food in jars or crocks of pottery made of clay mixed with finely-crushed flint, and burned. The friends then deposited such articles as they chose, and the bodies were afterwards covered with stones, which were laid on to the height of about two feet. Usually the stones used were bowliners from the bed of the river. It is probable that the graves thus constructed were those of parties who were on the war-path, or traveling from one place to another, as usually not more than two or three graves are found together. This is rendered more probable from the fact that few such graves are found in the vicinity of their towns. At Brady's Mills a number of skeletons were unearthed some years ago by workmen who were excavating the ground for the production of a distillery built there by Samuel Brady. These were, beyond doubt, the remains of Indians, and were buried in a sitting posture some depth below the surface. This was doubtless the burial-ground of the Indian village which lay between that place and Cresaptown. On the farm of Mr. Christopher Kelly, fourteen miles below Cumberland, one of these stone-piles was opened recently, and a beautiful serpentine pipe of green tinted stone, besides rings, etc., taken therefrom. In that neighborhood, and on the opposite side of the river, are several other graves of a similar character, while in the valley of the South Branch they have been discovered in great numbers, and hundreds of relics taken from them have found their way to the Smithsonian Institute. The articles thus recovered were all of stone or bone, the latter being used freely as ornaments."

CHAPTER III.

THE EARLY SETTLERS.

It was many years after the first settlement of Maryland before the advance of white civilization reached the western section of the province. The population of that region was so sparse that it was not until 1748 that it was considered sufficient to justify the formation of another county, and even then the new county of Frederick was so thinly settled that it was made to embrace the whole territory now included in Montgomery, Washington, Allegany, Garrett, and part of Carroll Counties, besides that comprised at present within its own limits, forming about three-fourths of the land area of Maryland. Although traders and hunters had penetrated the wilds of Western Maryland as early as 1715, and perhaps fifteen years earlier, few attempts at white settlements were made in the remoter portions of this region for many years afterwards. In 1732, Joist Hite, with his family and his sons-in-law, George Bowman, Jacob Chrisman, and Paul Froman, with their families, accompanied also by Robert McKay, Robert Green, William Duff, Peter Stephens, and several others, numbering in all sixteen families, removed from Pennsylvania, cutting their road from York, and crossing the Cohongorount about two miles above Harper's Ferry. Hite settled on Opequon, about five miles south of Winchester, on the great highway from Winchester to Staunton. Peter Stephens and several others settled at Stephensburg and founded the town; Jacob Chrisman, at what was afterwards called Chrisman's Spring, about two miles south of Stephensburg; Bowman, on Cedar Creek, about six miles farther south; and Froman, on the same creek, eight or nine miles northwest of Bowman. Robert McKay settled on Crooked Run, eight or nine miles southeast of Stephensburg. Hite and his party were probably the first immigrants who settled west of the Blue Ridge, but it was not long before they were followed by others.1

Benjamin Allen, Riley Moore, and William White had settled upon the Monocacy, in Maryland, prior to 1734, and in the same year Richard Morgan obtained a grant for a tract of land in the immediate neighborhood of Shepherdstown, on or near the Cohongorount. Among the first settlers on this water-course and its vicinity were Robert Harper (from whom Harper's Ferry derives its name), William Stroop, Thomas and William Forester, Israel Friend, Thomas Shephard, Thomas Swearengen, Van Swearengen, James Forman, Edward Lucas, Jacob Hite, John Lemon, Richard Mercer, Edward Mercer, Jacob Vanmeter and brothers, Robert Stockton, Robert Buckles, John Taylor, Samuel Taylor, Richard Morgan, and John Wright. The first settlers on the Wappatamaka (South Branch) were Coburn, Howard, Walker, and Rutledge.

The more southern part of Western Pennsylvania (Greene, Washington, Fayette, and part of Somerset, which were supposed to be within the boundaries of Virginia) was visited by adventurous settlers from Maryland prior to 1754. Among them were Wendel Brown and his two sons, and Frederick Waltzer, who settled four miles west of Uniontown, Pa. David Tygart had settled in the valley which bears his name in Northwestern Virginia, and several other families joined him a few years afterwards. These, with those of Gist, Cresap, and several others, of whom more will be said hereafter, were probably the only settlements (west of the Blue Ridge Mountains) attempted prior to Braddock’s defeat, and those made immediately afterwards or before 1760 were repeatedly molested by the Indians, and alternately abandoned and reoccupied.

William Jacob settled at the mouth of Redstone Creek in 1761, but was obliged to remove on account of the Indians in 1763, and in 1769 applied for a location. James Gendin erected a house at Eleven-Mile Run in 1762, and in the same year William Shearer and Harry Shrihack made improvements in this region by order of Col. Bouquet. From the application of James Bard, in 1769, we learn that a house had been erected at a place called Somerset, five or six miles from Fort Pitt, as early as 1760, and in 1762, Casper Toup, by permission of Col. Bouquet, improved land four miles from the present site of Pittsburgh. Among the early settlers of this territory, then claimed by Virginia, was Col. Crawford, who was the intimate friend of Washington. He settled in the valley of the Youghiogheny, on the river, precisely at the place where Braddock’s army had crossed. Whether Col. Crawford fixed upon this location by design or accident is not known; but it was undoubtedly an excellent selection. It was then on the only road leading to this remote section of the country, and he was thus enabled to see all travelers visiting the Indian country; and being an intelligent and hospitable man, his house was made the stopping-place of the weary pioneer. Gen. Washington was frequently an inmate of his humble dwelling during his frequent visits to the western country, and more than once refers to him in his journal. A considerable number of emigrants from Maryland, about 1768, settled on the Youghiogheny, Monongahela, and its several tributaries, and the settlements in Western Pennsylvania, Western Maryland, and Western Virginia began to attract attention. The forts at Redstone, now Brownsville, and at Wheeling were among the first and most conspicuous; the route the settlers pursued was the scarce practicable path called ‘Braddock’s trail,’ which they traveled with no better means of conveyance for their furniture and provisions than that offered by pack-horses. The great object of most of these persons was to obtain possession of the lands, the title to which cost little more than the payment of office fees. The Indian title was not then considered by individuals as presenting any obstacle, and Virginia (whose charter, it was then supposed, embraced this region of country) confirmed the titles of settlers with no other restrictions than such as were necessary to prevent the confusion of interfering claims. At an early period that colony appointed three commissioners to give certificates of settlement rights, which were sent with the surveyor’s plot to the land-office, where they remained six months to await the interposition of caveats by other claimants to the same land. If none were offered within that period the patents were issued. There was an inferior kind of title invented by those rude borderers called a ‘tomahawk-right,’ which was made by deadening a few trees near a spring, and marking others by cutting in the bark, by the person who thus took possession. This ceremony conferred no legal property, but was respected by the settlers as establishing a priority of claim with which it was thought discreditable to interfere. These rights were, therefore, often bought and sold, because those who wished to secure favorite tracts of land chose to buy the tomahawk improvements rather than quarrel with those who had made them.”

To the German immigrants from Pennsylvania and the Palatinate, however, must be ascribed the largest share of honor in that wonderful development of the fertile plains and valleys of Western Maryland which has added so much to the general growth and prosperity of the State. As in other portions of the country so in Western Maryland, the German element has played an important part from the earliest period of colonial history, and at the present day, woven in by time with the general prosperity and progress, forms one of the chief constituents of the industrial, agricultural, moral, and intellectual well-being of Western Maryland, as well as of other portions of the State. Even before Penn and his followers made their settlement upon the Delaware, certain German Protestants, in quest of a refuge from religious oppression, had come into the province and had been hospitably received.

Among the earliest German emigrants was Augustine Herman (Harman, Heermans, as the name is variously spelled), a Bohemian surveyor, a man of culture and influence, a native of Prague, and very probably a sectary of the school of Huss or Jerome. In early youth he had left his native country and settled in Holland. From Holland, in 1647, he emigrated to New York as clerk to John and Charles Gabry, of Amsterdam. He acquiesced himself so well that he soon got to be a member of the Dutch Council, and in that capacity was sent to St. Mary’s to confer with the provincial Governor in regard to the claims of Maryland to the territory on the Delaware Bay.

After this mission had been completed he removed to Maryland, and in 1663 took up land on Elk River, now Cecil, but then Baltimore County, where “Bohemia Manor” and “Port Herman” still preserve his memory. Various reasons have been assigned for his removal from New York, but the true cause seems to have been some disagreement with Governor Stuyvesant. At all events, it is certain that about 1661 he proposed to Lord Baltimore to make an exact map of the country, if his lordship would be pleased to grant him “a certain tract of land as an inheritance to his posterity, and the privileges of a manor.” This offer was accepted, and the land patented to him Oct. 12, 1663, under the name of Bohemia, or Bohemia Manor. By subsequent additions it was increased to nearly twenty thousand acres, lying in both Maryland and Delaware and just east of Elk River. In 1666 he and his family were naturalized by an act of Assembly, the first act of the kind passed in the colonies. In 1670 his map was published, and copies of it are still extant. It is adorned with his portrait, representing a gentleman of about fifty years of age, of rather saturnine but not unpleasing features, set off by the full-bottomed periwig of Charles the Second’s time, the whole surrounded by the legend, “Augustine Hermann, Bohemensis.”

Herman seems to have taken up his residence on what is now known as the Ferry farm, near the present Bayard mansion, but no trace of his house now remains, nor can even its site be definitely located. It cannot have been far from the stream, however, for Dankers and Suyter tell us in their journal that the screeching of the geese and other wild fowl in the Bohemia River, before the door, greatly disturbed their rest at night. Herman probably resided on the manor for more than twenty years, during which time, it is said, he once rode to New York on the back of his favorite horse to reclaim his long-neglected possessions there. He found his land occupied by “squat- ters,” who not only declined to vacate it, but imprisoned him in their round-house, which was built with high steps for better protection against the Indians. He was sentenced to death, but “in a short time before he was to be executed he feigned himself to be de- ranged in mind, and requested that his horse should be brought to him in prison.” The horse ascended the steps without difficulty, much to the astonishment of Herman’s captors, and was mounted by his master, who, while pretending to be performing military exercises, suddenly bolted through one of the large windows that was some fifteen feet above ground, leaped down, swam the North River, ran his horse through Jersey, and alighted on the bank of the Delaware opposite New Castle, and thus made his escape from death and the Dutch.” This daring feat, tradition says, he had transferred to canvas, himself represented as standing by the side of his charger, from whose nostrils the blood was flowing. It is said a copy of this painting still exists. Herman never suffered this horse to be used afterwards, and when he died had him buried, and honored his grave with a tombstone.

Herman’s death is said to have occurred in 1686; but two years before, on Aug. 11, 1684, he conveyed by deed to Peter Suyter alias Vorsman, Jasper Daukeats alias Schilders, of Friesland, Petrus Bayard, of New York, and John Moll and Arnoldus de la Grange, of Delaware, jointly, three thousand seven hundred and fifty acres of land, bounded on the west by Long Creek, north by the great cart-road leading to Reedy Island, in the Delaware, east by the Appoquinimink path leading from the great cart-road to the head of Bohemia River, and south by Bohemia River, known afterwards as the Labadie tract. The whole of this tract, with the exception of a few acres, lay in Cecil County, the line between Delaware and Mary-land crossing its eastern extremity just before reaching the Bohemia River. The grantees in the deed from Herman were members of a religious community at the small village of Wieward, in Friesland. The sect was founded by and named after Jean de Labadie, a French enthusiast, who had left the order of the Jesuits and founded this new “Evangelical Church” in Amsterdam about 1669. Owing to the opposition met with in Amsterdam, De Labadie and his adherents removed to Erfurt, from whence they removed in 1672 to Altona, where De Labadie died. From this point they were compelled to remove to Wieward, in Friesland, and at length, in the hope of securing a safe and permanent retreat, they turned their eyes towards America. Jasper Dankers and Peter Suyter, two of the leading members of the community, were sent in advance on a tour of observation, and to select a proper location for a colony, and being attracted by the situation and advantages of Bohemia Manor, they resolved to settle there, and accordingly obtained from Herman the tract of land which has been mentioned. A company of men and women, including several families, shortly afterwards arrived from Wieward, and were joined “by a few persons from New York. Suyter declared himself bishop, and sent to Friesland for his wife, whom he installed as a kind of abbess over the female portion of the establishment. The members belonging to this community did not at any time greatly exceed one hundred men, women, and children. They had all their possessions in common, so that none could claim any more right than another to any part of the property. They worked at different employments in the house or on the land, such as the manufacture of linen, the cultivation of corn, tobacco, flax, and hemp. Their meals were eaten in silence, the men by themselves and the women by themselves, the former with their heads covered, except during a short season spent in inaudible thanksgiving. They slept in the same or adjoining buildings, but in different rooms, which were not accessible to each other. Their dress was plain and simple. Gold and silver ornaments, jewelry, carpets, lace, and other fancy work were prohibited. But the seeds of dissolution were developing themselves, and as early as 1698, Peter Slayter, who had become sole proprietor of the lands of the colony, resolved to divide the property. He conveyed three of the four necks of land embraced in the tract to Herman van Berkels, Nicholas de la Montaigne, Peter de Konings, Derrick Koeckman, John Moll, Jr., Hendrick Slayter, and Samuel Bayard, and retaining one of the necks himself, became a wealthy man in his own right. "In the year 1722 Slayter died, and the Labadist colony expired about the same time.

It was, however, in the western portion of the state that the first considerable settlement of German refugees was made. In common with the neighboring province of Pennsylvania, Maryland was the favorite goal of the Protestants, who were forced to flee from the relentless persecution which devastated some of the fairest portions of France and Germany in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. During the reign of Queen Anne many of these exiles were attracted to Pennsylvania, not only by the promise of religious toleration, but probably through the kindly intervention of the queen herself, who displayed so keen solicitude for them, and contributed so liberally to their relief, as to provoke the criticism that she was encouraging pauperism. The reproach was most unjust, for these exiles were skilful artisans, who afterwards contributed immensely to the development of British manufactures in the colonies. At first the German immigrants settled in the vicinity of Philadelphia, but gradually advancing westward, soon spread over the southern counties of Pennsylvania, and crossed the border into Maryland. The enviable reputation which the latter province had enjoyed, by reason of its toleration of different religious creeds, had been seriously marred by the proscription of the Catholics, which followed the Puritan revolution, and which was revived under William and Mary, Anne, and the first two Georges. In the reign of William, on the other hand, the Dissenters had enjoyed especial favor and immunity, and under George

II. we find Methodism making rapid headway in Maryland, though here and there antagonized and threatened by occasional outbursts of fanaticism on the part of individual members of the Established Church. To this, however, must be opposed the fact that Methodist ministers were permitted, and even invited, to preach in the Anglican (Episcopal) churches in various portions of the province. To the special toleration thus accorded Protestants, together with their remoteness from the centres of clerical and legislative authority, the German settlers in Western Maryland doubtless owed the immunity from persecution which they enjoyed from the first. Doubtless, too, the authorities of the province were wise enough to see that it would be impolitic in the highest degree to molest the brave pioneers, whose axes were constantly ringing in the western forests, clearing through the hitherto untrodden wilderness a path to the virgin plains of the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys. Whatever the reason, the German settlements were permitted to worship God in their own fashion without let or hindrance, and new sects sprang up among them on every side. The Germans who had settled chiefly in the vicinity of Lancaster and York drifted westward and southward, dotting the fertile country with smiling and thrifty settlements, and as early as 1748 had taken possession of many valuable tracts along the Monocacy River and the Catoctin Creek. They were also very numerous in the northern part of Frederick County, and in a few years had established settlements in various portions of what are now the election districts of Hauver's, Mechanicstown, Catoctin, Creagerstown, and Emmitsburg. In 1735 the Schleys, with about one hundred families from Germany, Switzerland, and France, established themselves on the Monocacy, the first house in Frederick Town being erected by Thomas Schley. The younger members and descendants of these families were the pioneer Germans in Baltimore, and contributed more largely towards building up that city than any other nationality.

In the words of one of Baltimore's representative German citizens, it may be said that "Germans were among the founders of this city, Germans sat at her cradle, German merchants helped to develop her commerce, German industry contributed to establish her renown abroad, and the thrift and enterprise of our German mechanics have done much to secure for Baltimore the prosperity she enjoys. I can assert with pride to-day that German blood flows in the veins of every second resident of our city, that every third name in our city directory is of German origin, that every fourth Baltimorean is descended in one way or the other from Germans, that every fifth one understands German, and every sixth can read and speak that language."

Among the Germans who removed to Baltimore from Frederick County were the Schleys, Steiners, Shrivers, Slingluffs, Warners, Pipers, Raborgs, Rineharts, Lurmans, Miltenbergers, Yeisers, Littigs, Mayers, Ramsburgs, Hoffmans, Mantzes, Baltzells, Gists, Baers, Harbaugh, Strickers, and Amelungs. Peter Hoffman, founder of the well-known Hoffman family of Baltimore, came from Frankfort-on-the-Main and settled in Frederick, whence he removed to Baltimore in 1778 and established a flourishing dry-goods trade. Peter Hoffman was a commissioner of Baltimore Town along with Engelhardt Yeiser and George Lindeenberg, and was one of the founders of Calvert Street Spring, at one time a fashionable resort. About the time of Hoffman’s arrival there was an important accession of young and enterprising immigrants, who came direct from different portions of Germany, and from the towns of Hamburg, Bremen, Frankfurt, etc. They were attracted by the fact that the Germans of Frederick imported largely of German goods by way of London. Baltimore was the port for the arrival and shipment of goods to and from the rich and flourishing settlements of Western Maryland, Southern Pennsylvania, and the Cumberland Valley, and many of the immigrants accordingly located there, while others decided to push their fortunes in the interior towns of the province.

This was in 1774, on the eve of the Revolution, and we find the well-known names of Frick, Diffenderfer, Raborg, Leybold, Schultze, Heide, and Schaeffer as among Germans who came to us from Europe just as the war broke out. The part which our German fellow-citizens took in that great struggle was manly, patriotic, distinguished. They furnished a great many soldiers, and the Baltimore, Frederick, and Lancaster Germans fought face to face with the Hessians on many a bloody field. The majority of the battalions of sharpshooters which Daniel Morgan and Michael Cresap took to Cambridge as soon as Bunker Hill was fought were recruited from among the Germans in Frederick, Conococheague, and the Valley of Virginia. Maryland had nearly a full German regiment in service during the whole war, and Western Maryland always had one company and sometimes two in this regiment. These brave fellows were among the steadiest and sternest fighters under the banners of Smallwood and Gist. Among the officers of the Second Brigade we find the names of Lieut.-Col. George Stricker, Maj. Ludwig Weltner, Captains George Hubley, William Keiser, Henry Fisher, Philip Graybill, Peter Boyer, Charles Baltzell, William Keeperts, Bernard Hubley, Michael Boyer, and Martin Schugarit, and Lieuts. Christian Meyers, Adam Hoops, Jacob Reybold, Jacob Gomath, George Lora, Jacob Kotz, Samuel Gerock, Adam Smith, William Ritter.

But the Germans who did not draw the sword did the civil state quite as valuable and indispensable service. In Baltimore, John Deaver, Barnet Eichelberger, Isaac Giest, and George Lindeenberg were on the first Committee of Safety and Correspondence; Isaac Giest and Isaac Van Bibber were on the committee to watch vessels in port, and both these gentlemen were particularly active in keeping up the patriot spirit and in making it “hot” for the Tories. Giest and Loudenslager were appointed to build the water-battery on Whetstone Point, now Fort MeHenry, and Peter Hoffman, Anthony Houck, and George Warner, new-come Germans, were full of zeal. Jacob Fite lent his new building, southwest corner of Sharpe and Baltimore Streets, thence called Congress Hall, to the Continental Congress in 1776, and some of his descendants still own the property. In the militia home guards of Baltimore we find George Lindeenberg, Isaac Giest, and Henry Schaeffer among the commissioned officers.

In 1782 Baltimore had a sort of municipal government set up, the first she had ever enjoyed, and of the seven commissioners composing the board, three—Engelhardt Yeiser, George Lindeenberg, and Peter Hoffman—were Germans. In this year another German, Gabriel Vanhorn, established a stage-line to Philadelphia.

After the war everybody went to work with intense energy, immigration flowed in in a full tide, and the State advanced on wheels. There was a most valuable influx of young merchants from the towns in the Hanseatic Band and the other commercial cities of Germany and Holland. We had flour and tobacco to export in immense quantities, and Maryland tobacco was just what the Germans wanted. We had potash, also, roasted bark, raw-hides, hemp, flax, lumber, hard-wood, etc., to export. It was at this time that our intimacy with Bremen and Bremen merchants, so long and so honorably sustained, was first established. A great number of merchants came in from other parts of the country, among whom we find the names of Van Wyck, Stouffer, Slabey, Kimmell, Starck, Solomon, etc.; while among those who came from Bremen and Hamburg, etc., occur the honored names of Brune, Brantz, Schroeder, Von Kapff, See-kamp, Zollieoffe, Leib, and Konig. Among the justices of the peace of the day are named the leading Germans who took part during the Revolution.

It is a significant fact that nearly all the German immigrants who came into Maryland soon established themselves in permanent homes, and in almost every instance took rank at once as thrifty and enterprising citizens. The greater number were skilled in agriculture, but there was a large percentage of first-rate mechanics, harness-makers and saddlers, weavers, tailors, tanners, shoemakers, paper-makers, butchers, watchmakers, bakers, smiths, iron-workers, etc. It is a generally recognized fact that the Protestant population of France and Germany supplied the best class of workmen in the various branches of manufacture. Thus we are told by the historian Lecky that the twenty thousand Frenchmen, attracted to Brandenburg by the liberal encouragement of the elector at the time of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, laid the foundation of the prosperity of Berlin and of most of the manufactories of Prussia. The same is true in a greater or less degree of all the Protestant refugees, and it would be difficult to overestimate the industrial value to our own country of the successive immigrations of white communities from the different German states.

At first the immigration of Germans into Pennsylvania was confined to the sectaries, the Quietists, and the other religious denominations who, on account of their extreme views, found it difficult to get along with their more conservative Protestant brethren. The Labadists, for instance, were followed by the Mennonites, who took up much land and formed many communities in York, Lancaster, and Adams Counties; by the Seventh-day Baptists, who established their monastery at Ephrata; by the Voetists and the Coccelians; and by the hundred other sects of the day. But after these sectaries came the deluge. The Germans had found out that there was a land of peace on the other side of the Atlantic, and they knew by sad experience that their own country was a land of war. The peace of Westphalia had turned out to be only a hollow truce after all, as far as Protestant Germany was concerned. A man was not only deprived, practically, of the enjoyment of his own religion, he was robbed also incessantly of the fruits of his labor. No matter how foreboded, how industrious he might be, he could not certainly lay aside anything against a rainy day. This was a state of things which he naturally rebelled against, and emigration afforded him a relief.

The religious fanaticism of Louis XIV., which so long desolated the Low Countries, and which deprived that monarch (when he revoked the Edict of Nantes) of half a million of his best and most thrifty subjects, broke in upon the Palatinate in the shape of the most desolating war of which we have any authentic record in history. What is told of Tamerlane was practiced by the "enlightened" monarch and his able but savage lieutenants. Turenne, Saxe, Vendome, Villars, Villeroi, Taillard, Marsin, Berwick, Noailles, Luxembourg, each in his turn helped to desolate the Palatinate and to contribute immigrants to the colonies. The homeless and ravished peoples of Germany sought and found homes in the new land of peace and plenty. At one time the immigration of German Palatines into Pennsylvania and Maryland was in excess of all other immigration.

In "A Memorial of the Case of the German Emigrants settled in the British Colonies of Pennsylvania and the Back Parts of Maryland, Virginia, etc.," published in London in 1754, it is stated that

"by the most authentic accounts, for many years last past very large numbers of Germans have transported themselves into these British provinces of North America; the greatest part of them from Switzerland and the Palatinate, many from Wurtemberg, Swabia, Julien, and Berg, and other places along the Rhine, and some few lately from the lower Saxony; above thirty thousand of them within the last ten years, and in one single year, 1736, more than ten thousand.

"The causes of their removal from their native countries were various. Some of them fled from the severe persecutions they were exposed to at home on account of their being Protestants; others from the oppressions of civil tyranny and attracted by the pleasing hopes of liberty under the milder influence of the British government; others were drawn by the solicitations of their countrymen, who had settled there before them; but for the greatest part by the prospect they had of relieving themselves under their deep poverty, and providing better for themselves and their families, in the provinces to which they respectively retired. In the single colony of Pennsylvania the inhabitants, exclusive of the Indian natives, are reckoned to be about one hundred and ninety thousand; amongst these are above one hundred thousand Germans, or High Dutch, of whom about thirty thousand are of the Protestant Reformed religion, near as many of them Lutherans, above twelve thousand papists, and the rest of them Baptists, Hebrews, and of various other sects and denominations."

As a rule, the Germans brought their own means with them, but sooner than not inmigrate they were glad to indenture themselves as redemptioners. Many hundreds thus came into Maryland, many thousands into Pennsylvania. They came chiefly from the harried Palatinate, but also from Alsace, Snabia, Saxony, and Switzerland. There were Wittenbergers, and people from Darmstadt, Nassau, Hesse, Eisenberg, Franconia, Hamburg, Mannheim,—all classed as "Palatines." They brought the Heidelberg Catechism with them, even if they brought nothing else, and many of them were so plundered in transitu that they were not able to bring anything else.

The number of these immigrants was prodigious. In 1731 there were fifteen thousand members of the German Reformed Church in Pennsylvania from the Palatinate. Rupp and Kapp note, in order to show the rapid rate of the depopulation of these provinces on the Rhine, that in 1709, from the middle of April to the middle of July, there arrived in London eleven thousand two hundred and ninety-four German Protestants, males and females, who were vine-dressers and husbandmen, bakers, masons, carpenters, shoemakers, tailors, butchers, millers, tanners, weavers, locksmiths, barbers, cooper, sadlers, lime-burners, glass-blowers, hatters, brick-makers, smiths, potters, turners, etc.

More than one-half of these came to this country. In 1790 there were one hundred and forty-five thousand Germans in Pennsylvania, the total population not exceeding four hundred and thirty-five thousand. These included the sectaries above referred to, the Palatines, the Dunkers, and the Hessian soldiers who preferred not to be exchanged after the Revolution. These German hulfs truppen, or subsidiary troops, were bought in Brunswick, Hanau, Anspach, Wadack, Anhalt, Hesse-Cassel, Hesse-Darmstadt, Brandenburg, etc., in large numbers. They cost George III. eight million one hundred thousand dollars, and eleven thousand of them died or perished in battle.

A great many of these people settled in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and the Valley of Virginia after the war. The other immigrants were German Calvinists, Moravians, Schwenckfelders, Omishites, Dunkers, Menonites, and Separatists (or Seventh-day Baptists).

Up to about 1760 the Germans in Maryland were supplied from these plentiful sources. A good many Palatines came in by direct consignment to Chesapeake Bay, but the great majority of the Germans drifted down from York and Lancaster. They came into Baltimore County in small parties, but they settled in Frederick County and the Valley of Virginia by the wholesale. It was the custom in Germany for all young mechanics to make a "peregrination" of one or more years in order to perfect themselves in their trades, and this and other regulations of the trade-guilds produced a class of workmen of a very superior character. But this must be apparent at once when we reflect that the German immigrants in many cases reached our shores with little or nothing, and often so destitute that, as previously stated, they were forced to bind themselves and their children to masters for a term of years in order to obtain the money to pay for the passage over. "Many who at home," says Rupp, the Pennsylvania historian, "had owned property and converted it into money, were robbed in transitu by ship-owners, importers, sea-captains, and Neulandener. The emigrants' chests, with their clothes and sometimes their money, were put on other vessels or ships and left behind. These chests were rifled of their contents. The German immigrants thus treated, on their arrival at Philadelphia, were obliged to submit to being sold as Loskaeuflinge Redemptioners, they and their children, to pay the passage-money. In not a few cases persons who still had means were held responsible to pay the passage for the poorer. This was the practice for more than fifty years. In this way persons of substance were necessitated, and did become very frequently common beggars." According to Dr. Benjamin Rush, in his "Manners of the Germans of Pennsylvania," "a few pieces of silver coin or gold, a chest with clothes, a Bible and Prayer or Hymn Book, constituted the whole stock of most of them. . . A clergyman always accompanied them when they came in large bodies." Dr. Rush also gives a vivid description of the customs and characteristics of the early Germans of Pennsylvania, which answers for the Germans of Western Maryland. "The Germans," he says, "taken as a body, especially as farmers, are not only industrious and frugal, but skillful cultivators of the earth." "The German's farm," says Rupp, "was easily distinguished from those of others by good fences, the extent of orchard, the fertility of soil, the productiveness of the fields, the luxuriance of the meadows." They always provided the best accommodations for their horses and cattle, and paid special attention to the cultivation of grass. They were great economists in the use of wood, and almost invariably lived frugally with respect to diet, furniture, and apparel. They seldom permitted themselves to get in debt, and saved considerable sums by the cultivation of a variety of vegetables, which enabled them to be sparing consumers of meat. The work on the farm was done almost exclusively by the family, the women often assisting the men.

The German mechanic possessed the same characteristics of frugality and industry, and his first object was to save up sufficient money to purchase a home of his own. As merchants the early Germans of Pennsylvania and Maryland were also very successful. In fact, whatever they essayed to do was done thoroughly and well. It was one of their distinguishing traits to settle as near one another as possible, not only from a kindly fellow-feeling, but in order that they might enjoy the advantages of proximity to a common place of worship and to a school-house. "Their churches," says Dr. Rush, "are . . . large, and furnished in many places with organs. The clergy belonging to these churches have moderate salaries, but they are punctually and justly paid. . .

The Lutherans and Presbyterians (German Reformed) live in great harmony with each other, insomuch that they preach in each other's churches, and in some instances unite in building a church, in which they both worship at different times." Dr. Rush sums up the general character of the German population in the following pregnant sentence: "If it were possible to determine the amount of all the property brought into Pennsylvania by the present German inhabitants of the State and their ancestors, and then compare it with the present amount of their property, the contrast would form such a monument of human industry and economy as has seldom been contemplated in any age or country." Among the German sects the Mennonites, Moravians, German Brethren, German Seventh-day Baptists, and Schwonfelders held war to be unchristian and unreasonable, and it is worthy of note that the German Friends of Germantown, as early as 1688 (ten years before the passage of the act by the British Parliament for the encouragement of the slave-trade, by throwing it open to all British subjects and exempting cargoes of negroes from the African military tax), addressed the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, protesting against buying, selling, and holding men in slavery, and declaring it in their opinion an act irreconcilable with the precepts of the Christian religion.

Of these denominations, the first to emigrate to America appears to have been the Mennonites. This sect had been persecuted in Switzerland, and forced to leave that country. Some had fled to Alsace, above Strasburg, and others to Holland. A number of those about Strasburg, with other Germans, attracted by the toleration extended to all religions by William Penn, set out for Pennsylvania in 1683, and on reaching the colony on the Delaware located themselves at what is now the suburb of Germantown. The greater part were naturalized in 1709. A few years previous the people of Heidelberg and vicinity had just been delivered from the persecutions of the French army, which had twice destroyed the town, only to be made the victims of still more cruel oppression by the Catholic Elector Palatine, their prince. To the number of six thousand they fled to England, drawn thither by a proclamation of Queen Anne offering them protection and aid. Many more had determined to seek a refuge in America. Christopher de Graffenried and Louis Michelle were sent out by the canton of Berne, with instructions to inspect the unoccupied districts of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Carolina. Michelle had previously visited America, and is believed to have built a fort not far from Conojeahers, "many miles above Conestoga," in Pennsylvania. In 1709 the refugees from Berne sailed for America. They landed in New York, Pennsylvania, and North Carolina. In the same year a company of Mennonites left Strasburg and sailed for America. Those who emigrated to Pennsylvania came from the cantons of Zurich, Berne, and Schaffhausen, in Switzerland. In their new homes they not only enjoyed toleration, but practiced it towards other denominations, resembling in this respect the early colonists of Maryland and the followers of Roger Williams and of Penn. Before leaving Europe they had made an agreement with William Penn for lands to be taken up. Several families from the Palatinate emigrated to America and settled in Lancaster County in 1709. In the same year a Swiss company procured a grant of ten thousand acres on the north side of Pequa Creek, in Lancaster County, and settled there. Among the settlers at Pequa we find the familiar Maryland names of Fouts, or Foutz, Zimmerman, Funk, Hoover, Stoutler, Boyer, Hostater, Darby, Miller, Mayer, Witman, Kauffman, Faber, Boehm, Kaufmann, Baughman, Steiner, and Beatty. So well pleased were the settlers with the country around them that they decided to send one of their number back to Europe to induce others of their denomination to share their fortunes. Martin Kendig was selected, and embarked at Philadelphia. Returning from Europe, he brought with him a number of immigrants, who joined the colony at Pequa. The settlers were surrounded by Indians, but were not molested, and "mingled with them in fishing and hunting." So successful was the little colony (numbering some thirty families in all) that German and French refugees were attracted to it. Among these were the Ferees, Isaac Lefevre, and the Slaymakers, who had been driven by religious persecution from the Palatinate. The mother of Hon. Abraham Schriver, of Frederick County, was a Feree. Her name was Rebecca, and she was the wife of David Schriver. The name is variously spelled, in the early colonial records, Fereee, Ferrie, Fiere, Fiere, and Firre. In the wake of these two companies came numerous bands of German, Swiss, Dutch, and Huguenot immigrants, who scattered themselves over Southern Pennsylvania and crossed the border into Maryland. During 1727 twelve hundred and forty Palatines arrived in Pennsylvania. In the two years that followed, however, the number of German immigrants was greatly diminished.

Among those who came over about this time was Michael Dieffenderfer, father of David Dieffenderfer, and one of the earlier settlers of Lancaster. David Dieffenderfer served in the Revolutionary army under Col. George Stricker, father of Gen. Stricker, who was prominent in the defense of Baltimore in the war of 1812. In 1725 or 1726 was commenced the Dunker or Tunker settlement of Ephrata, in Lancaster County. The Dunkers were seeders from the German Baptists, and one of their distinctively tenets was the practice of baptism by immersion. In 1725 a number of them, under the leadership of Conrad Beissel, separated from the others owing to their conviction that there was an error among the Dunkers in the observance of the Sabbath, and that the seventh day was the true Sabbath. In 1732 a monastic society was established by Beissel and his followers, and the habit of the Capuchins, or White Friars, was adopted by both brethren and sisters. In 1740 there were thirty-six single brethren and thirty-five sisters in the cloister, and the community, including members living in the vicinity, numbered nearly three hundred. A school was established, which attracted general attention, and which numbered among its pupils young men from Philadelphia and Baltimore. The sect was known to the outside world as the Seventh-day Baptists. George Thomas, an Antigua planter, who was appointed Governor of Pennsylvania in 1737, visited Ephrata in 1741. He was accompanied by a retinue of twenty horses and a large number of distinguished gentlemen from Maryland and Virginia; they were all honorably received by the brethren. Among the descendants of members of the society are the Urners, the Negleys, the Funk, the Hoechs, the Weisers, and the Gorgases.

Among the Germans and other foreigners who settled in Lancaster County prior to 1735 were the Hoffmans, Bezeros, Byerlys, Owens, Emmets, Snevelys, Newcomers, Longneckers, Stakes, Zieglers, Snyder, Koenigs, Graafs, Herseys, Templemans, Fultons, Meixells, Baughmans, Haue ses, Lightners, McKimms, Boyds, Alexanders, Lloyds, Buchanans, McClures, and Hugheses. All these names have long been familiar in different portions of Maryland.

About 1732 and subsequently the people living along the border in Pennsylvania and Maryland became involved in a serious quarrel, arising out of the boundary difficulties. The first difficulty was occasioned by the arrest of Daniel and William Lowe, two Marylanders who had settled in Pennsylvania, by a Pennsylvania constable for killing a horse which had strayed to their farm. Capt. Thomas Cresap, the famous Indian-fighter and scout of Frederick, pursued the constable and attempted to rescue the prisoners. His party wounded John Hart, one of the constable's assistants, but were forced to desist, and the Lowes were carried safely to Lancaster. This affair was followed by more "unhappy frays," which finally culminated in a formidable raid of the Lancaster people against Cresap and other Marylanders. According to Rupp, Cresap's party were beaten and drove out of Pennsylvania. At this time Lancaster County embraced the present boundaries of York, Adams, Franklin, Cumberland, and Perry Counties, or, in other words, the whole of Pennsylvania bordering on Western Maryland. The boundary between Maryland and Pennsylvania had not been accurately defined as yet, and the absence of such definition gave rise to serious disputes, which are treated more at length in this work in the chapter on "Boundaries." A large number of Germans had settled in what is now York County, Pa., under Pennsylvania titles, but in order to avoid paying taxes imposed by that province they accepted titles from Lord Baltimore, but subsequently becoming satisfied "that adhesion to him might ultimately prejudice their interests, they formally renounced their allegiance and sought protection from Pennsylvania." The Maryland settlers across the border were greatly incensed at this and determined to eject the "miscreants" from their holdings. "The German settlers," says Rupp, "were harassed perpetually, in many instances driven from their farms, and in others deterred from any attempt to plant or improve."

In 1738 a number of Swiss and Germans in Lancaster County were naturalized upon their own application. Among them were Michael and William Albert, Jacob Bare, or Baer, Casper Stump, George Klein, or Klince, and Frederick Eigelberger, or Eichelberger.

The immunity of the German settlers both in Pennsylvania and Maryland from Indian attacks was sensibly increased by the treaty with the Six Nations, which was signed by representatives of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia at Lancaster in 1745. The Six Nations, or Iroquois, engaged to prevent the French and Indians from marching through their country to attack the English settlements, and to give the earliest information of the enemy's design. They also surrendered their titles to the lands settled by the English in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia. Six hundred pounds were paid by the three colonies in consideration of the concessions made by the Indians. This treaty did not, however, secure the settlers from the attacks of Indians who had been wronged or defrauded by traders and unprincipled men; and while free from organized incursions up to the period of the French and Indian war, they were compelled to be continually on the alert, especially in the more exposed and isolated frontier settlements. They found ample time, however, to thoroughly cultivate the rich virgin soil on which they had settled, and to develop the manufacturing industries which are mentioned elsewhere as those most successfully undertaken by the German colonists in Maryland. The same distinguishing characteristics of the Germans in Pennsylvania, as noted by Dr. Rush and Mr. Rupp, were conspicuous among the Maryland Palatines. Like their neighbors and brethren on the border, they preferred to build the most modest dwellings in order that they might erect commodious and comfortable quarters for their stock. Usually the settler in the Monocacy region was content to live in a log cabin, the spaces between the logs being closed up with mortar or clay, and the chimney built outside the structure and of the rudest materials. "The favorite style of building of the stout Germans and Palatines of Frederick County and Western Maryland contemplated a house that was seldom more than one story high, but had large garret-rooms and a deep cellar well filled. The chimney, an immense stack, was in the middle of the building to accommodate the kitchen, which was also the living-room, and had a great fireplace, furnished with pot-hooks and cranes of massive construction. . . . The bedrooms in these houses were not very elaborately furnished, . . . but the housekeeping was always neat and clean, and the harder liberally supplied." The German farmers were prudent, far-seeing men. They never spent more than they could afford, and while they lived in comfort, were careful not to indulge in excess of any kind. The result was that their lands and cattle soon waxed fat, and they were enabled to transmit to their children the heritage not only of material prosperity, but of an unblemished reputation for honest dealing and patient industry and thrift. Their descendants at the present day are scattered all over Western Maryland, and the old methods, except where they have had to be discarded in obedience to the necessities of modern improvement, are still adhered to with the best results. To the German housewife and maiden of these early times is due a large portion of the credit attaching to the immigrants as a class, for the women of the family did not hesitate to lend a hand in the field, and were always busy within-doors, either at the spinning-wheel or in the dairy, or at the kitchen fire. The productive capacity of the Germans was therefore immense, and as they were economical and cautious, though seldom niggardly where liberal expenditure was advisable or when their benevolent impulses were appealed to, it was inevitable that they should outstrip the rest of the province in prosperity.

Of the religious denominations among the Germans, the Lutherans and German Reformed were the most numerous and influential, and, as in Pennsylvania, these two bodies fraternized cordially, and while maintaining their distinctive principles and tenets, worshiped in meeting-houses erected by the joint efforts of both congregations. Besides these there were the Moravians and the other sects already enumerated. As a rule, the members of all these denominations were strict in the observance of their religious duties, and to this fact doubtless is to ascribed in great part the preservation of the virtues of morality, temperance, and industry which have always distinguished the population of Western Maryland, and which have contributed so much to its prosperity.

"Frederick," says one of its distinguished citizens, "was laid out by an English gentleman, but its lots and the rich farms immediately surrounding it were soon taken up by a host of honest, thrifty, laborious German emigrants, who had fled from the oppressive restrictions of their own fatherland to seek a refuge here for themselves and their families, and whose names underwent many a distortion and mutilation at the hands of the English representatives of the Lord Proprietor, as they laboriously wrote them down from sound upon the pages of our early records. The German was spoken one hundred years ago more frequently and frequently upon the streets of Frederick than the English, two of their congregations had their service entirely in that language, the children were instructed in both languages in the schools, the style of houses and barns introduced was that of German rather than of English origin, and, in various degrees of modification, had so held its place here that strangers who have had the opportunity of European travel invariably notice how much Frederick resembles a continental town. But these emigrants brought with them more than their mother-tongue and familiar forms of worship and architecture. They brought also German thrift, industry, and honesty, with ardent love of home—wherever it might be, whether native or adopted,—they brought laborious habits, virtuous lives, truthful tongues, unflinching courage, and an intense longing to do their duty to their families, the community, and the State. And of such ancestry a large number of this assembly may proudly boast,—a nobility of origin worth more than that which is based upon deeds of violence and unrestrained lawlessness. Says a German traveler who visited this place, May 6, 1747, of one of its congregations, 'It appears to me to be one of the purest in the whole country, and one in which I have found the most traces of the true fear of God.'"

1 Address by Dr. Lewis H. Steiner at the Frederick Centennial Celebration, June 28, 1876.
In the immense and constant stream of emigration which the Old World is pouring into America, no element forms a larger or more important part than that which is contributed by the German race. In all the splendid empire of territory which stretches from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the Canadian border to the remotest southern limits, there is not a city, a town, or hamlet of the United States which has not been vitalized by the energizing and quickening influences of German enterprise and industry. The brief and imperfect recital that has been given of the part which the German population of Western Maryland have borne in the development of this rich and important section of the State, is but a poor tribute to the all-pervading influence which they have exercised in every period of its history and at every stage of its progress. In the limited space of a notice like the present it is impossible to do justice to a theme so rich in facts as well as suggestions, and the writer must dismiss this portion of the subject with the hope that the time may not be far distant when some more efficient chronicler will record at the length and with the careful detail they deserve the history and achievements of the German population of Western Maryland. But until that task has been accomplished they can at least draw some measure of satisfaction from the reflection that their history has already been written in enduring characters in the progress and prosperity of the section in which they live.

While the large majority of the early settlers in Western Maryland were of German origin, other nationalities were not unrepresented. Settlers of English birth or descent had made their way towards the western boundary of the province in small numbers at a comparatively early period, and, like Cresap and other pioneers of the same nationality, soon made themselves prominent in the new section by their bold and adventurous dispositions, and the courage and determination with which they addressed themselves to the difficult and dangerous duties of border life. From Pennsylvania also flowed in a considerable stream of Scotch-Irish emigrants, many of whom passed into the Valley of Virginia, settling along Back Creek, the North Mountain, and Opequon, while many others remained to try their fortunes in Western Maryland.

The ancestors of the Glasses, Allens, Vances, Kerfoots, etc., were among the earliest settlers on the upper waters of the Opequon. The ancestors of the Whites, Russells, etc., settled near the North Mountain. There was a mixture of Irish and Germans on Cedar Creek and its vicinity, the Frys, Newells, Blackburns, and Wilsons being among the number. The proximity of these early Scotch-Irish settlements in the Valley of Virginia to settlers of the same nationality and religious creed in Western Maryland naturally caused more or less communication between them, and by frequent intermarriages families which originally settled on one side of the border have since been transferred to the other, and have now their representatives both in Maryland and Virginia.

By the treaty of Paris, in 1763, a large territory was ceded to England, within which it became necessary to organize colonial governments. For this and other purposes the king, on the 7th of October, 1763, issued a proclamation, by which the colonial governments generally were prohibited from granting any lands lying west of the sources or heads of any of the rivers flowing into the Atlantic from the west and northwest. On the 16th of April, 1764, instructions were issued to the judges of the land-office, setting forth that the proprietary was desirous of having reserved for him ten thousand acres of land in the western part of Frederick County, to be held as a manor; and that he had therefore directed the surveyor of that county not to execute any warrant on any lands lying beyond Fort Cumberland until this reserve had been selected. In the mean time Governor Sharpe thought proper to survey five different tracts of land, aggregating one hundred and twenty-seven thousand six hundred and eighty acres, from which his lordship might make his selection. This general interdict of the crown, and the reserve to the proprietary, each had a tendency to check the progress of settlements in the direction of the debatable territory. In March, 1774, the subject of the reserve on the lands lying westward of Fort Cumberland being brought before the proprietary's board of revenues, it determined that the object of the reserve had been accomplished in the surveys actually made for the proprietary, and therefore took off the reserve. Large grants of land on the reserve were immediately made, and continued to be made until October, 1774, when instructions were received from the proprietary directing the judges of the land-office to suspend all further grants of the reserved lands. Two years later the proprietary's rights and reservations were swept away by the Revolution, and Washington and Montgomery Counties were created.

When the barriers erected by the crown and the proprietary had been removed, new settlements at once began to be made in the territory thus thrown open. Among those who flocked into what had been the forbidden land were a number of the representatives of some of the oldest families of Maryland. Among them were Samuel Ringgold, who patented a tract of twenty thousand acres in Washington County; William Fitz-Hugh, who also purchased a large estate; Nathaniel Rochester, after whom Rochester, N. Y., was called; Charles Carroll, of Duddington; Otho H. Williams, who owned all the land in the neighborhood of the present town of Williamsport; Frishy Tilghman, of the noted Eastern Shore family of that name; and many others whose descendants are now among the most prominent citizens of Western Maryland.

Manners and Customs of the Early Settlers.—Most of the early settlers were industrious, frugal, and temperate people, and especially well qualified for the dangerous and difficult task of subduing the splendid but wild territory upon which they had entered, and of driving out before them the savage tribes which they encountered.

As has been truly said, the task of making new establishments in a remote wilderness in time of profound peace is sufficiently difficult, but when the farmer must be at the same time both a warrior and a hunter, must earn his bread not only with sweat but with blood, and must constantly defend by force what his energy and enterprise have won, his position is one which demands the highest degree of human courage and fortitude. Such was the condition of the first settlers of Western Maryland; making their way into the very heart of a hostile country and in the face of a savage foe, far from friendly succor and exposed to constant danger of Indian attacks, they reared their humble structures in the wild wastes with the pride and confidence of monarchs, and with the rifle in one hand and plowshare in the other,—the weapons of war side by side with the implements of peace,—went forth into forest and field to make good the sovereignty which they claimed.

Their buildings were generally of the rudest character, but were substantially constructed, and were not without a sort of solid comfort. When after a painful and dangerous journey of weeks, and perhaps months, the emigrant had reached his destination, he selected a spot for his new residence, and calling together his neighbors, if he had any, proceeded at once with its erection. If he were the first settler in the neighborhood, he had to rely upon his own skill and resources, and upon the aid of the male members of his family. But the early emigrants generally traveled in parties, so as to render each other mutual assistance in the tasks and difficulties of their new life, and if there was no one to help them in their forest homes, they were men who could help themselves. The first step in the erection of their dwelling was the felling of trees of proper size and character for the purpose, and while this was being done, and the logs were being hauled or carried to the place selected, the carpenter of the party would be in search of a straight-grained tree for making clapboards for the roof. The boards were split four feet long with a large frow, and as wide as the timber would allow, and were used without planing. While this work was in progress others were employed in getting puncheons for the floor of the cabin; this was done by splitting trees eighteen inches in diameter, and hewing the faces of them with a broad-axe. They were half the length of the floor they were intended to make. These were the usual preparations for the first day. The second day the neighbors collected, raised and finished the house. The third day's work generally consisted of "furnishing" the house,—supplying it with a clapboard table, made of a split slab, and supported by four raised legs set in auger-holes. Some three-legged stools were made in the same manner. Some pins stuck in the logs at the back of the house supported some clapboards, which served for shelves for the family furniture, consisting of a few pewter dishes, plates, and spoons, but mostly of wooden bowls, trenchers, and noggins. If these last were scarce, gourds and hard-shelled squashes made up the deficiency. The iron pots, knives, and forks were brought from the east side of the mountains, along with salt and iron on pack-horses.

A single fork, placed with its lower end in a hole in the floor, and the upper end fastened to a joist, served for a bedstead, by placing a pole in the fork, with one end through a crack between the logs of the wall. This front pole was crossed by a shorter one within the fork, with its outer end through another crack. From the first pole, through a crack between the logs of the end of the house, the boards were put on which formed the bottom of the bed. Sometimes other poles were pinned to the fork a little distance above these, for the purpose of supporting the front and foot of the bed, while the walls were the support of its back and its head. A few pegs around the walls for the display of the coats of the women and hunting-shirts of the men, and two small forks, or buck's horns, to a joist, for the rifle and shot-pouch, completed the carpenter-work. The cabin being finished, the next ceremony was "the house-warming," which consisted of a dance of a whole night's duration, prior to the occupation of the new abode. Hog and hominy, Johnny-cake and pone, milk and mush, with such wild meats as the forests offered and the trusty rifle supplied, was the diet upon which the early settlers mainly lived, and which made strong men and buxom women.

Their dress partook both of the Indian and the European styles, and, like their lives, was a combination of the savage and the civilized. The hunting-shirt was in universal use, and was a sort of loose frock, coming halfway down the thighs, with large sleeves, open before, and so wide as to lap over a foot or more when belted. The cape, which was large, and sometimes handsomely fringed with a raveled piece of cloth, added to the comfort of the wearer as well as to the appearance of the garment. The bosom of this convenient dress furnished a receptacle where the hunter might deposit a small stock of provisions, his tow for cleaning the barrel of his rifle, and any other article necessary in a short march or journey. To the belt, which held the shirt closely to the body of the wearer, were suspended the tomahawk and scalping-knife, the former on the right side and the latter on the left, while the bullet-bag sometimes hung from the front. The hunting-shirt was made of various materials, generally of linsey, sometimes of coarse linen, and occasionally of dressed deerskin, which latter, however, were cold and uncomfortable in wet weather. The shirt and jacket were made after the common fashion, while the drawers or breeches and leggings, with the moccasins, of dressed deerskin, with cap or hat of various form and material, completed the attire.

The moccasins were generally made of a single piece, with a gathered seam along the top of the foot, and another from the bottom of the heel without gathers, reaching as high as the ankle-joint, or a little higher. The moccasin was lined with deer's hair, or dry leaves in cold weather, and flaps on each side reaching some distance up the legs, and tied with deer-thongs, gave warmth to the extremities, and protected the feet from the entrance of dust, gravel, and snow.

In the latter part of the French and Indian war many of the young whites adopted the Indian costume in its entirety, with the exception of the match-coat. "The drawers," Dr. Doddridge tells us, "were laid aside, and the leggings made larger, so as to reach the upper part of the thigh. The Indian breech-clout was adopted. This was a piece of linen or cloth, nearly a yard long and eight or nine inches broad. This passed under the belt before and behind, leaving the ends for flaps hanging before and behind over the belt. These flaps were sometimes ornamented with some coarse kinds of embroidery work. To the same belt which secured the breech-clout, strings, which supported the long leggings, were attached. When this belt, as was often the case, passed over the hunting-shirt, the upper part of the thighs and part of the hip were naked. The young man, instead of being abashed by his nudity, was proud of his Indian-like dress. In some instances I have seen them go into places of public worship in this dress. Their appearance, however, did not add much to the devotion of the young ladies."

The women wore linsey petticoats and bed-gowns, going barefooted in warm weather, and in cold covering the feet with moccasins, overshoes, or shoe-packs.

The wardrobes of the family were hung in full view upon the walls of the cabin, and while often serving to stop a crack and keep the wind away, also proclaimed the wealth or poverty of the occupants.

"Many of the early sports were imitations of the exercises and stratagems of hunting and war. Boys were taught the use of the bow and arrow at an early age; but, although they acquired considerable adroitness in the use of them, so as to kill a bird or squirrel sometimes, yet it appears to me that, in the hands of the white people, the bow and arrow could never be depended upon for warfare or hunting, unless made and managed in a different manner from any specimens of them which I ever saw. One important pastime of our boys was that of imitating the noise of every bird and beast in the woods. This faculty was not merely a pastime, but a very necessary part of education, on account of its utility in certain circumstances. The imitations of the gobbling and other sounds of wild turkeys often brought those keen-eyed and ever-watchful tenants of the forest within reach of the rifle. The bleating of the fawn brought its dam to her death in the same way. The hunter often collected a company of mopeish owls on the trees about his camp, and amused himself with their hoarse screeching. His howl would raise and obtain responses from a pack of wolves, so as to inform him of their neighborhood, as well as guard him against their depredations. This imitative faculty was sometimes requisite as a measure of precaution in war. The Indians, when scattered about in a neighborhood, often collected together by imitating turkeys by day and wolves or owls by night. In similar situations our people did the same. I have often witnessed the consternation of a whole neighborhood in consequence of a few screeches of owls. An early and correct use of this imitative faculty was considered as an indication that its possessor would become in due time a good hunter and a valiant warrior."

"Throwing the tomahawk was another boyish sport in which many acquired considerable skill. The tomahawk, with its handle of a certain length, will make a given number of turns in a given distance. Say five steps it will strike with the edge, the handle downwards; at the distance of seven and a half, it will strike with the edge, the handle upwards, and so on. A little experience enabled the boy to measure the distance with his eye when walking through the woods, and strike a tree with his tomahawk in any way he chose. The athletic sports of running, jumping, and wrestling were the pastimes of boys in common with the men. A well-grown boy at the age of twelve or thirteen years was furnished with a small rifle and shot-pouch. He then became a fort soldier, and had his port-hole assigned him. Hunting squirrels, turkeys, and raccoons soon made him expert in the use of his gun. Dancing was the principal amusement of our young people of both sexes. Their dances, to be sure, were of the simplest forms,—three or four-handed reels and jigs. Country-dances, cotillons, and minuets were unknown. I remember to have seen once or twice a dance which was called 'The Irish Trot,' but I have long since forgotten its figure. Shooting at a mark was a common diversion among the men when their stock of ammunition would allow it. This, however, was far from being always the case. The present mode of shooting off-hand was not then in practice. This mode was not considered as any trial of the value of a gun, nor indeed as much of a test of the skill of a marksman. Their shooting was from a rest, and at as great a distance as the length and weight of the barrel of the gun would throw a ball on a horizontal level. Such was their regard to accuracy in those sporting trials of their rifles, and of their own skill in the use of them, that they often put moss or some other soft substance on the log or stump from which they shot, for fear of having the bullet thrown from the mark by the spring of the barrel. When the rifle was held to the side of a tree for a rest, it was pressed against it as tightly as possible for the same reason. Rifles of former times were different from those of modern date; few of them carried more than forty-five bullets to the pound. Bullets of a less size were not thought sufficiently heavy for hunting or war.

"Dramatic narrations, chiefly concerning Jack and the Giant, furnished our young people with another source of amusement during their leisure hours. Many of these tales were lengthy, and embraced a considerable range of incident. Jack, always the hero of the story, often encountering many difficulties and performing many great achievements, came off conqueror of the Giant. Many of these stories were tales of knight-errantry, in which some captive virgin was restored to her lover. These dramatic narrations concerning Jack and the Giant bore a strong resemblance to the poems of Ossian, the story of the Cyclops and Ulysses in the 'Odyssey' of Homer, and the tale of the Giant and Greatheart in 'Pilgrim's Progress.' They were so arranged as to the different incidents of the narration that they were easily committed to memory."

Singing was another but not very common amusement among our first settlers. Their tunes were rude enough, to be sure. Robin Hood furnished a number of our songs, the balance were mostly traditional. These last were denominated "love-songs about murder," as to cards, dice, backgammon, and other games of chance, we knew nothing about them. As a general rule, the early settlers married young. There was no distinction of rank, says Dr. Doddridge, and very little of fortune. On these accounts the first impression of love resulted in marriage, and a family establishment cost but a little labor and nothing else. In the first years of the settlement of the country a wedding engaged the attention of a whole neighborhood, and the frolic was anticipated by old and young with eager expectation. This is not to be wondered at when it is told that a wedding was almost the only gathering which was not accompanied with the labor of reaping, log-rolling, building a cabin, or planning some scout or campaign. On the morning of the wedding-day the groom and his attendants assembled at the house of his father for the purpose of reaching the home of his bride by noon, which was the usual time for celebrating the nuptials, and which for certain reasons must take place before dinner. Let the reader imagine an assemblage of people without a store, tailor, or mantua-maker within a hundred miles, and an assemblage of horses without a blacksmith or saddler within an equal distance. The gentlemen dressed in shoe-packs (tanned leather), mocassins, leather breeches, leggings, linsey hunting-shirts, and all home-made. The ladies dressed in linsey petticoats, and linsey of linen bed-gowns, coarse shoes, stockings, handkerchiefs, and buckskin gloves, if any. If there were any buckles, rings, buttons, or ruffles, they were the relics of olden times, family pieces from parents or grandparents. The horses were caparisoned with old saddles, old bridles or halters, and pack-saddles, with a bag or blanket thrown over them; a rope or string as often constituted the girth as a piece of leather.

The march, in double file, was often interrupted by the narrowness and obstructions of our horse-paths, as they were called, for we had no roads, and these difficulties were often increased, sometimes by the good and sometimes by the ill will of neighbors, by fallen trees, and tying grapevines across the way. Sometimes an ambuscade was formed by the wayside, and

an unexpected discharge of several guns took place, so as to cover the wedding-party with smoke. Let the reader imagine the scene which followed this discharge: the sudden spring of the horses, the shrieks of the girls, and the chivalrous bustle of their partners to save them from falling. Sometimes, in spite of all that could be done to prevent it, some were thrown to the ground. If a wrist, elbow, or ankle happened to be sprained, it was tied with a handkerchief, and little more was said or thought about it. The ceremony of the marriage preceded the dinner, which was a substantial backwoods feast of beef, pork, fowls, and sometimes venison and bear-meat, roasted and boiled, with plenty of potatoes, cabbage, and other vegetables. During the dinner the greatest hilarity always prevailed, although the table might be a large slab of timber hewed out with a broad-axe, supported by four sticks set in anger-holes, and the furniture some old pewter dishes and plates, the rest wooden bowls and trenchers; a few pewter spoons, much battered about the edges, were to be seen at some tables. The rest were made of horns. If knives were scarce, the deficiency was made up by the scalping-knives, which were carried in sheaths suspended to the belt of the hunting-shirt. Every man carried one of them. After dinner the dancing commenced, and generally lasted till the next morning. The figures of the dances were three and four-handed reels, or square sets and jigs. The commencement was always a square four, which was followed by what was called "jigging it off;" that is, two of the four would single out for a jig, and were followed by the remaining couple. The jigs were often accompanied with what was called "cutting out;" that is, when either of the parties became tired of the dance, on intimation the place was supplied by some other person without interruption to the dance. In this way a dance was often continued until a musician was heartily tired of his situation. Towards the latter part of the night, if any of the company, through weariness, attempted to conceal themselves for the purpose of sleeping, they were hunted up, paraded on the floor, and the fiddler ordered to play "Hang Out Till Tomorrow Morning." About nine or ten o'clock a deputation of the young ladies stole off the bride and put her to bed. In doing this it frequently happened that they had to ascend a ladder instead of a pair of stairs, leading from the dining and ball-room to the loft, the floor of which was made of clapboards lying loose. This ascent, one might think, would put the bride and her attendants to the blush; but as the foot of the ladder was commonly behind the door, which was purposely opened for the occasion, and its rounds at the inner ends were well hung with hunting-shirts, dresses, and other articles of clothing, the candles being on the opposite side of the house, the exit of the bride was noticed by but few. This done, a deputation of young men in like manner stole off the groom, and placed him snugly by the side of his bride. The dance still continued; and if seats happened to be scarce, which was often the case, every young man, when not engaged in the dance, was obliged to offer his lap as a seat for one of the girls, and the offer was sure to be accepted. In the midst of this hilarity the bride and groom were not forgotten. Pretty late in the night some one would remind the company that the new couple must stand in need of some refreshment; black Betty, which was the name of the bottle, was called for, and sent up the ladder; but sometimes black Betty did not go alone, but was accompanied by as much bread, beef, pork, and cabbage as would afford a good meal for half a dozen hungry men. The young couple were compelled to eat and drink more or less of whatever was offered. It often happened that some neighbors or relations not being asked to the wedding took offense, and the mode of revenge adopted by them on such occasions was that of cutting off the manes, foretops, and tails of the horses of the wedding company.

On returning to the infare, the order of procession and the race for black Betty was the same as before. The feasting and dancing often lasted several days, at the end of which the whole company was so exhausted with loss of sleep that a long rest was necessary to fit them to return to their ordinary labors.

The custom of stealing the bride's shoe while at dinner, though perhaps of later date, was one which long prevailed, and which afforded great amusement to the wedding guests. She was protected from the attacks by the waiters (or, as we call them nowadays, groomsmen and bridesmaids), and to succeed in accomplishing the theft the greatest dexterity was required; and if they failed to defend her successfully, they were in honor bound to pay a penalty for the redemption of the shoe. This penalty was a bottle of wine or one dollar, which was commonly the price of a bottle of wine; and as a punishment to the bride, she was not permitted to dance until the shoe was restored. The successful thief on getting the shoe held it up in triumph to the view of the whole assemblage, which was generally pretty numerous. This was almost exclusively a German custom, but that of throwing the stocking was also known to the Irish, and is celebrated by an Irish poet in his "Irish Wedding.

1 Dr. Dodridge.
After the bride and groom had been put to bed, the young people were admitted to their room, and a stocking rolled into a ball would be given to the young women, who one after the other would go to the foot of the bed, stand with their backs towards it, and throw the stocking over their shoulders at the bride's head; and the first that succeeded in touching her cap on her head was the next to be married. The young men then took up the stocking and threw it at the groom's head, the greatest earnestness and eagerness being shown by both sexes to prove successful.\(^1\)

The race for the bottle, already alluded to, was one of the most interesting and exciting incidents of the wedding. A bottle of the best spirits that could be obtained was prepared at the bride's residence and ornamented with a white ribbon, and when several miles distant the competitors in the race would start, on even terms, and with their horses at full speed, disdaining rocks, stumps, and ravines, and disregarding all impediments, would dash madly forward for the tempting prize. The father, or next friend of the bride, expecting the racers, stood, bottle in hand, ready to deliver it to the successful contestant. On receiving it, he immediately returned to meet the bridal party, and presented the bottle first to the bride, next to the groom, and then to the rest of the company, all of whom, both men and women, were required to give it a hearty salute.

In the earlier days of the settlements, and upon the frontiers, and in positions especially exposed to attack, self-preservation required the erection of places of defense, to which the harried inhabitants might retire upon the approach of hostile Indians. The forts of these early days were, however, not simply fortified points of refuge, but often the residence of a small number of families of the same neighborhood. As the Indian mode of warfare was an indiscriminate slaughter of all ages and of both sexes, it was as requisite to provide for the safety of the women and children as for that of the men.\(^2\) The fort consisted of cabins, block-houses, and stockades, a range of cabins commonly forming at least one of its sides, divisions or partitions of logs separating the cabins from each other. The walls on the outside were ten or twelve feet high, the slope of the roof being wholly inward. The block-houses were built at the angles of the stockade inclosure, and projected about two feet beyond the outer walls of the cabins and stockades. Their upper stories were about eighteen inches larger in every way than the lower, leaving an opening at the beginning of the second story, so that the inmates could shoot from above upon an enemy attempting to climb the walls. But one door opened into these rude structures, and that was always very strong, so as to defy entrance by any ordinary means of assault. In some cases the angles of the stockades were furnished with bastions instead of with block-houses. A large folding-gate, made of thick slabs, nearest the spring, closed the fort. The stockades, bastions, cabins, and block-house walls were provided with port-holes at proper heights and distances, and the whole of the outside was made completely bullet-proof. The whole of this work was accomplished without the aid of a single nail or spike of iron, and for the very good and sufficient reason that there were none to be had.\(^3\)

In some places less exposed a single block-house, with a cabin or two, constituted the whole fort. Such defenses, though wholly insufficient for protection against artillery, answered all the purposes of the times, and were seldom attacked and scarcely ever taken by the Indians.

Although, according to a distinguished writer, "there was, for many years after the settlement of the country, neither law nor gospel" among the frontier communities, there was an unwritten code, both of morals and property, to which general obedience was cheerfully accorded. The want of legal government in the extreme western frontier was due to the dispute as to sovereignty between Virginia and Pennsylvania, and for a long period the people of that section knew nothing of courts, lawyers, magistrates, sheriffs, or constables. Public opinion was the sole and the supreme tribunal, but it was one which was universally respected, and whose decrees were always enforced. "The punishment," says Dr. Doddridge, "for idleness, lying, dishonesty, and ill-fame generally was that of 'hating the offender out,' as they expressed it. This mode of chastisement was like the atimia of the Greeks. It was a public expression in various ways of a general sentiment of indignation against such as transgressed the moral maxims of the community to which they belonged. This commonly resulted either in the reformation or punishment of the person against whom it was directed. At house-rasings, log-rollings, and harvest-parties, every one was expected to do his duty faithfully. A person who did not perform his share of labor on these occasions was designated by the epithet of 'Lawrence,' or some other title still more opprobrious; and when it came to his turn to require the like aid from his neighbors, the idler soon felt his punishment in their refusal to attend to his call. Although there was no legal compulsion to the performance of military duty, yet every man of full age and size was required to do his full share of public service. If he did not do so he was 'hated out as a coward.' Even the want of any article of war-equipments, such as ammunition, a sharp flint, a priming-wire, a scalping-knife or tomahawk, was thought highly disgraceful.

"Debts, which make such an uproar in civilized life, were but little known among our forefathers at the early settlement of the country. After the depreciation of the Continental paper they had no money of any kind; everything purchased was paid for in produce or labor. A good cow and calf was often the price of a bushel of alum salt. If a contract was not punctually fulfilled, the delinquent's credit was at an end. Any petty theft was punished with all the infamy that could be heaped on the offender. The first settlers had a kind of innate or hereditary detestation of the crime of theft, in any shape or degree, and their maxim was, 'a thief must be whipped.' If the theft was of something of some value, a kind of jury of the neighborhood, after hearing the testimony, would condemn the culprit to Moses' law, that is, to forty stripes save one. If the theft was of some small article, the offender was doomed to carry on his back the flag of the United States, which then consisted of thirteen stripes. In either case some able hands were selected to execute the sentence, so that the stripes were sure to be well laid on. This punishment was followed by a sentence of exile, the offender being told that he must decamp in so many days on penalty of having the number of his stripes doubled.

"If a woman was given to tattling and slandering her neighbors, she was punished by common consent with a kind of patent right to say whatever she pleased without being believed. Her tongue was then said to be harmless, or to be no scandal.

"With all their rudeness, these people were given to hospitality, and freely divided their rough fare with a neighbor or stranger, and would have been offended at the offer of pay. In their settlements and forts they lived, they worked, they fought and feasted or suffered together in cordial harmony.

"They were warm and constant in their friendships. On the other hand, they were revengeful in their sentiments. And the point of honor sometimes led to personal combats. If one man called another a liar, he was considered as having given a challenge, which the person who received it must accept or be deemed a coward, and the charge was generally answered on the spot with a blow. If the injured person was decidedly unable to fight the aggressor, he might get a friend to do it for him. The same thing took place on a charge of cowardice or any other dishonorable action. A battle must follow, and the person who made the charge must fight either the person against whom he had made the charge or any champion who chose to espouse his cause. The mode of single combat in those days was dangerous in the extreme. Although no weapons were used, fists, teeth, and feet were employed at will; but, above all, the detestable practice of gouging, by which eyes were sometimes put out, rendered this mode of fighting frightful indeed. Instances of seduction and bastardy did not frequently happen in our early times."

CHAPTER IV.

THE FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR.

The Ohio Company—The Cresap—Frontier Forts—Braddock's Defeat—Indian Outrages—Capture of Fort Du Quene—Pontiac's War.

DIFFICULTIES between England and France had arisen at intervals since the peace of Utrecht (1713), though not assuming the character of war. In the North and East, France was sparing no effort to extend her power and crush that of England. This vexations contest was continued with feeble efforts and various success almost down to 1756. It came at last to be distinctly understood, or fully believed, that a preponderating ascendency in America must decide the long and arduous contest between those rival powers. It was a singular phenomenon, that a great question of national aggrandizement between the courts of London and Paris should be decided in the interior of America. Such, however, was the fact; and the banks of the St. Lawrence, and the shores of the American lakes, and the borders of Maryland and Virginia were destined to be the theatre on which the great prize was to be contended for. The vigor of the contest was proportionate to the magnitude of the stake. The efforts of England were cheerfully and promptly seconded by those of her colonies through four successive years, until at length the Plains of Abraham witnessed the triumph of their united valor, and the gallant and lamented Wolfe planted the cross of St. George upon the ramparts of Quebec. The peace of Fontainebleau, which soon followed, secured the conquest which valor and perseverance had won. France relinquished her pretensions, and left Great Britain without a rival upon this great field of glory and enterprise. The first signal of alarm to the French was the grant of five hundred thousand acres of territory on the south side of the Ohio, between the Monongahela and Kanawha Rivers, and west of the Alleghanies, made by the English government in 1749 to a small number of Marylanders and Virginians of wealth and influence, styling themselves the "Ohio Company."

By its charter the company was required to select a large portion of its lands immediately, to settle upon them one hundred families within seven years, to erect a fort, and maintain a garrison against the Indians. They at once set about the exploration of the country, and employed for the purpose Christopher Gist, of Maryland, an energetic, fearless pioneer, and a man of considerable intelligence. Gist was instructed to examine the quality of the lands, keep a journal, draw plans of the country, and report in full.

He arrived at Will's Creek in October, 1749, and on the 31st started on his mission, following an Indian trail, his only guide through the wilderness.

His explorations occupied several months, and took him almost to the falls of the Ohio, near the present site of Louisville, Ky., and included the region bordering on the Miami River. Gist also succeeded in obtaining from the Indian tribes friendly assurances, which, by his influence and that of George Croghan, a popular trader, were reiterated at the Council held at Logstown in 1752.¹

¹ Christopher Gist was of English descent. His grandfather of the same name was one of the earliest settlers of Baltimore County, where he died in 1691. His grandson was Edith Cromwell, whose death occurred in 1694. Their only child, Richard, was surveyor of the Western Shore, one of the commissioners appointed to lay off Baltimore Town, and presiding magistrate in 1736. In 1795 he married Zipporah Murray, and Christopher, the able agent of the Ohio Company, was one of three sons. He married Sarah Howard; his brother Nathaniel married Mary Howard; and Thomas, the third brother, married Violetta Howard, aunt of Gen. John Eager Howard. From either Nathaniel or Thomas descended Gen. Gist, who was killed at the battle of Franklin, Tenn., near the close of the late civil war. Christopher had three sons—Nathaniel, Richard, and Thomas—and one daughter, Nancy—none of whom, except Nathaniel, were married. Because of his knowledge of the country on the Ohio, and his skill in dealing with the Indians, Christopher Gist was chosen to accompany Washington on his mission in 1753, and it was from his journal that Sparks and Irving derived their account of that expedition. With his sons Nathaniel and Thomas he was with Braddock on the fatal field of Monongahela, and for his services received a grant of 12,000 acres of land from the king of England. Richard was killed in the battle of King's Mountain. Thomas lived on the plantation, and was a man of note in his day, presiding in the courts till his death, about 1786. Nancy lived with him until his death, when she joined her brother Nathaniel, and removed with him to the grant in Kentucky about the beginning of the present century. Nathaniel, the grandfather of the Hon. Montgomery Blair, of Maryland, married Judith Carey Bell, of Buckingham County, Va., a granddaughter of Archibald Carey, the mover of the Bill of Rights in the House of Burgesses. Nathaniel was a colonel in the Virginia line during the Revolutionary war, and died early in the present century at an advanced age. He left two sons, Henry Carey and Thomas Cecil. His eldest daughter, Sarah Howard, married the Hon. Jesse Bledsoe, United States senator from Kentucky, and a distinguished jurist. His grandson, B. Gratz Brown, was the Democratic candidate for Vice-President in 1872. The second daughter of Col. Gist, Anne (Nancy), married Col. Nathaniel Hart, a brother of Mrs. Henry Clay. The third daughter married Dr. Bowell, of Lexington, Ky. The fourth daughter married Francis P. Blair, and they were the parents of Hon. Montgomery Blair and Francis P. Blair, Jr. The fifth daughter married Benjamin Gratz, of Lexington, Ky. —Lowdershilk, p. 28.
Finding they were unable to carry the position by assault they set fire to the house, and Cresap being forced to leave the burning building, was taken prisoner after a desperate struggle, in which one of his assailants was wounded.

His captors carried him in triumph to Philadelphia, where, as he was marched through the streets before the assembled citizens, he taunted the crowd by exclaiming, half in derision, half in earnest, “Why, this is the finest city in the province of Maryland!”

After some time his confinement he was released by the king’s order, and returning to Maryland removed to Antietam, to a valuable farm called the Long Meadows, afterwards owned by the Sprigg family, in Washington County. Here he built over a spring a house of stone, which was designed not only for a residence, but as a fort, as the locality was then on the frontier, in advance of white population and exposed to the danger of Indian attack.

Obtaining a loan of five hundred pounds from Mr. Dulany, he commenced to trade in skins and furs, and shipped a large quantity to England, which, however, were captured by a French vessel on the way over, to the financial ruin of the unfortunate trader. But he was not the sort of man to be frowned down by fortune, and so settling his indebtedness to Mr. Dulany by transferring to him his farm of fourteen hundred acres, he removed to what is now known as Oldtown, in Allegany County, but which he called Skipton, after the place of his nativity, where he took up his permanent residence, and where he acquired an immense landed estate, lying in both Maryland and Virginia. Col. Cresap having thus made his way to the extreme outposts of civilization, soon became one of the most distinguished pioneers of the West, and his name was a household word not only among the whites, but the Indians as well.

“In early times,” says Jacob, “when there were but few taverns, and these few were very indifferent, his house at Old Town was open and his table spread for all decent travelers, and they were welcome. His delight was to give and receive useful information; nor was this friendly disposition limited to the white people only. The Indians generally called on him in pretty large parties as they passed and repassed from north to south in their war expeditions, and for which special purpose he kept a very large kettle for their use; and he also generally gave them a beef to kill for themselves every time they called, and his liberality gained for him among them the honorable title of the ‘Big-noon.’”

In person Col. Cresap was not large, but firmly set, and of very great muscular strength; he had a sound constitution, and lived to the age of one hundred and five or six. When seventy years old he made a voyage to England, where he was commissioned by Lord Baltimore to run the western line of Maryland, in order to ascertain which of the two branches of the Potomac was the larger, and which was actually the fountain-head of that river. On his return home he employed surveyors to run the line, and the map of this work, prepared by Col. Cresap, was the first ever made to show the course and fountains of the north and south branches of the Potomac River.

When more than eighty years of age he married his second wife, and at the age of one hundred performed a journey, partly by sea and partly by land, from his residence at Oldtown to an island near the British province of Nova Scotia, and returned in safety.

When ninety years of age he “conceived and digested a plan to explore as far west as the Pacific, and nothing but his advanced years prevented the accomplishment of an enterprise which he described with the enthusiasm of an early borderer.”

From this his enthusiastic biographer is justified in declaring,—

“that had Providence placed Col. Cresap at the head of our army, or state, or kingdom, he would have been a more conspicuous character. He was not inferior to Charles XII., of Sweden, in personal bravery, nor to Peter the Great, of Russia,—whom in many things he much resembled,—in coolness or fortitude, or that peculiar talent of learning experience from misfortunes, and levying a tax upon damage and loss to raise him to future prosperity and success.”

Col. Thomas Cresap had five children, three sons—Daniel, Thomas, and Michael—and two daughters,—Sarah and Elizabeth.

Michael, the youngest son of Col. Thomas Cresap, was no less distinguished than his father in the early history of Western Maryland. He was born in that part of Frederick which is at present Allegany County, on the 29th of June, 1742, and was sent to the celebrated school of Rev. Thomas Craddock, in Baltimore County. Not fancying the restrains of school-life,

1 Jacob’s “Life of Cresap.”
2 On the 14th of September, 1751, Christopher Gist, Michael Aldridge, and James Martin made affidavit “that four captains of Indian warriors, with their men, consisting of fifty or thereabouts, camped in said Col. Thomas Cresap’s pasture. They killed several of his hogs, took his corn, his flour, and bread, which made said Cresap fall into a passion and threaten to load his guns and shoot among them at night.” They persuaded him not to do so, but to complain to the Governor.

Several Indians made affidavit about the same time that “Brother Cresap” of late seemed angry, and “did not give us victuals so cheerful as usual. Our young men went out and killed sundry of his hogs, at which he flew into a passion.”

“As the white people has killed up the deer, buffaloes, elk, and bears, there is nothing for us to live on but what we get from the white people; and having no white people on the road from Omundaga to our brother Cresap’s house, we are often very hungry, and stays three or four days to rest ourselves, and our young men very unruly goes into the woods and kills our brother Cresap’s hogs and sometimes cattle.”
young Cresap left his preceptor and made his way back to his father's house, traveling alone one hundred and forty miles through a dangerous wilderness to reach his destination, where, however, he received only a flogging for his pains, and was returned to his teacher, with whom he remained until the completion of his studies.

Soon after leaving school he married Miss Whitehead, of Philadelphia, and set up as a trader. His operations were not successful, however, and "urged by necessity as well as a laudable ambition," early in 1774 he engaged six or seven active young men, and "repairing to the wilderness of the Ohio commenced the business of building houses and clearing lands, and being among the first adventurers into this exposed and dangerous region, he was enabled to select some of the best and richest of the Ohio levels."1

Here, on or near the present site of Brownsville, Ky., he built himself a house of hewed logs, with a shingled roof nailed on, which is believed to have been the first shingled house west of the Alleghany Mountains. He retained the title to this land for years, and at last disposed of it to Thomas and Basil Brown, two brothers from Maryland, from whom the present town of Brownsville takes its name. This point became an attractive place to the whites as it had evidently been to the savages, as we may judge from the ingenious works with which they fortified it. This post, known in border history as Red-Stone Old Fort, became the rallying-point of the pioneers, and was familiar to many an early settler as his place of embarkation for the "dark and bloody ground." In the legends of the West, Michael Cresap is connected with this Indian stronghold. In those mountains Cresap is spoken of as remarkable for his brave, adventurous disposition, and awarded credit for often rescuing the whites by a timely notice of the savages' approach, a knowledge of which he obtained by unceasing vigilance over their movements. This fort was frequently Cresap's rendezvous as a trader, and thither he resorted with his people, either to interchange views and adopt plans for future action, or for repose in quieter times when the red men were lulled into inaction, and the tomahawk was temporarily buried.2

Michael Cresap was prominently engaged in all the border conflicts with the Indians, and has been portrayed in a celebrated piece of Indian rhetoric as the instigator if not one of the chief actors in the massacre of Logan's family,—a charge which has been sufficiently refuted by Jacob in his "Life of Cresap," and by Brantz Mayer in his "Taj-Gah-Jute, or Logan and Cresap." Nevertheless the war of 1774 has often been called "Cresap's War," and although Cresap was entirely guiltless of all connection with the butchery which brought it on, he rendered good service while it was in progress, under a captain's commission from the Governor of Virginia. After its conclusion, Cresap returned to Maryland, spending the autumn of 1774 and the following winter with his family, and early in the spring of 1775 proceeded again to the Ohio to complete the work begun the preceding year. Ill health, however, compelled him to retrace his steps to Maryland, and while on his way he was met by a messenger, who informed him that he had been appointed by the Committee of Safety at Frederick to take command of one of the two rifle companies required to be raised in Maryland by a resolution of the Continental Congress. In spite of bad health Cresap accepted the commission, and joined Washington at Boston in August with the first company of riflemen raised in Maryland. His illness increased, and after about three months' service he was compelled to leave the army, with the intention of returning to his home; but he was unable to proceed farther than New York, where he died of fever on the 18th of October, 1775, at the early age of thirty-three. His remains, attended by a vast concourse of people, were interred with military honors in Trinity churchyard, New York. His tombstone bears the following inscription, beneath the rude sculpture of a winged head:

"IN MEMORY OF MICHAEL CRESAP FIRST CAP. OF THE RIFLE BATALIONS, AND SON OF CO' THOMAS CRESAP, WHO DEPARTED THIS LIFE OCTOBER THE 18th, 1775."

In June, 1752, Mr. Gist, as agent of the Ohio Company, with Col. Fry and two other gentlemen, went to Logstown, about seventeen miles below the Forks,3 and made the treaty with the Indians to which allusion has been made. By this treaty the Indians bound themselves not to disturb any settlement on the southeast side of the Ohio. After the treaty at Logstown Gist was appointed surveyor for the company, and was directed to lay off a town at Shutee's Creek, a little below the present site of Pittsburgh, on the east side of the Ohio, and four hundred pounds were appropriated to pay for the construction of a fort. Gist, with several other families, then settled in the valley of the Monongahela, not far from the creek above named. During the same year the company erected another post on the Virginia side of the river, which was known as the "New Store-house," and was located "at the foot of the bluff on which now stands the beautiful residence of Capt. Roger Perry, very near the point occupied by the abutment of the Potomac bridge at Cumberland." The first store-house was located on the west side of Will's Creek, north of the river, and the ground on both sides of the creek was surveyed and laid off into a town, with streets, lines, etc., and called Charlottesville in honor of Princess Charlotte Sophia, afterwards wife of George III.1

The territory granted to the Ohio Company, however, was claimed by the French, and the establishment of the trading-posts described was followed by prompt and decisive measures of reprisal on the part of the French military commanders. Some of the English traders among the Indians were seized and imprisoned, and several of the trading-posts of the company were reduced and pillaged. Indignant at these outrages, Governor Dinwiddie introduced upon the theatre of affairs a youth—George Washington—to perform an important and hazardous mission for his native colony, and to prepare himself to serve the whole country. Col. Washington was dispatched to the French commandant to protest against his proceedings and to demand the evacuation of the territory.

On the 30th of October, 1753, Washington set off from Williamsburg on his dangerous mission through a hostile Indian region with that courage, zeal, and perseverance which afterwards, in a higher station, made him the savior of his country. He reached Will's Creek on the 14th of November, where he engaged Col. Nathaniel Gist, the intrepid pioneer, to accompany him on the expedition. The demands of Virginia were rejected, and nothing was left but a recourse to hostilities. In the war which ensued Maryland became involved simply in self-defense and for the assistance of the sister colonies, while Virginia and Pennsylvania were contending for the acquisition of a large and fertile territory.

The intentions and movements of the French being understood, the Governor of Virginia prepared for immediate war. He summoned the House of Burgesses to meet at an early day, and also wrote letters to the Governors of the other provinces calling on them for aid, drawing a vivid picture of the common danger, and making moving appeals to their patriotism and sense of duty to their sovereign. The English government recognized the dangerous consequences likely to result to her possessions from these encroachments unless they were instantly repelled, and responded fully to the spirit of Virginia. sentations made by Governor Dinwiddie to the Earl of Holderness (then Secretary of State) circulars were addressed to the English colonies to repel by force all attempts by the French to intrude upon the settlements within the colonies. That addressed to the province of Maryland was submitted to its Assembly, October session, 1753, but its requisitions, although sustained and urged by its Executive, were without effect. The Lower House assured the Governor "that they were resolutely determined to repel any hostile invasion of the province by any foreign power, and that they would cheerfully contribute to the defense of the neighboring colonies when their circumstances required it, but they did not deem this a pressing occasion." At the next session of the Assembly, held in February, 1754, the Upper House expressed its willingness to concur in proper measures of defense.

In the mean time the French had not been idle. In the spring of 1753 they had built at Presque Isle, on Lake Erie, a strong fort, and, leaving a large garrison there, they marched to the Rivière aux Beufs, where they erected another fort, cutting a wagon-road twenty-one feet in width between the two. Here garrisons were maintained during the winter of 1753-54, and here a strong force gathered in 1754, fully prepared to march to and occupy the head of the Ohio. On the 17th of April, 1754, M. de Contrecœur, the French commander, at the head of from five hundred to a thousand men, with eighteen pieces of artillery, captured the defenseless works afterwards known as Fort Du Quesne, which occupied the spot where now stands the city of Pittsburgh. Washington was at Will's Creek (now Cumberland, Md.) when the news reached him of the surrender of the fort. He resolved to proceed to the mouth of Red Stone Creek (Brownsville, Pa.), and there to erect a fort, and await the advancing foe. He arrived at the Great Meadows on the 28th of May, and encountered a detachment of thirty-five men, under M. de Jumonville, sent out from Fort Du Quesne as ambassadors, as was alleged by M. de Contrecœur, to warn him to withdraw. Washington, however, mistook their character, and a sharp skirmish ensued, in which M. de Jumonville and several of his men were killed, and the rest surrendered, and were sent under guard to the Governor of Virginia. Having heard of large reinforcements at Fort Du Quesne, and expecting an attack, Washington retreated to the Great Meadows, where he commenced the erection of a fort, to which was given the suggestive title of Fort Necessity. While thus engaged, they were surprised by the approach of a superior French force, and, after a conflict of some hours, obliged to surrender on honorable terms. On the 4th of July, 1754, the little garrison evacuated its feeble fort and retreated to Will's Creek, and the unprotected frontiers of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia were exposed to the plundering bands of French and Indians. Leaving his force at Will's Creek under the command of Col. Innes, Washington hastened to Williamsburg, to communicate in person to Governor Dinwiddie the result of his expedition, while messengers were dispatched with letters to the Governors of Maryland and Pennsylvania, explaining his weak and exposed situation, and soliciting aid. Governor Sharpe, however, aware of the situation of affairs, had already convened the Assembly, which met in Annapolis on the 17th of July. The news of the defeat of Col. Washington reached Annapolis the day after the Assembly had met, and created great surprise and alarm, and it had the effect of hastening the action of the Legislature, which, on the 25th of July, appropriated six thousand pounds

"to his excellency Horatio Sharpe, Esq., for his majesty's use, towards the defence of the colony of Virginia, attacked by the French and Indians, and for the relief and the support of the wives and children of the Indian allies that put themselves under the protection of this government."

Immediately upon the passage of this act, Governors Sharpe notified Governor Dinwiddie, who recommended that a company of one hundred soldiers be raised in the province, to act in conjunction with the forces then gathering at Will's Creek, to serve under the command of Col. Innes. Governor Sharpe issued a commission to Capt. Thomas Cresap, who had bided himself on all occasions as a good servant to the government, 4 to raise a company of riflemen to serve beyond the Allegany Mountains." In August the Governor gave orders that two additional companies should be raised to join Col. Innes, and on the 15th the Gazette announced that we "are now raising recruits to go against the French on the Ohio." The privates were to receive eight pence a day, and clothes, arms, and accoutrements. On the 23d of September a part of a company left Annapolis, under the charge of Capt. Forty, on their way to Frederick, and on the 30th another detachment marched for the same place, under the command of Lieut. John Bacon. John Ross also enlisted a company. All were to serve under the command of Capt. Dogworthy.

Col. Innes, who commanded a few companies of North Carolina troops, was ordered, after the battle of the Great Meadows, to march to Will's Creek, and to construct a fort, which would serve as a rallying-point and a defense to the frontiers.

On his arrival at Will's Creek he commenced the construction of fortifications, and selected for the purpose the hill lying between the Potomac River and the creek, near the mouth of the latter. This work, which was commenced on the 12th of September and completed about the middle of the following month, was built of stoccados, and called by Col. Innes "Fort Mount Pleasant." Log houses were then built for the men, which were finished by the 25th of December, and soon after their completion Governor Dinwiddie received instructions from England to erect a fort at Will's Creek "of such dimensions and character of construction as the importance of the position seemed to require." Gov. Dinwiddie transmitted these instructions to Col. Innes without delay, and the fort was erected and garrisoned during the winter of 1754-55. At the request of Gen. Braddock it was named Fort Cumberland, in honor of the captain-general of the British army. The troops engaged in its construction were Rutherford and Clarke's independent companies of foot from New York, Demerie's independent company from South Carolina, and three independent companies under the command of Col. Innes from North Carolina, assisted by a Maryland company, which arrived on the ground in November. Fort Cumberland stood upon the bank of Will's Creek, near its junction with the Potomac, "opposite to the new store," 1 on the site of the present city of Cumberland, in Allegany County. "The citizens of our city," says Loundermilk, in his interesting history of Cumberland,

"have for generations past pointed out the spot upon which this fort was located, but they had no information or conception of the size, shape, and character of the work or its surroundings. Fortunately a sketch of the fort was found by the author among the king's manuscripts in the library of the British Museum in London. A photographic copy of this sketch was secured. It was drawn by one of the officers in the fort at the time of Gen. Braddock's arrival. The fortifications were drawn to a scale, but the proportions were not preserved in mapping out the river, creek, and surrounding grounds. This fact made it somewhat difficult to establish the exact lines of the work, and compelled a return to the memory of our oldest inhabitants. Mr. Jesse Korns has a distinct recollection of climbing over the remaining earth-works when a boy, and he fixes the easterly line of the fort—that portion of it which runs to a point nearest Will's Creek—some forty feet east of Emmanuel Church. The confirmation of the ground at that spot is strongly confirmatory of his opinion, as well as other circumstances, which fix the western line near the boundary of Prospect Street. The greater portion of Fort Cumberland was a palisado work—all of it, in fact, except the small bastioned work on the western end. The palisades were logs cut to a length of eighteen feet, and planted in the earth to a depth of six feet, forming a close wooden wall twelve feet in height. These logs were spiked together with strips and pins on the inner side, and the wall was pierced with openings for musketry along its entire face. Two water gates are shown in the plot, and from each of these a trench was excavated leading to the creek, so that the men might secure therefrom a supply of water without being exposed to the fire of the enemy. In 1756, after Braddock’s defeat, the Indians became so numerous and so bold as to approach near enough to shoot those who ventured to the water’s edge, and in consequence thereof a well was sunk inside of the palisade near the main gate on the south side. This well was in use not many years since, and is still in existence on the property of Hon. Hopewell Hebb. It was about eighty feet in depth, and within the memory of the writer was furnished with an immense wheel and two buckets, by which excellent cold water was drawn from it. About the year 1739 this well was first cleaned out after the abandonment of the fort, and the father of Mr. John B. Widener was present when part of a gun-carriage, a wheel, and a large quantity of cannon-balls, musket-balls, etc., were taken therefrom.

“Inside the stockade were built barracks sufficient to furnish quarters for two hundred men and the company officers. Besides, there was a parade or drill-ground for the companies. At the west end of the stockade was built a fort with bastions, parapets, and ditches, where sixteen guns were mounted, which commanded all the ground north, west, and south, as well as the north and south lines of the stockade. These guns were of different calibre, four of them being twelve-pounders and twelve four-pounders. Besides these there were several swivels. A part of this armament was ships’ guns, brought from Admiral Keppel’s fleet. On the west face was a sally-port, and inside the fort were the houses used as quarters for the commanding officer, for storing provisions, and for the guard details while on duty. The entire work was four hundred feet in length and one hundred and sixty in width, extending from the point indicated below Emmanuel Church to within a short distance of Prospect Street, the northern line extending along nearly the centre of Washington Street. The fort proper occupied almost the identical spot on which now stands the residence of Mr. James A. Millholland, known as the ‘Hoyle House.’ This fortification was of considerable strength, and commanded the approaches from the north, east, and south. The ground to the northwest was somewhat higher, but a small earth-work of a temporary character was constructed on the crest, on the site of the residence of the late James W. Jones, Esq. The ground on the south side of the river, opposite the fort, was high enough to overlook the work, and somewhat interfered with its efficiency. The company parade and drill-ground was inside the palisades, but the dress parades were held on the ground now occupied by the court house and academy. Quite a number of log houses for barracks were built near the crest, and as far back as Smallwood Street, but these were made use of only when there was present a greater force than could be accommodated in the fort and the barracks immediately adjoining.”

In October, 1754, the Virginia House of Burgesses made an appropriation of twenty thousand pounds for the public service, and with the grant of ten thousand pounds and supply of arms made by the home government, Col. Washington contemplated an extensive expedition against Fort Du Quesne. At the same time, “for settling the ranks of the officers of his majesty’s forces when serving with the provincials in North America,” the king directed,—

“That all officers commissioned by the king or his general should take rank of all officers commissioned by the Governors of the respective province; and further, that the general and field officers of the provincial troops should have no rank when serving with the general and other commissioned officers commissioned by the Crown, but that all captains and other inferior officers of the royal troops should take rank over provincial officers of the same grade having senior commissions.”

The effect of these instructions was to reduce Washington from the rank of colonel to that of captain. This humiliation he was not content to submit to, but resigned his commission and retired to private life. The Duke of Newcastle, upon learning of the resignation of Col. Washington, issued a commission to Governor Horatio Sharpe, appointing him commander of the provincial forces at Fort Cumberland. Immediately on the receipt of the information that the vessel bearing it had arrived, Governor Sharpe proceeded to Williamsburg and “received his majesty’s commission appointing him commander-in-chief of all the forces that are or may be raised to defend the frontiers of Virginia and the neighboring colonies, and to repel the unjustifiable invasion and endeavours of the French on the river Ohio.”

After an interview with Governors Dinwiddie and Dobbs, of North Carolina, who brought out the commission, he returned to Annapolis, November 3d. It was concluded to raise immediately seven hundred men, with whom and the independent companies the French fort should be attacked and reduced before reinforcements could be brought from Canada or Louisiana. This effected, that post and another, which he thought would be necessary to erect on a small island in the river, were to be held for the king. To garrison these and Fort Cumberland would require all his forces, and he concluded it would be useless for them to attempt anything further against the enemy on La Rivière aux Beufs and Lake Erie “without they be supported with such a body of troops from home as he dare not presume to hope for the direction of.”

Governor Sharpe, who was now commander-in-chief of all the forces against the French, with instructions to make his headquarters in Virginia, attended by some officers of the Virginia regiment and a few personal friends, set out from Annapolis on the 12th of November to take command of the army. During the occasions of his absence in visiting the military posts and in attending to his official duties as Governor, Col. Fitzhugh, of Virginia, was to have charge of the forces.

Knowing the value of Col. Washington’s experience and reputation, Sharpe at once took steps to induce him to re-enter the army, and before he left Annapolis he requested Col. Fitzhugh to induce him to change his resolution. Washington, however, who was deeply wounded at what he thought an act of deep injustice, was not to be persuaded.
An officer writing from Fort Cumberland on November 21st, thus speaks of the arrival of Governor Sharpe at that place:

"We now have got a fort completed, with barracks for our men at the back of it, well built, comfortable for the winter. We had the pleasure of being joined three days ago by his Excellency Col. Sharpe, with one company from Maryland. Mr. Sharpe appears to be a stirring, active gentleman, and by his method of proceeding I believe a very good soldier; cheerful and full of good conduct, and one who won't be trifled with. In the spring, if we have a good body of men, I make no doubt but we shall be able to do something to the purpose. By the present situation of the French, they are not to be driven out of their forts unless our numbers are greatly increased."

Governor Sharpe now carried on with vigor the preparations for the spring campaign. Military stores, ordinance, etc., were collected in Frederick and Alexandria, and the militia were properly organized and disciplined.

Indeed, an unwonted energy seems at this time to have inspired the people of the province. Finding the militia law defective, the Governor convened the Assembly on December 24th, when they passed an act to levy troops for the following campaign. As an inducement to the enlistments, they enacted that if any citizen of the province shall be so maimed in the service as to be incapable of maintaining himself, he should be supported at the public expense." In the ensuing session of February, 1775, they regulated the rates of transportation of military stores, and the mode of quartering soldiers in the province, and prohibited by severe penalties any inhabitant from supplying the French or their Indian allies with stores, ammunition, or provisions. Governor Sharpe, however, did not find it difficult to procure volunteer soldiers, for he had more applications than he could provide for. As an instance, the Maryland Gazette of Feb. 6, 1755, says, "We are assured that in Chestertown, in Kent County, several men enlisted immediately upon the arrival of the officer in that town, before the drum was beat, and that the officer, who wanted but thirty men, got his complement and marched with them." The Gazette adds,—

"Such is the commendable spirit of that place." "They are gone for Will's Creek, and some young Maryland gentlemen (patroons) are gone from hence as volunteers; the mother of one of them at parting took leave of him, saying, 'My dear son, I shall with much greater pleasure hear of your death than your cowardice or ill conduct,' and Governor Sharpe, in a letter to Lord Baltimore, dated Jan. 12, 1755, also says,—

"As to levy ing any number of men, I conceive we shall not find it difficult...but the difficulty will be to get money from the Assemblies after they are raised for their support; indeed, this I took upon as impracticable, or not to be expected without the Legislature of Great Britain shall make a law to be binding on all these several colonies, and oblige them to raise such a fund as may be thought expedient for the support of their own troops."

The appointment of Governor Sharpe to the chief command was but a measure of temporary expediency. His friends would have persuaded the king to have retained him, urging in his behalf his exceeding honesty, while compelled to admit he was not possessed of remarkable ability. "A little less honesty," replied the king, "and a little more ability might, upon the present occasion, better serve our turn."

The government, although still amusing the French with their professions of peace, had decided to maintain vigorously all its pretensions on this continent, and with this view to send out an adequate force under one of the bravest and most accomplished soldiers of the empire. Such, in the opinion of the Duke of Cumberland, captain-general of the army, was Maj.-Gen. Edward Braddock, whom Horace Walpole describes as "desperate in his fortune, brutal in his behavior, and obstinate in his sentiments," but admits that he was still "intrepid and capable." Gen. Braddock was ordered to proceed to Virginia, as commander-in-chief of all the British troops in North America, on Sept. 24, 1754, but did not sail until the 21st of December. He set sail in the "Norwich," convoyed by the "Centurion," flag-ship of Commodore Keppel, and arrived in Hampton Roads on the 20th of February. He was soon followed by the rest of the fleet, with two regiments, each of five hundred men, one under Col. Sir Peter Halket, and the other under Col. Thomas Dunbar. Two more regiments, each of one thousand men, were to be raised in the colonies at the king's expense, and commanded by Sir William Pepperell and Governor Shirley, of Massachusetts. These, with the independent companies, the levies expected of the several colonies, and such Indians as enlisted, it was thought would make up an effective force of not less than twelve thousand men. When Governor Sharpe received information of the appointment of Gen. Braddock, he proceeded, on the 13th of January, 1755, on a tour of inspection to the scene of anticipated operations, in the neighborhood of Will's Creek. In one week after his arrival he was joined by Sir John St. Clair, lieutenant-colonel of O'Farrell's Twenty-second Regiment of Foot, and quartermaster-general of all the British forces in America, who was then actively engaged in visiting military posts, making contracts for supplies, and acquainting himself generally with the scene of his future operations.\(^1\) Having procured from every source all the maps and information that were obtainable respecting the country through which the expedition was to pass, he and Governor Sharpe descended the Potomac River two hundred and fifty miles in a canoe, and reached Annapolis on the 2d of February, whence they went to Williamsburg, Va., to await Gen. Braddock's arrival, which was hailed with great joy by the people of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, as they looked forward with confidence to the defeat of the French and the early termination of the war, and possibly thought that the cost of the undertaking would mainly fall where it justly belonged, upon the mother-country.

On the 10th of March Gen. Braddock forwarded letters to the Governors of the different colonies, desiring them to meet him at Annapolis on the 1st of April for consultation and to settle a plan of operations. On the 26th, accompanied by Governor Duwiddie and Commodore Keppel, he arrived at Alexandria, where the troops were encamped, and issued his first general order the next day. Here Governor Sharpe paid him a visit on the 28th. On the 3d of April the general, with a numerous suite, arrived at Annapolis, but, owing to the absence of Governors Shirley, De Lancey, and Morris, the council was postponed till the 14th, the place of meeting being changed to Alexandria. On the 11th and 12th, Governors Shirley, of Massachusetts, De Lancey, of New York, and Morris, of Pennsylvania, arrived at Annapolis, and, in company with Governor Sharpe, proceeded to the general's headquarters at Alexandria, where, on the 14th, he laid before them his instructions and his plans for the summer's operations. He proposed to proceed in person against Fort Du Quesne, while Shirley commanded an expedition against Niagara, and Sir William Johnston one against Crown Point. The plan having been agreed upon, and the details arranged, the council broke up, and Governors Shirley, De Lancey, and Morris returned to Annapolis on the 17th with Governor Sharpe, whose hospitality they enjoyed for several days.

Gen. Braddock had written to the Duke of Newcastle from Williamsburg on the 1st of March, that he should be beyond the Alleghenies by the end of April; and, in compliance with this promise, he now hurried his arrangements for a forward movement.

By Col. St. Clair's advice, it was decided to march from Alexandria in two divisions: one regiment and a portion of stores were to be sent to Winchester, Va., whence a new road was nearly completed to Fort Cumberland, and the other regiment, with the remaining forces, were to move by the way of Frederick, Md. Accordingly, on the 8th and 9th of April the provincials and six companies of the Forty-fourth Regiment, Sir Peter Halket, set out for Winchester, Lieut.-Col. Gage and four companies remaining to escort the artillery. On the 18th of April the Forty-eighth Regiment, under Col. Dunbar, marched for Frederick, detaching a company to the mouth of the Conococheague Creek (a large stream which flows into the Potomac in Washington County) to hasten the forwarding of the stores gathered there. Arriving at Frederick, Col. Dunbar found there was no road through Maryland to Fort Cumberland, and he accordingly, on the 1st of May, crossed the Potomac at the mouth of the Conococheague, and took the Winchester route. For the purpose of expediting the necessary preparations for transporting the supplies, Governor Sharpe, on the 22d of April, went to Frederick, where a portion of the army was then quartered. At this point, on the 24th of April, he met Gen. Braddock, Col. Washington, and Benjamin Franklin, the two latter having met for the first time. Washington had been invited by Gen. Braddock to serve as one of his sides-de-camp in the campaign. Franklin, then the British postmaster-general of the colonies, had met Braddock here for the purpose of concerting a plan for forwarding supplies, and learning the scarcity of wagons, undertook to furnish them from Pennsylvania. By adroit means he succeeded in obtaining from the counties of Lancaster, York, and Cumberland one hundred and fifty wagons with four horses to each, and fifteen hundred pack- or saddle-horses needed for the expedition. Besides this assistance, Governor Sharpe tells us Gen. Braddock did "not scruple in enlisting and taking away a good many servants from the inhabitants of Frederick, Prince George's, and Baltimore Counties, as well as impressing their wagons, horses, teamsters, carriages, and carriage horses."

To such an extent were the seizures made that the contractors for the new court-house, which was then being erected in Frederick, found it impossible to obtain horses to haul the materials to the site of the building. "He was extremely warm and angry" at this time, "and stormed like a lion rampant."

Braddock, while at Frederick, purchased of Governor Sharpe an English chariot, with six horses, in which he rode, and on the 1st of May, accompanied by his staff and guard of light-horse, he left Frederick for Will's Creek, by the way of Winchester, the road along the north side of the Potomac not being yet made. The discomforts of the rough road were increased for Gen. Braddock by his mode of traveling, which was not suited to the mountainous country through which he was passing. Accompanied by his staff, he overtook Dunbar's division near Will's Creek, his body-guard of light-horse galloping on each side of his chariot, the drums beating the Grenadier's March as he passed. In this style, too, he arrived at Fort Cumberland on May 10th, amid a thundering salute of seventeen guns.

By this time he discovered that he was not in a region fitted for such display, and his traveling chariot was abandoned at Fort Cumberland; otherwise it would soon have become a wreck among the mountains beyond.

On arriving at the fort on the 10th of May, Braddock found Sir Peter Halket already there, with six companies of the Forty-fourth, with which he had marched from Alexandria. The remaining four companies of his regiment, which had been left with Lieut.-Col. Gage to escort the artillery, were still delayed, but by the 22d of the month all the forces were assembled at the appointed rendezvous, with the exception of a North Carolina company, which did not reach there until the 30th. Braddock now mustered two thousand effective men.

The regiments of Dunbar and Halket, originally one thousand strong, were now increased to fourteen hundred by volunteers and conscripts, principally procured in Maryland; and besides these there were the two independent companies from New York; five companies of rangers, and two of carpenters and pioneers, principally from Virginia; one company of rangers from Maryland, two companies of rangers from North and South Carolina, and thirty seamen, under a lieutenant of the navy, furnished by Admiral Keppel, having four pieces of cannon, which they were to assist in dragging over the mountains. Among the officers present who afterwards distinguished themselves in the Revolution were Thomas Cresap, Hugh Mercer, George Washington, Daniel Morgan, Thomas Gage, and Horatio Gates.1

1 The route of march of the army after leaving Frederick, on the 28th of April, was as follows: On the 1st of May, Col. Dunbar, after building a bridge over the Antietam, crossed the Potomac at the mouth of the Conococheague, so as to strike the Winchester road. On the 5th he crossed the Little Cacapon, and on the 8th was again ferried over the Potomac to Maryland from a spot near the mouth of Cacapon, which has since that day borne the name of the Ferry Fields. Thence along the riverside, through Old Town, the dwelling place of Col. Thomas Cresap, it passed through the narrows at the foot of Will's Mountain into Cumberland. The house of Cresap, the

Being at last ready to undertake the long and tedious journey that was before him, Gen. Braddock gave orders for the army to advance. On the 30th of May, Sir John St. Clair, with Maj. Chapman and six hundred men of the Forty-fourth Regiment, were sent forward to clear the road to the Little Meadows, on the Youghiogheny, thirty miles distant, where they were to erect a fortified camp. The army followed in three divisions: the first, under Col. Halket, on the 7th of June; the next, under Lieut.-Col. Gage, on the 8th; and the third, under Col. Dunbar, on the 10th, when Braddock also set off, with his aides-de-camp and others of his staff and his body-guard of light-horse. Fort Cumberland, with the hospital filled with invalids, was left under the care of Col. Jones.

Braddock's army consisted of the Forty-fourth Regiment of (English) Infantry, Col. Sir Peter Halket; the Forty-eighth, Col. Thomas Dunbar; sundry independent (colonial) companies; a company of horse, another of artillery, a company of marines, etc.; in all, two thousand one hundred and ninety, besides the usual train of non-militants who always accompany an army. The other field-officers were Lieut.-Cols. Burton and Gage (of Bunker Hill notoriety); Majs. Chapman and Sparks; Maj. Sir John St. Clair, deputy quartermaster-general; Matthew Leslie, his assistant; Francis Halket, brigade-major; William Shirley, secretary; and Robert Orme, Roger Morris, and George Washington, Esqs., aides-de-camp to the general. Among the captains were: Stephen, Lewis, Polson, Hogg, Peyronie, Mercer, and Waggoner. These commanded provincial troops, chiefly from Virginia. The New York independent companies were commanded by Capts. Rutherford and Horatio Gates, the Gen. Gates to whom Burgoyne surrendered at Saratoga. Christopher Gist and his son Nathaniel accompanied the army as guides; George Croghan, the Indian agent of Aughtick, with Montour, interpreter, also accompanied the army, trying to be useful in the Indian department, aided by Monacotoutha and Capt. Jack, the "wild hunter of the Juniata."

Among the Virginia surgeons were Drs. James Craik and Hugh Mercer, men of imperishable fame, ruins of which are still standing near the canal, was half dwelling and half fortress. To this strongly fortified castle the settlers in this section of the province repaired whenever there was danger of an Indian attack. Cresap then called the place Skip- ton, after the place of his nativity in England. It is situated on the north fork of the Potomac, a few miles above the junction of the north and south branches of the Potomac. The residence of his son, Michael Cresap, a large stone building, is still standing in the centre of the town.
They were both Scotchmen, the latter having fled to Virginia from the fatal field of Culloden. Dr. Craik had followed Washington in his campaign of 1754, was his companion in his journey to the West in 1770, and was his physician at his death. Dr. Mercer became a field-officer in the Revolution, and fell at Princeton in January, 1777.

Some idea of the difficulties Braddock's forces encountered may be had when it is stated that they spent the third night only five miles from the first. The place of encampment, which is about one-third of a mile from the toll-gate on the National road, is marked by a copious stream bearing Braddock's name. For reasons not easy to divine, the route across Will's Mountain, first adopted for the National road, was selected, instead of the more favorable one through the narrows of Will's Creek, to which the road was subsequently changed for the purpose of avoiding that formidable ascent. The traces are very distinct on the east and west slopes, the modern road crossing it frequently. From the western foot the route continued up Braddock's Run to the forks of the stream, where Clary's tavern now stands, nine miles from Cumberland, when it turned to the left in order to reach a point on the ridge favorable to an easy descent into the valley of George's Creek. It is surprising that having reached this high ground, the favorable spur by which the National road accomplishes the ascent of the Great Savage Mountain did not strike the attention of the engineers, as the labor requisite to surmount the barrier from the deep valley of George's Creek must have contributed greatly to those bitter complaints which Braddock made against the colonial government for their failure to assist him more effectually in the transportation department.

Passing then a mile to the south of Frostburg, the road approaches the east foot of Savage Mountain, which it crosses about one mile south of the National road; and thence by very favorable ground through the dense forests of white pine peculiar to this region, it got to the north of the National road, near the gloomy tract called the "Shades of Death." This was the 15th of June, when the dense gloom of the summer woods, and the favorable shelter which these enormous pines would give an Indian enemy, must have made a most sensible impression on all minds of the insecurity of their mode of advance. This doubtless had a share in causing the council of war held at the Little Meadows next day. To this place, distant only about twenty miles from Cumberland, Sir John Sinclair and Maj. Chapman had been dispatched on the 30th of May to build a fort, as we have already seen, and the army having been seven days in reaching it, it follows, as the line of march was upwards of three miles long, the rear was just getting under way when the advance were lighting their evening fires.

Here it may be well enough to clear up an obscurity which enters into many narratives of these early events from confusing the names of "Little Meadows" and "Great Meadows," "Little Crossings" and "Great Crossings," which are all distinct localities.

The "Little Meadows" have been described as at the foot of Meadow Mountain; it is well to note that the "Great Meadows" are about thirty-one miles farther west, and near the east foot of Laurel Hill. By the "Little Crossings" is meant the ford of Casselman's River, a tributary of the Youghiogheny itself. The Little Crossing is two miles west of the Little Meadows, and the Great Crossing seventeen miles farther west.

The conclusion of the council was to push on with a picked force of twelve hundred men and twelve pieces of cannon, and the line of march, now more compact, was resumed on the 19th.

While these events were occurring in the western part of Maryland, the Governor and the Lower House of Assembly were quarreling over the requisitions made by Gen. Braddock for supplies for his army.

On June 25th the Governor sent to the Lower House the following message:

"Gentlemen of the Lower House of Assembly:

"I have just received letters from Col. James at Fort Cumberland, and from the back inhabitants of Frederick County, advising me that a party of French Indians last Monday morning (June 23) fell on the inhabitants of this province, and killed two men and one woman (who have been since found dead), eight other persons they have taken prisoners and carried off. The names of the persons who were murdered and left are John Williams, his wife, and grandson, and with their bodies also was found that of a French Indian. The persons carried off are Richard Williams (a son of John who was murdered), with two children, one Dawson's wife and four children. Richard Williams' wife and two brothers of the young man that is killed have made their escape. This accident, I find, has so terrified the district inhabitants that many of them are retiring and forsaking their plantations. Another letter from Winchester, in Virginia, informs me that a party of Indians have also attacked the back inhabitants of that province, of whom they have killed eleven and carried away many captives. Apprehending the French would proceed in this manner as soon as Gen. Braddock and the troops under his control should have passed the mountains, and being confirmed in my opinion by an intimation in the general's letter, I issued a proclamation near a month since, cautioning the distant and other inhabitants of this province to be on their guard, and unite for their common defence and safety. At the same time I sent peremptory orders and instructions to the officers of the militia of Frederick County frequently to muster and discipline their several troops and companies, once a fortnight at least, and in case of alarm that the enemy was approaching or had fallen on the inhabitants, to march out and act either offensively or defensively, and use all means to protect and defend the inhabitants from the devastations of the French or Indians. However, I find neither the proclamation nor instructions will be effective unless the militia can be assured that they shall receive satisfaction, and be paid for the time they are on duty. I should consider it highly proper for us to have about one hundred, or at least a company of men, posted or constantly ranging for some time on the frontiers for our protection. In this I desire your advice, and that you will enable me to support such a number.

"Gentlemen:

"At the general's request, and that I might receive early intelligence at this time from the camp and back inhabitants, I have engaged several persons between here and Will's Creek to receive and speedily convey any letters that shall come to them directed for the general or myself. I doubt not that you will be convinced of the necessity of such a measure, and provide for the expense thereof."

The House, on the same day, took into consideration the Governor's message, and immediately passed the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That this House will make suitable arrangements for the maintaining of eighty men, including officers, for four months (if occasion) for ranging on the frontiers of this province, to protect the same against the incursions or depredations which may be attempted or made by the French or their Indian allies.

"Resolved, further, That this House will defray the reasonable expense of conveying intelligence from Will's Creek to Annapolis and back thither for four months."

With some slight amendments the Upper House agreed to the resolutions, and two thousand pounds were appropriated for the purposes therein mentioned. On the 5th of July the Governor sent another message to the Lower House informing them that bands of hostile Indians were entering the province, and that fifteen persons in Frederick County on their way to Fort Cumberland for protection had been killed or captured by the savages.

During all this time the possibility of Braddock's defeat had been as little dreamed of by the colonists as by that confident commander himself. The immense superiority of the English over French troops had become, since Marlborough's time, an article of the British creed, and to the regulars at least their Indian allies, who knew nothing of drill or discipline, who never met a foe in the open field, and carried into warfare the tactics and strategy of the forest hunter, seemed beneath contempt, and only formidable to sentinels, stragglers, and "raw militia-men." The colonists, however, knew them better, and the general had been warned of the possibility of a surprise, and had received the caution with the scorn he had bestowed on the militia and all their doings. But even of the provincials, only a few who were with the army thought any disaster possible; elsewhere victory was regarded as settled. Preparations were made in Philadelphia and Annapolis for celebrating the assured triumph, and money was freely subscribed for illuminations and general festivities as soon as the couriers should bring the joyful news.

Resuming the march, and passing over ground to the south of the Little Crossing and of the village of Grantsville, which it skirted, the army spent the night of the 21st of June at the Bear Camp, a locality supposed to be about halfway to the Great Crossings, which it reached on the 23d. The route thence to the Great Meadows, or Fort Necessity, was well chosen, though over a mountainous tract, conforming very nearly to the ground now occupied by the National road, and keeping on the dividing ridge between the waters flowing into the Youghiogheny on the one hand, and the Cheat River on the other. Having crossed the Youghiogheny, the army was now on the classic ground of Washington's early career, where the skirmish with Jumonville and the battle of Fort Necessity had occurred the year before. About one mile west of the Great Meadows, and near the spot now marked as Braddock's Grave, the road struck off more to the northwest, in order to reach a pass through Laurel Hill, that would enable them to strike the Youghiogheny at a point afterwards known as Stewart's Crossing, and about half a mile below the present town of Connellsville. This part of the route is marked by the farm known as Mount Braddock.

One month was spent in the march from Fort Cumberland to the fatal field. The route as far as Gist's was that of Washington the year before; and although Washington had marched from Will's Creek to the Meadows in twenty-three days, making the road as he went, yet it took Braddock eighteen days to drag his slow length along over the same distance, and Dunbar eight days longer. Truly did Washington say that "instead of pushing on with vigor, without regarding a little rough road, they were halting to level every molehill and erect bridges over every brook." This needless delay, like everything else in this campaign, contributed its share to the disastrous result; for while Braddock was halting and bridging the enemy was collecting a force for resistance and attack which three days' prompter movement would have anticipated. At the Little Meadows (Tomlinson's) a division of the army in the march was made: the general and Col. Halket, with select portions of the two regiments and of the other forces, lightly incumbered, going on in advance, being in all about fourteen hundred. Col. Dunbar, with the residue, about eight hundred and fifty, and the heavy baggage, artillery, and stores, were left to move up by "slow and easy marches," an order which he executed so literally as to earn for himself the sobriquet of "Dunbar the tardy." When, on the 28th of June, Braddock was at Stewart's Crossing (Connellsville), Dunbar was only at the Little Crossings. Here Washington, under a violent attack of fever, had been left by Braddock, under the care of his friend Dr. Craik and a guard, two days in advance of Dunbar, to come on with him when able, the gallant aide requiring from the general a "solemn pledge" not to arrive at the French fort until he should rejoin him; and as Washington did not report himself until the day before the battle, this pledge may be some apology for Braddock having consumed eighteen precious days in marching about eighty miles. According to Capt. Orme's journal, the encampments, etc., of Braddock in Fayette County, Pa., were as follows:

On the 24th of June he marched from Squaw's Fort (near Somerset) six miles to a camp east of the Great Meadows, near the "twelve springs." He crossed the Yough without bridging about half a mile above where the National road now crosses it. In this day's march they passed a recently-abandoned Indian camp, indicating by the number of huts that about one hundred and seventy had been there. "They had stripped and painted some trees, upon which they and the French had written many threats and bravadoes, with all kinds of sencefulious language." This encampment of Braddock was between Mount Augusta and Marlow's road, south of the National road.

June 25th. The army moved about seven miles, and encamped in what is now the Old Orchard, near and northwest of "Braddock's Grave," called then, two miles west of Great Meadows,—the general riding in anticipated triumph over the very spot which in twenty days was to be his last encampment. The army seems to have passed the ruins of Fort Necessity without a halt or a notice. It is singular they did not encamp there, for Orme says they were late in getting to their ground, because that morning, about a quarter of a mile after starting, they had to let their carriages down-hill with tackle. In this day's march three men were shot and scalped by the enemy, and the sentinels fired upon some French and Indians whom they discovered reconnoitering their camp,—an annoyance now become so frequent that on the next day Braddock offered a bounty of five pounds for every scalp that his Indians or soldiers would take.

June 26th. They marched only about four miles by reason of the "extreme badness of the road," arriving at what Orme calls Rock Fort, on Laurel Hill, a place now known as the Great Rock, near Washington Spring and the Half King's old camp, being a little more than two miles southward of Dunbar's camp. "At our halting-place," says Orme, "we found another Indian camp, which they had abandoned at our approach, their fires being yet burning. They had marked in triumph upon trees the scalps they had taken two days before, and many of the French had written on them their names and sundry insolent expressions. We picked up a commission on the march, which mentioned the party being under the command of the Sieur Normannville. This Indian camp was in a strong situation, being upon a high rock, with a very narrow and steep ascent to the top. It had a spring in the middle, and stood at the termination of the Indian path to the Monongahela at Redstone. By this pass the party came which attacked Mr. Washington last year, and also this which attended us. By their tracks they seem to have divided here, the one party being straight forward to Fort Du Queene and the other returning by Redstone Creek to the Monongahela. A captain's detachment of ninety-four men marched with guides, to fall in the night upon the latter division. They found a small quantity of provisions and a very large batteau, which they destroyed, but saw no men, and the captain joined the general the next day at Gist's."

June 27th. "We marched from the camp at Rock Fort to Gist's Plantation, which was about six miles, the road still mountainous and rocky. Here the advancing party was relieved, and all the wagons and carrying horses with provision belonging to that detachment joined us." This advanced party consisted of about four hundred, under Lieut.-Col. Burton, who, with Sir John St. Clair, had been sent in advance to cut and make the road, taking with them two six-pounders, with ammunition, three wagons of tools, and thirty-five days' provisions, all on pack-horses.

June 28th. The army marched from Gist's, where the encampment was near Washington's of the previous year, to a camp near to and west of Stewart's Crossing of the Yough, a short half-mile below New Haven, on land subsequently belonging to Daniel Rogers, formerly Col. William Crawford. It has been commonly supposed that a division of the army here took place, the English troops, etc., crossing the river and bearing northward, while the Virginia or colonial forces went down the river and crossed at the Broad Ford, thence bearing more to the west, crossing Jacob's Run at Stouffer's mill, the two divisions reuniting at Sewickley, near Painter's Salt-Works. Orme's journal has no notice of any such division. The Broad Ford route may be that which was traversed by the detachments or convoys of provisions, etc., from Dunbar's division, which were from time to time sent up to the main army; one of which, Orme says, came up at Thickety Run, a branch of Sewickley, on the 5th of July. Another detachment of one hundred men, with pack-horse loads of flour and some beeces, according to Washington's letters, left the camp west of the Great Meadows on the 3d of July, with which he went, joining the army on the 8th, the day before the battle, "in a covered wagon." This convoy took up the one hundred beeces which were among the losses in the defeat. It is a noticeable fact that Washington, enfeebled by a consuming fever, was so invigorated by the sight of the scenes of his discomfiture the previous year as to seize the opportunity of celebrating its first anniversary by hastening on to participate in an achievement which, as he fondly hoped, would restore to his king and country all that had been lost by his failure.

June 30th. The army to-day crossed the Yough at Stewart's Crossing or Ford in strict military style, with advanced guard first passed and posted. There is here a little confusion in Capt. Orme's journal. Not only does he make the west to be the east side of the Yough, but he says, "We were obliged to encamp about a mile on to the west (east) side, where we halted a day, to cut a passage over a mountain. This day's march did not exceed two miles!" It would seem the halt was on the 29th, before crossing the river, for the march is resumed on the 1st of July. This "mountain" is the bluff known as the "Narrows," below Davidson's mill. The camp is not certainly known, probably on land late of Robert Long, deceased; perhaps, south of the Narrows, on Mr. Davidson's land.

July 1st. Says Orme, "We marched about five miles, but could advance no farther by reason of a great swamp, which required much work to make it passable." The course was northeastward. The swamp can be no other than that fine-looking champaign land above the head-waters of Martin's Creek and Jacob's Creek, north and east of the Old Chain Bridge, embracing lands formerly belonging to Col. Isaac Meason, and afterwards to George E. Hogg and others.

July 2d. The army moved in the same direction (east of north) about six miles, to "Jacob's Cabin." The localities of this and the last preceding camp cannot be precisely fixed, and the curious reader and topographer is left to his own conclusion from the data given. Jacob's cabin was doubtless the abode of an Indian, who gave his name to the creek on which he trapped and hunted.

July 3d. "The swamp being repaired, we marched about six miles to Saltlick Creek." This Saltlick Creek is Jacob's Creek, and the camp at the end of the day's march was near Webbhouse's mill, about a mile below Mount Pleasant. From Webbhouse's mill the course was northward, passing just to the west of Mount Pleasant; thence crossing Sewickley (Thickety) Run near Painter's Salt-Works; thence bearing a little westward, it crossed the present tracks of the Pennsylvania Railroad and turnpike, west of Greensburg, to the Bush Fork of Turtle Creek. Here Braddock abandoned his wise design to approach the French fort by the ridge route, or Neamnoch's path, being deterred by the difficulties of crossing the deep and rugged ravines of the streams. Turning, at almost a right angle, westward, he got into the valley of Long Run at or near Stewartsville, and went down it past Samson's mill, encamping on the night of the 8th of July, where Washington joined him, about two miles east of the Monongahela. The army moved from this encampment early next morning, turning into the valley of Crooked Run, which they followed to its mouth, and crossed the river at "Braddock's upper ford," below McKeesport; thence down the river on the west side about three miles to Braddock's lower ford, just below the mouth of Turtle Creek and Dam No. 2, where they recrossed to the fatal encounter of the 9th of July. This double crossing of the river was to avoid the intervening narrows.

Braddock had conducted the march hitherto with most commendable care and with signal success; and now, as he neared the object of his labor and ambition, he took all the precautionary measures to avoid surprise and disaster which his military education suggested. But, unfortunately, he knew nothing of Indian strategy or backwoods tactics. He was sensible that his near approach was known at the French fort, and that all his movements were closely and secretly watched. Hence at the crossings of the river he had his advanced guards well posted, and having caused his soldiers to be well apprized and their arms brightened, he made a display well calculated to strike terror into the enemy. Washington was wont to say that he never saw a more animating sight than the army's second crossing of the Monongahela. Nevertheless, Sir Peter Halket, Mr. Secretary Shirley, and Maj. Washington were not without anxious forebodings. Controverse, the commandant of the fort, frightened at the exaggerated reports of the numbers of the English, had prepared to surrender or to fly, as his successor did before Gen. Forbes in 1758. Indeed, he reluctantly yielded assent to any resistance. And when, on the 8th, MM. Beaneau, Dumas, and De Ligneris sought a detachment of regulars and Indian aid, it was merely to dispute the river passes, and to annoy and retard the march of the English. They had caused the ground to be thoroughly examined, and knew well the ravines, or natural trenches, which so well served them for attack and protection in the conflict. To comprehend the nature of the action and the inevitableness of Braddock's defeat one must visit the ground. He will there, even yet, see the two ravines, dry, with almost perpendicular banks, just high enough to conceal, protect, and fire from, capable of containing an army of two thousand men. And if he will imagine the second bank to be densely wooded, and covered with a thick and tangled web of pea-vine and other undergrowth, with a newly-cut road, twelve feet wide, passing about midway between the ravines, and at no place more than eighty yards distant from one or the other, he will have fully before him the scene of the disaster. The French and Indians were about nine hundred strong, the latter being more than two-thirds of the force. They arrived on the ground too late to dispute the passage of the river. The army had crossed, formed its line of march, and was moving —marching into the snare—when the enemy appeared right in front, and near the heads of the ravines.

As if by magic, at a preconcerted silent signal from M. Beaujust, the chief in command, the Indians at once disappeared right and left into the excavations, leaving only the little French line visible. These were engaged with spirit and success by Lt.-Col. Gage, and until the Indians began to pour in their invisible deadly shots fortune seemed to incline to the English. It soon changed, and no efforts could restore it. Even tree-fighting could not have saved the doomed English soldiery, who held their ground, fought well, and obeyed their officers as long as they had officers to command them. They were in the jaws of death, and nothing could have delivered them except perhaps a raking fire of grape or round-shot up and down the ravine. The excuse for not essaying this expedient is that the ravines were unknown and invisible. Even yet, when all is clear around them, you do not discern them until you are almost upon them.

In the narrow road, but twelve feet wide, the men were huddled into a confused mass, firing at random into the trees, while the enemy, whom they could not see, but whose numbers seemed multiplied tenfold by their hideous yells and whoopings, moved them down by a well-directed fire. Frantic with rage and excitement, Braddock endeavored to restore order and extricate his force from this slaughter-pen; and four horses were shot under him as, reckless of his own life, he flew from point to point. His officers dis-mounted and formed into platoons, to set their men an example, and thus made themselves fair marks for the Indians' rifles, but their self-devotion was fruitless. The provincials, skilled in forest-fighting, at once sheltered themselves behind trees, and the regulars would have followed their example had Braddock allowed it, but he refused to give the order; and such was the force of discipline, or the bewildering effects of panic, that the men were mowed down as they stood, neither flying or taking cover. Many were slain by the fire of their own comrades, who had lost the power of distinguishing friend from foe.

Thus for hours the slaughter went on. The ammunition was giving out; the officers were nearly all killed or wounded, not a single aide but Washington being left; more than half the army had fallen, and the rest could do nothing where they were but die. Braddock gave the order for retreat, and almost at the same moment a ball pierced his right arm and entered his lungs, inflicting a mortal wound. The retreat became a headlong flight, which the dying general in vain attempted to check. A few men gathered around him, bore him from the field, and obeyed his orders; and despite his agonies he employed every remaining moment of his life in endeavoring to provide for the safety of the survivors, repair in what slight measure he could the disaster his rashness had caused, and bring back the shattered remnant of his great army to Great Meadows, where he died. 1

Of the fourteen hundred and sixty, besides women and other camp-followers who crossed the Monongahela, four hundred and fifty-six were killed, four hundred and twenty-one wounded, many of them mortally. Out of eighty-nine commissioned officers, sixty-three were killed or wounded.

1 It is uncertain whether Braddock was killed by the enemy or by one of his own men. There is a strong probability that he was killed in revenge by Thomas Fossett, a Pennsylvania provincial, whose brother Joseph, it is said, Braddock struck dead with his sword for having taken shelter behind a tree during the battle. Braddock was buried about two miles west of Fort Necessity, near the banks of a small stream, immediately in the road, a short distance from the present National road. About 1824, says Lowdermilk, a party of workmen, engaged in repairing the old road, came upon the remains of a human skeleton, supposed to be that of Braddock. The remains were carried to a point about one hundred and fifty yards eastward, and buried in a field at the foot of a large oak-tree, some twenty-five yards from the National road. By the direction of Hon. Andrew Stewart the spot was marked by a board, upon which was inscribed the fact that this was the last resting-place of Maj.-Gen. Edward Braddock, and this board was nailed to the tree. Some twelve years ago the tree was blown down, leaving nothing but a portion of the trunk to mark the place. In 1871 a party of English visitors had the spot inclosed with a strong board fence.
The Gentleman's Magazine, of August, 1755, gives the following list of officers who were present, and of those who were killed and wounded in this disastrous engagement:

Capt. Evan Shelby's name was omitted by the Gentleman's Magazine, by mistake no doubt. He was a captain of rangers, and participated in the battle. He was a Welshman by birth. He subsequently served in Forbes' expedition with great honor, and was the father of Gen. Isaac Shelby, a distinguished Revolutionary officer. Lieut. Henry Gladwin, of the English Forty-eighth Regiment, afterwards was deputy adjutant-general in America.

All the artillery and ammunition, baggage, provisions, wagons, and many horses were lost. The general lost his military chest, containing, it is said, £25,000 in specie (£125,000) and all his papers. Washington also lost many valuable papers. In short, the officers and soldiers who escaped the carnage lost nearly everything except the clothes on their backs and the arms in their hands, many abandoning even the latter. Capt. Orme saved his journal, now almost the only authentic continuous record of this most disastrous campaign.

Braddock displayed, in the perplexing circumstances of the action, great activity and courage. He had four horses shot under him, and after having mounted a fifth, while in the act of issuing an order, near the head of one of the ravines, and near the end of the conflict, he received a mortal wound, the ball shattering his right arm and passing into his lungs. He fell to the ground, "surrounded by the dead and almost abandoned by the living;" and had it not been for the devotedness of his aide, Capt. Orme, and the almost obstinate fidelity of Capt. Stewart, of Virginia, who com-manned the light-horse, the fallen general would have had his wish gratified,—that the scene of his disaster should also witness his death. He was borne from the ground at great risk, at first in a tumbrel, then on a horse. Every officer above the grade of a captain was now either killed or disabled except Washington, who escaped unhurt, though two horses were shot under him and his clothes pierced with balls, so feeble and emaciated that day (from his late sickness with the fever) that he had to ride upon a pillow. The drums had beat a retreat before Braddock fell, and new Washington undertook to give it whatever order it was susceptible of, for it was a headlong flight.

The retreat was by the same route as the advance, crossing the river at the same fording. The enemy did not pursue, but remained to riot in scalps and plunder. Braddock was carried with the little remnant of his army that could be held together. It is not probable that the panic-stricken fugitives all returned to Gist's by the same path, many, through fear of pursuit, betaking themselves to the woods and by-ways. The Pennsylvania wagoners, it is said, escaped to a man, astride their fleetest horses. Certain it is, by ten o'clock next morning several of them were in Dunbar's camp, on Laurel Hill, nearly forty miles distant, with the tidings, and one or two wounded officers were carried into the camp before noon of that day.

After crossing to the west side of the river in the flight, a rally was effected of about one hundred men, with whom were Braddock, Burton, and Washington. From this point Washington was sent to Dunbar for aid and wagons to convey the wounded. The road was then new, and hard to find in the night. There had been a coldness between the general and Dunbar, hence it was deemed necessary, to insure obedience, that Washington, as aide-de-camp, should go with orders. Weak and exhausted as he was, he shrunk not from his duty. He set out with two men, in a night so wet and dark that frequently they had to alight from their horses and grope for the road. Nevertheless, they reached Dunbar's camp about sunrise. Braddock and his followers reached Gist's about ten o'clock that evening.

Nathaniel Gist, son of Christopher, with "Gist's Indian," were dispatched from the battle-field to Fort Cumberland with tidings of the overthrow, but with instructions to avoid passing by or disturbing the repose of Dunbar. They traveled afoot and through unfrequented paths to avoid the Indians. While snatching some repose during the first night of their journey, in a thicket of bushes and grapevine on Cove's Run, a branch of Shoutis Run, within view of the camp-fires of Dunbar, they mistook the noise of the movement of some bird or beast for Indians, and taking to flight, became separated in the darkness. But each wended his way cautiously alone. When nearing their destination, upon emerging from the bushes into the open road, Gist saw ahead a few rods his long-lost Indian, who had also just taken to the highway. Although the sufferings of Braddock in mind and body were intense, he was not unmindful of his wounded soldiers. Upon the arrival, on the morning of the 11th, at Gist's of some wagons and stores from Dunbar, he sent off a convoy of provisions for the relief of those supposed yet to be behind, and ordered up more wagons and troops from the camp, to bring off the wounded.

It is probable these humane provisions were available but to few, except the general officers, and perhaps a few others. All the badly wounded were left on the bloody field to the merciless cruelties of the savages, or perished in its vicinity. In after-years human bones were found plentifully all around, some as far off as three miles. Having made these arrangements, had their wounds dressed, and taken some food, Braddock and the remnant of his command, on Friday, the 11th, moved up to Dunbar's camp.

Dunbar, as will be remembered, was at the Little Crossings on the 20th of June, with about eight hundred and fifty of the army, and the heavy artillery and the stores. On the 2d of July he passed the Great Meadows, and on the 10th is found at his camp on the top of Laurel Hill. How long he had lain there is uncertain, probably several days.

It is, perhaps, ample apology for the slow movements of Dunbar that, besides the rugged and steep passes of the mountains, the troops he had with him were the refuse of the army, very many of whom sickened and died on the way with the flux and for want of fresh provisions.

The Indians and French constantly annoyed his march and beset his camps, and having got in his rear, cut off much of his scanty supplies. But the great cause of delay was the want of horses to move his heavy train. After one day's toil at half the wagons and other vehicles, the poor jaded beasts had to go back the next day and tug up the other half, often moving not more than three miles a day, and consuming two days at each encampment. So exhausted were the horses that an officer of the train estimated it would require twenty-five days for Dunbar to overtake Braddock from the Great Meadows. And in the council of war held by Braddock at Jacob's Creek, on the 3d of July, to consider Sir John St. Clair's suggestion to halt and send back all their horses to bring up Dunbar's division, it was adjudged that with this aid he could not be brought up in less than eleven days, so weak were all the horses. Besides, it was never designed that Dunbar should overtake Braddock until the fort was captured. And this setting apart of him, his officers, and soldiers to an ignoble service—making it a "foregone conclusion" that they were not to share the honors or spoils of victory—soared their tempers and relaxed their exertions.

Dunbar's camp was situated southeast of the summit of Wolf's Hill, one of the highest points of Laurel Hill Mountain, and about three thousand feet above the level of the ocean. The site is in full view of Unioontown, to the eastward about six miles distant, and is visible from nearly all the high points in Fayette County and the adjacent parts of Greene and Washington Counties, Pa. The camp was about three hundred feet below the summit, and about half a mile's distance on the southern slope. It was then cleared of its timber, but has since become much overgrown with bushes and small trees. Near it are two fine sand springs, below which a dam of stones and earth, two or three feet high, was made to afford an abundant supply of water. This dam is still visible, though much overgrown by laurels. Into this spring, pool, or basin, it is said, when Dunbar's encampment was broken up, fifty thousand pounds of powder, with other material of war, were thrown, to render them useless to the enemy. Old Henry Beson, of Unioontown, used to relate that when he first visited this locality, in 1767, there were some six inches of black nitrous matter visible all over this spring basin.

The Turkey's Foot, or "Smith's road," from Bedford, crossed Braddock's, or Nenamolin's road just at this camp. Both are yet plainly visible, and the remains of an old stone chimney near the cross-roads indicate the site of an ancient tavern, where many a pioneer halted and many an old emigrant and settler took his ease.

When the remains of Braddock's division rejoined Dunbar here, on the 11th of July, the camp was found in great confusion and disorder. Many had fled the day before on the first tidings of the slaughter of the 9th, and as had been the case upon that disaster, the wagoners and pack-horse-drivers were among the first to fly, and were the earliest messengers of the defeat to Governor Morris, of Pennsylvania, then at Carlisle superintending the forwarding of supplies.

Orders still continued to be issued in Braddock's name, though his life was fast ebbing away. Retreat became inevitable. The camp was abandoned on the 12th. All the stores and supplies, artillery, etc., which had been brought hither at such great labor and expense, were destroyed. Nothing was saved beyond the actual necessities of a flying march. These included two six-pounders and some hospital stores, horses and light wagons for the sick and wounded, of whom there were three hundred. The rest of the artillery, cohorns, etc., were broken up, the shells burst, the powder thrown into the spring basin, the provisions and baggage scattered, and one hundred and fifty wagons burned. A few days afterwards some of the enemy came up and completed the work of destruction.

It has been a current tradition, based upon contemporary statements, that some of the field-pieces and other munitions of war, and even money, were buried or concealed near the camp, and much time and labor have been spent in fruitless search for them. This story, it seems, reached the ears of Dunbar while on his retreat from Will's Creek through Pennsylvania, and he and all his officers, in a letter to Governor Shirley, dated Aug. 21, 1755, expressly contradict it in these words: "We must beg leave to undeceive you in what you are pleased to mention of guns being buried at the time Gen. Braddock ordered the stores to be destroyed, for there was not a gun of any kind buried." However, such things as cannon balls, bullets, brass and iron kettles, crowsbills, files, some shells, iron of horse gears and wagons, etc., have been found by the early settlers and other explorers.

The remains of the reunited army encamped on the night of the 13th of July at the old orchard camp, "two miles west" of Fort Necessity. Here Braddock died, having, before he expired, it is said, but rather apocryphally, bequeathed to Washington his favorite charger and his body-servant, Bishop. Mr. Headley has endeavored to give to Braddock's funeral the romantic interest of the burial of Sir John Moore,—"darkly, at dead of night," by the light of a torch, instead of "lanterns dimly burning," and with the addition of Washington reading the funeral service. But he was buried in daylight, on the morning of the 14th, in the road near the run and old orchard, and the march of the troops, horses, and wagons passed over the grave to obliterate its traces, and thus prevent its desecration by the enemy. The tree labeled "Braddock's Grave" indicates the place, near by, where were reinterred, about 1829, some of the bones of a man supposed to be Braddock. The military accompaniments said to have been found with them indicate that they were. They had been dug out of the bank of the run in 1812, in repairing the old road. These may or may not have been the bones of Braddock. Several of the bones were carried off be-the southern or Virginia side of the Cohongornton, and the other on the Maryland side, within a short distance of the fort, from which the Indians frequently fired into it. On one occasion a rather large party of savages were posted on the knob on the Maryland side, and had given considerable annoyance, when a captain and seventy men volunteered to dislodge them. On a very dark night they sallied out from the fort, surrounded the knob, and cautiously ascending until they were within musket-shot of the foe, waited for daybreak. As soon as it was light they opened a brisk fire upon the Indians from all quarters, which threw them into utter confusion. Not knowing which way to escape, they were killed almost to a man, and the knob to this day bears the name of "Bloody Hill." Shorty after this "Kill-buck," a distinguished chief, attempted to take the fort by stratagem. H approached it at the head of a large force of warriors, and pretending that they came as friends and allies, asked to be admitted. The commander appeared to be deceived by the stratagem and opened the gates, but no sooner had the chief and his principal warriors entered than the gates were closed and the wily savage caught in a trap. The commander charged him with his treachery, and as a punishment dressed his prisoners in women's clothes and drove them from the fort, a humiliation which, to the haughty savage, was more bitter than a torturing death.

The alarm which the disaster on the Monongahela, the flight of the British troops, and the advance of the enemy occasioned spread over the whole province. Many of the inhabitants of the western settlements fled to Baltimore, and preparations were even made by the people of that town to place the women and children on board the vessels in the harbor and send them to Virginia, while some of the Virginians were so alarmed as to think there was no safety short of England itself. But there were others of firmer temper who proposed to meet the coming danger. In September, Lieut. Stoddert, assisted by fifteen pioneers from the surrounding settlements, erected a stockade fort, which served as a rallying-point for the settlers around. All those who lived beyond Tonalloway Creek abandoned their habitations, and the country, as far east as thirty miles east of Col. Cresap's, who lived about five miles west of the mouth of the South Branch of the Potomac, was deserted. Col. Thomas Cresap himself moved down the river to the plantation of his son, Michael Cresap, who lived near the Conococheague. The two Cresaps were distinguished among the hardy frontiersmen for courage, intelligence, and skill in Indian warfare.

1 On the return of the Maryland troops from their expedition against the Indians, under Braddock and Washington, Capt. Evan Shelby, who commanded a company of Frederick County Rangers, was received with every demonstration of joy.
They were always on the alert, and their timely warnings saved many of their neighbors from massacre. Their block-house, which was strong enough to resist the savages, served as a place of refuge in case of an invasion, and as a rendezvous for the settlers in more peaceful times, when they met to hear and tell their news, to try their skill as marksmen, or engage in friendly trials of strength or dexterity, and at night, seated around a huge log fire, they would tell adventures of war or the chase, and if by good luck any of them possessed a jewsharp or fiddle, and had the cunning to awaken its harmony, the evening wound up hilariously with a dance.

So now the frontiersmen gathered at Cresap's and strengthened his block-house for defense; others sought protection at Fort Cumberland and Frederick. Governor Sharpe, as we have already seen, had raised a number of volunteers at this town when on his way to the fort, and to defray their expenses subscriptions were raised throughout the province, Annapolis and the surrounding country alone furnishing in a very few days one thousand pounds. The people of Baltimore raised a large sum, with which they purchased arms and ammunition, and established a public armory in the town. The news from the frontiers, telling of Indian raids and massacres, kept up the alarm. In the Maryland Gazette of October 9th we have the following account of affairs in the West:

"By a person who arrived in town last Monday (October 6th) from Col. Cresap's, we are told that last Wednesday (October 1st) morning the Indians had taken a man prisoner who was going from Frazier's to Fort Cumberland, and had also carried off a woman from Frazier's plantation, which is four miles on this side Fort Cumberland. The same morning they fell in with a man and his wife who had left their plantations, and were retiring into the more populous part of the country; they shot the horse on which the man was riding, but as it did not fall immediately he made his escape. The woman, it is supposed, fell into their hands, as neither she or the horse on which she was riding have been seen since or heard of. The same party of Indians also have carried off or killed Benjamin Rogers, his wife, and seven children, and Edmund Marie, one family of twelve persons, besides fifteen others, all in Frederick County. On Patterson's Creek many families have within this month been murdered, carried away, or barrat in their houses by a party of these barbarians, who have entirely broke up that settlement.

"Another person, who left Stoddert's fort last Sunday, acquaints us that the inhabitants in that part of the country were in the greatest consternation. That near eighty persons were fled to the said fort for protection, and many more gone off in the greatest confusion to Pennsylvania. This, it seems, had been occasioned by a dispatch sent to Lieut. Stoddert and the neighborhood by Col. Cresap, advising them that a party of seventeen Indians had passed by his house and had cut off some people who dwelt on the Town Creek, which is a few miles on this side of Cresap's. One Daniel Ashloff, who lived near that creek, is come down towards Conococheague, and gives the same account. He says also that as himself and father, with several others, were retiring from their plantations last Saturday they were attacked by the same Indians, as he supposes, and all but himself were killed or taken prisoners. It is said that Mr. Stoddert, who has command of fifteen men, invited a few of the neighbors to join him and to go in quest of the enemy, but they would not be persuaded, whereupon he applied himself to Maj. Prather for a detachment of the militia, either to go with a party of his men in pursuit of the savages, or Garrison his fort while he made an excursion. We hope there will be no backwardness in the militia to comply with such a reasonable request, especially as any party or person that shall take an enemy prisoner will be rewarded with six pounds current, and the person who will kill an enemy, with four pounds, provided he can produce witnesses, or the enemy's scalp, in testimony of such action."

In consequence of these outrages, Governor Sharpe, on the 18th of October, called out the militia of the province. At the same time Capt. Alexander Beall and Lieut. Samuel Wade Magruder with thirty volunteers from the lower part of Frederick County, and Col. Henry Ridgeley with thirty more from Anne Arundel County, hastened to the invaded district. A few days afterwards sixty more volunteers, fully armed and equipped, went from Prince George's County to the West at their own expense. They arrived too late to punish the marauders, who had already made off with their booty and prisoners, but they remained to protect those who were left from further outrage.

Meanwhile, the alarm increased, and the wildest rumors were afloat. It was reported early in November that a large body of French and Indians were advancing upon the interior settlements, and this rumor reaching Frederick Town on Sunday, November 24th, the inhabitants, expecting an immediate attack, rang the bells as an alarm, and dispatched messengers to Baltimore and Annapolis for help. Several companies of volunteers at once mustered in Baltimore and the neighborhood, and marched without delay. The Indians came to within about fifteen miles of Frederick Town.

Governor Sharpe ordered into service the militia of Frederick, Prince George's, Baltimore, Cecil, Anne Arundel, Calvert, Charles, and St. Mary's Counties, to rendezvous at Frederick, Oct. 10, 1755. The troops were to march to Frederick, where James Dickson was to furnish them with provisions for five days; thence they were to march to the mouth of the Conoococheague, where George Ross was to furnish provisions to subsist them for eight days, or till they could reach Col. Cresap's, where they were to assist in the protection of the frontier.

In August, 1755, Col. Nathaniel Wickeham commanded the militia of Frederick County, and ordered all to be called to the protection of the frontier. Some of the scalping-parties approached within thirty miles of Baltimore, and though many of them were killed, terror spread from the very fact of their approach; but in the West the peril was real and constant; scarce any out-door labor was carried on except under the protection of the troops, or of armed bodies of settlers. It was at the risk of life that any one ventured a few rods away from his door; women visiting their sick neighbors were shot down or carried off; children bringing in the cattle from the field were tomahawked and scalped by the ambushed murderers. The plantations were being deserted, and homes and property abandoned to plunder or the torch, and all the remoter settlements were fast becoming a wilderness. Washington, harassed by want of sufficient support, and deeply pained by the scenes which he witnessed, wrote to Governor Dinwiddie, April 16, 1756,—

"I have done everything in my power to quiet the minds of the inhabitants by detaching all the men I have any command over to the places more exposed. There also have been large detachments from Fort Cumberland in pursuit of the enemy these ten days past, yet nothing, I fear, will prevent the people from abandoning their dwellings and flying with the utmost precipitation."

Six days later he writes,—

"The supplicating tears of the women and moving petitions of the men melt me into such deadly sorrow, that I solemnly declare, if I knew my own mind, I could offer myself a willing sacrifice to the butchering enemy, provided that would contribute to the people's case."

On the 24th he writes,—

"The deplorable situation of this people is no more to be described than my anxiety and uneasiness for their relief. You may expect by the time this comes to hand that, without a considerable reinforcement, Frederick County will not be mistress of fifteen families. They are now retreating to the securest parts in droves of fifties."

In consequence of this state of things, Governor Sharpe authorized Prather to organize all the forces on the frontiers, except those at Fort Cumberland, and operate between the Potomac and the Pennsylvania line. By the 11th of March, Prather had under his command one hundred and fifty efficient and hardy backwoodsmen skilled in Indian fighting. Capt. Alexander Beall, who commanded a company of volunteers, was also authorized to raise a force of one hundred men and join Maj. Prather. Extracts from the papers of the times will show the state of affairs and the public excitement. The Maryland Gazette of the 4th of March says,—

"Our accounts from the westward are truly alarming. All the slaughters, scalplings, burnings, and every other barbarity and mischief that the mongrel French, Indians, and their chieftain, the devil, can invent are often perpetrated there, and approach us higher and higher.

"By a person come to town this day from Frederick County we are told that last Sunday two boys, near Lawrence Wilson’s, in that county, were killed and scalped, and a son of one Mr. Lynn was found dead and scalped, himself and three more of his family missing. At the Little Cove all the houses were burned last week. The house of Ralph Matson, about half a mile from Stoddert’s Fort, was burned on Tuesday, last week. Some sheep which were in the pen near the house the Indians flung in the fire alive, others they killed, and some they scalped."

And on March 11th the Gazette published this extract from a letter dated Conococheague, February 29th:

"My last was of the 29th instant. On our march to Toonaloways, about five miles this side Stoddert’s Fort, we found John Meyers’ house in flames, and nine or ten head of large cattle killed. About three miles and a half farther up the road we found a man (one Hyne) killed and scalped, with one arm cut off and several arrows sticking in him; we could not bury him, having no tools with us for that purpose. Half a mile farther (within a mile of Stoddert's Fort) we found Ralph Watson’s house burnt down, and several hogs and sheep killed. When we came to Stoddert’s Fort we found them all under arms, expecting every minute to be attacked. From thence we went to Combe’s Fort, where we found a young man about twenty-two years of age killed and scalped; there were only four men in this fort, two of which were unable to bear arms, but upwards of forty women and children, who were in a very poor situation, being afraid to go out of the fort, even for a drink of water. The house caught fire during the time the Indians were surrounding the fort, and would have been burnt down, but luckily there was some rags in the house, by which they extinguished it. The young man mentioned above was one Lynn’s son, and was sitting on the fence of the stockyard with Combe’s son, when they discovered the Indians, upon which they ran to get into the fort, and before they reached it Lynn’s son was shot down, and an Indian pursued the other man with a tomahawk within thirty yards of the fort, but he luckily got into the fort and shot the Indian. We searched the woods to see if we could discover where the Indian was buried (as they supposed him to be mortally wounded). We found in two places great quantity of blood, but could not find the body. We saw several creatures shot, some dead, and others going around with arrows sticking in them. About half a mile on this side Mr. Kenney’s (in little Toonaloaway) we found a load of oats and a load of turnips in the road, which two boys were bringing to Combe’s, and it is imagined the boys are carried off by the Indians. When we came to Mr. Kenney’s we saw several sheep and cattle killed. From thence we went to one Lowther’s, about two miles farther, where we found his grain and two calves burnt, two cows and nine or ten hogs killed, and about fifty yards from the house found Lowther dead and scalped, and otherwise terribly mangled: his brains were beat out, as it is supposed, with his own gun-barrel, which we found sticking in his skull, and his gun broken; there was an axe, two scythes, and several arrows sticking in him. From here we returned to Combe’s and buried the young man, and left ten of our men here to assist them to secure their grain, which soon as they have done they purpose to leave that fort and go to Stoddert’s, from hence we went to Stoddert’s Fort, where we laid on Friday night and yesterday. On our way down here we buried the man we left on the road."

"Isaac Baker."

Under date of March 11th the Gazette reports that "one Mrs. Inglis, who was taken prisoner by the Shawnee when Col. Patton was killed, had made a wonderful escape from the Lower Shawnee Town, and that she was fourteen days in the woods on her way home, was naked all the time, and lived on chestnuts. The murders and burnings continued without abatement, and on April 8th the Gazette recites the "deposition" of James Tucker, who related that he was "at Capt. Waggoner's Fort in Virginia, and heard some of Capt. Waggoner's company say that Mr. John Bacon, lieutenant of Capt. Dagworthy's company, was killed and scalp'd by the Indians about four or five miles from Cumberland Fort, and also that two men with Lieut. Bacon were wounded, but made their escape to the fort. That he had heard that five men under the command of Capt. Ashby were killed by the enemy, and that the Indians had attacked one Cox Fort, but were repulsed. By the same express we have deposition of Aaron Ryley, taken yesterday (April 7, 1756), to the following effect: that he was at Adam Hoop's on the 5th instant, where he saw an express who brought letters to several people there, which he did not hear read, but was told by the man who brought them that on the 1st instant William M. Coard's Fort, within about five miles from Col. Chambers' Fort, which he thinks is about thirty miles from Fort Lyttleton, was taken, and thirty people were there killed and taken. Upon the news of this, Capt. Alexander Culverson marched from among the inhabitants with a party of men in pursuit of the Indians, and were joined by another party from Fort Lyttleton, the whole amounting to about fifty men. That the Indians were about twelve miles from Fort Lyttleton. That they came up with the Indians, fired upon them and killed several, and at length put them to flight; that they were so eager in pursuit that, though Indian Isaac, our friend, advised them to cut loose some of the prisoners which they had tied to trees, yet they omitted it. That the party had not pursued far before the Indians were joined by fifty more, as they supposed, who soon routed the white men, and of the whole fifty only fifteen were returned to Fort Lyttleton Sunday night last (April 4th)."

At the burning of Coard's Fort "one of the young women was very big with child, whom they ripped open, and scalped the infant."

While the Indians were thus laying waste the frontier settlements, a heartless attempt was made by some white adventurer on the border to turn the general alarm to their own advantage by pillaging the distressed inhabitants. In March (1756), "Thomas Mills, who came from Conococheague the beginning of last week, says that the inhabitants of that part of Frederick County were lately thrown into the greatest consternation by some parties firing guns and hallucinating, with a design to terrify the inhabitants and make them desert their habitations. He further says that upon the people's flying, the villains went and robbed their houses, and some of them have been since approached, and confessed what is above mentioned."

In the mean while the people of Frederick, Prince George's, and Baltimore Counties assailed the Lower House of Assembly with petitions. A memorial from Frederick Town urged them to decline unnecessary disputes, and demanded that means should be afforded them to defend their lives and protect their property, as the destructive inroads of the enemy were now compelling them to desert their homes. On the 25th of April, 1756, forty-one persons,—six men, five women, and thirty children,—with a small portion of their cattle, to avoid the fury of the enemy deserted their cabins and clearings near Conococheague and came to Baltimore. Their horses were destroyed and their cattle killed. And on the 23d of April, 1756, Thomas Cresap, Jr., and Daniel Cresap, sons of Col. Thomas Cresap, with sixty riflemen, "dressed and painted like Indians," with "red caps," started on an expedition "to kill the women and children in the Indian towns and scalp them, while the warriors are committing the like destruction on our frontiers." The result of this expedition is given in the Maryland Gazette as follows:

"On the 23d of April, as Thomas Cresap, Jr., lay in ambush near the Little Meadow, they saw a party of Indians coming by them, but one of the party firing too soon alarmed them, and they fled as fast as possible into thickets, leaving their horses and baggage, which our people took and brought off with them. Among their baggage one scalp was found. One of the Indians taking a different course from the rest, Mr. Cresap and two others ran after him near a mile; when the Indian found that Mr. Cresap gained on him and would overtake him, he dodged behind a large tree, and Mr. Cresap stopped behind one smaller, and they fired at one another so near together that it could not be distinguished which fired first. Cresap was shot with large shot in the breast, and the others of the party coming up, he told them not to mind him, he was a dead man, but to pursue the enemy, and then dropped down dead. The Indian was shot through the right breast, but was not dead when they came up to him, so they dispatched him with a tomahawk and scalped him. Mr. Cresap's body they buried as privately as they could. He was a young widower, and left two little children, and his death was lamented by all who knew him."

This account was not quite correct. Cresap was shot with a bullet and seven buckshot, the ball going through his breast, and he was not shot behind a tree, but in an open space while he was pursuing his foe. Col. Cresap's men were dressed in red caps, and in July "four Indians dressed in the same made a foray among the inhabitants near Conococheague, and killed and scalped two persons and then made off. A party of forty-six men started in pursuit, but were unable to overtake them."

Col. Cresap soon got together another band of volunteers, "and with his two surviving sons, Daniel and Michael, and a negro of gigantic stature, marched again, taking the same route on Braddock's road. They advanced this time as far as Negro Mountain, where they met a party of Indians. A running fight took place; Cresap's party killed an Indian, and the Indians killed the negro; and it was this circumstance—the death of the negro on the mountain—that has immortalized his name by fixing it on this ridge forever."

On the 30th of June, 1756, Col. Cresap, with a party of thirteen young men, had a skirmish with the Indians, in which Abraham Johnson, Jacob Ashcroft, and James Lowry were killed, the Indians losing two of their number.

After the defeat of Braddock, the inhabitants of Western Maryland inaugurated for their defense a series of private forts or block-houses, which were occasionally garrisoned by companies of rangers. Each of the forts were generally in charge of a few men, but they only afforded protection to those who fled to them for safety. Separated as they were from each other by so great a distance, the Indians in their incursions readily avoided them, and still found a wide field for their inhuman warfare, where they could strike a deadly blow and retreat to the mountains before the settlers could be gathered together in pursuit. The butchery continued for seven long years, and the Indians boasted that they had killed fifty white people for every Indian killed. While there was great truth in the boast, it scarcely conveys an accurate impression of the prowess of the red men, for they always avoided equal and honorable combat, and butchered men, women, and children in cold blood, for whose scalps they were liberally paid by the French. It is scarcely possible to convey in words a correct idea of the deplorable condition of Western Maryland at this period. Families were surprised in their dwellings at midnight, every member murdered and scalped, their houses and crops burned, and their cattle gathered together in the lurid light of the flames, and driven off to the mountains. Delicate women were carried into captivity worse than death; little children, driving cattle to the fields, were killed and scalped in sight of their homes. The ground was plowed, the seed sown, and the harvest gathered in constant dread of the tomahawk and rifle. Scarcely any out-door work was attempted, unless some of the laborers carried arms in their hands; and the men usually plowed or harvested in companies, that they might defend each other.

In November, 1755, a band of Indians, under Shingas, the Delaware chief, attacked the frontier settlements of Western Maryland and Pennsylvania, burned the houses, and murdered or made prisoners of those of the inhabitants who did not escape. Shingas was the most cruel and blood-thirsty warrior of his tribe. His exploits form a sickening record of the murder and torture of innocent victims, equalled in fiendish malignity by those of no other human being on the North American continent. He is said to have been small in stature, but in point of courage and activity and in savage prowess was equaled by few. A settler speaking of this inroad of Shingas, said, "Last night I had a family of upwards of one hundred women and children, who fled for succor. You can form no just idea of the distress and distracted condition of our inhabitants, unless you saw them and heard their cries." Another says, "The cries of widows and fatherless children were heart-rending, while those who escaped with their lives had neither a mouthful to eat, nor a bed to lie on, nor clothes to cover their nakedness or keep them warm; all they had been consumed in their burning dwellings." Fifty persons at this time were killed or taken prisoners, twenty-seven houses were burned, a great number of cattle were killed or driven off, and out of ninety-three families on the borders of Maryland and Pennsylvania who settled in what was called the two "coves," members of forty-seven families were either killed or captured, and the remainder deserted their homes, so that the settlements were entirely broken up. One woman, over ninety years of age, was found lying dead with her breasts torn off and a stake driven through her body. The infuriated savages caught up little children and dashed their brains out against the door-posts in presence of their shrieking mothers, or cut off their heads and drank their warm blood.

The cold indifference of the Lord Proprietary, who refused to allow his immense estates to bear a share of the tax demanded for the purpose of raising troops and money for the defense of the frontier, awoke the deepest indignation throughout Western Maryland against him and the Assembly. The patience of the western settlers was worn out with the interminable disputes between the Governor and Assembly, and they threatened to adopt the emphatic measures of their friends in Pennsylvania.

The resolute men of Western Maryland, under the leadership of Col. Thomas Cresap, who appears to be at this time the guardian genius of the frontier settlements, assembled in Frederick Town and threatened to march with guns and tomahawks to Annapolis and compel the Assembly to cease their unseasonable

2 The dead bodies of three people that had been murdered and scalped by the Indians were brought down to Philadelphia by the distant inhabitants and hauled about the streets, with placards announcing that these were victims of the Quaker policy of non-resistance. A mob of four thousand people surrounded the House of Assembly, placed the dead bodies in the doorway, and demanded immediate relief for the people on the frontier, which was granted.
wranglings and come to their relief. The Assembly immediately acquiesced in their demands, and notwithstanding the prognostications of the Governor, appropriated £40,000 for purposes of defense. Of this sum £11,000 were to be applied to the erection of a fort and block-houses on the frontier, and for raising, arming, and maintaining a body of two hundred men to garrison them; £3000 were appropriated for engaging the services of the Southern Indians, for which purpose two commissioners, Col. Benjamin Tasker and Charles Carroll the younger, were appointed to take charge of the fund and conduct the negotiations. One thousand pounds were allotted as bounties for Indian scalps or prisoners, at the rate of £10 for each; £25,000 were set apart for the proposed joint expedition against Fort Du Quesne. William Murdock, James Dick, and Daniel Wolstenholme were appointed agents to pay out these sums, with a commission of two and a half per cent.

Though England and France had kept up hostilities in the colonies since 1754, the peace was not openly broken in Europe until the 17th of May, 1756, when a formal declaration of war was made. New exertions were now made to put the frontiers in a state of defense. Under the act passed at the previous session (1755-56) of the Assembly, Governor Sharpe purchased one hundred and fifty acres of land near the present town of Hancock, and began to erect a substantial stone fort, which he named Fort Frederick. It had barracks for the accommodation of two hundred men, and on an emergency could contain twice that number. It had bastions and curtains faced with stone, and on each bastion was mounted a six-pounder. It was built upon an elevated plateau about a quarter of a mile from the Potomac, which was navigable from thence almost to Fort Cumberland. The fort was quadrangular in shape, its walls being strengthened with earth embankments, and each of its exterior lines was three hundred and sixty feet in length. It was expected to cost only about two thousand pounds, but cost three times that sum when completed. By the middle of August, 1756, it was so far completed as to receive a garrison of two hundred men, under command of Capt. Dagworthy. The walls of this fort are still standing, firm and strong, covered with wild vines. It is thirteen miles east of Hancock, and may be seen from the railroad cars in passing over the Baltimore and Ohio road, near Green Spring Run station.

During this time the audacity of the Indians had increased with their success. A party of Indians advanced within a short distance of Frederick, and emboldened by the success of their confederates on the head-waters of the Ohio, the forks of the Monongahela and the Alleghany, made their way even to the neighborhood of Enmittsburg, assailed that then thinly-settled region, and after shooting a man named Alexander McKeasy near his own house, and capturing his son, made good their escape without any loss. At this critical juncture, according to Washington's report to Lord Fairfax, the whole settlement of Conococheague had fled, and there only remained two families between that point and Frederick Town.

That the Maryland settlements are all abandoned," says Washington, "is certainly a fact, as I have had the accounts transmitted to me by several hands, and confirmed yesterday by Henry Brinker, who left Monocacy the day before, and who also affirms that three hundred and fifty wagons had passed that place, to avoid the enemy, within the space of three days." In consequence of this alarming condition of affairs, the people below Conococheague raised a subscription sufficient to arm and equip a patrol of twenty men, under Lient. William Teagard, of Capt. Rench's company of militia, for their protection. Their services were soon demanded, for on August 18th the enemy plundered the settlers near Baker's Ridge, and on the 20th attacked a funeral train, killing two persons (George Hicks and Lodovick Claymou). They were followed by a party of thirteen of Teagard's men, under Luke Thompson, until they came within two miles of the mouth of Conococheague, on the Pennsylvania road, when five shots were heard about three hundred yards in advance, which threw the pursuing party into some confusion; but Matthias Nicholls, "a young lad of eighteen, insisted they should run up and come upon the enemy while their pieces were unloaded, and set off immediately." The others, however, ran off, but he continued the pursuit, and rescued William Postlewaite, who had been seriously wounded by the Indians, and conducted him in safety to Col. Cresap's. An effort was made at this time by Washington to secure the consent of Governor Dinwiddie to the abandonment of Fort Cumberland, the former regarding the post as of no value in a military point of view, and as a source of useless expense and anxiety. After considerable correspondence on the subject, however, Washington's advice was rejected, and by Dinwiddie's order the garrisons were withdrawn from the smaller frontier posts and sent, with most of the troops from Winchester, to Fort Cumberland, which was made the headquarters of the army. On the 29th of April, 1757, a body of Cherokee Indians arrived at Fort Frederick and offered their services to Governor Sharpe, and the Governor's secretary, John Ridgill, and Daniel Walstenholme were sent as commissioners to Fort Frederick to treat with these Indians, carrying with them a wagon-load of presents and two hundred pounds in goods for the scalps of four hostile Indians, whom the Cherokees had killed while waiting for an answer.

1 A beautiful young lady, well known in those days as a daring heroine, was taken prisoner by the Indian freebooters on the farm where Henry W. Dollinger now lives, and after a desperate struggle broke loose from her captors. After running for some distance, with the Indians in close pursuit, she dodged behind a tree to escape the arrows of her pursuers, when her flowing hair caught in the bark and stopped her flight. At this moment one of the Indians threw his tomahawk at her head, but the weapon, missing its aim, severed her hair and set her free, when she again took to flight and made good her escape.

The enemy, however, still kept up their forays, almost under the walls of the forts, and the settlements west of the Blue Ridge were well-nigh deserted. In the summer of 1757 there was a general flight from the upper waters of the Potomac, and on the 18th of June the report came that a large force of French and Indians, with artillery, were advancing on Fort Cumberland. Sharpe immediately called out the militia, and gathering a body of volunteers, started to relieve the threatened post, but on reaching Frederick found that it was a false alarm.

William Pitt, appointed Secretary of State the previous June, resolved that the campaign of 1758 should be conducted after a different fashion, and it was determined that another expedition should be sent against Fort Du Quesne, under Gen. Forbes. In June the forces of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia received orders from Gen. Forbes to begin their march upon Fort Du Quesne. The troops destined for this expedition numbered between six and seven thousand, of whom Maryland furnished a contingent of about five hundred, under Lieut.-Col. Dagworthy. Early in July the Maryland and Virginia troops were assembled at Fort Cumberland, and the Pennsylvanians at Raystown (now Bedford), in their own province, about thirty miles from the fort. An army of seven thousand men had now assembled under the command of Gen. Forbes, who, disregarding the advice of Washington to advance by the road already opened by Braddock, ordered a new road cut from Raystown. The working-party, under the command of Col. Bouquet, to whom this task was assigned, had early in September arrived at Loyal Hanna, ten miles beyond Laurel Hill, and on the 21st of September Maj. Grant, of Montgomery's battalion, with eight hundred Highlanders, a part of Washington's regiment, eighty-one Marylanders, and a number of Pennsylvanians were detailed from this advanced post to reconnoitre the enemy's position at Fort Du Quesne. The French commander of that fort, observing the want of precaution with which Grant executed his orders, took speedy measures to punish him. Having posted Indians in ambuscade on his enemy's flank, he made a sudden sally from the fort, and soon spread dismay and confusion among the ranks of the British soldiers. With gleaming knives and brandished tomahawks the Indians rushed yelling from the thicket, and fell upon the astonished Highlanders with terrible effect. Hand to hand they fought until, overpowered, the whole detachment fled in dismay, pursued by the furious savages. The Highlanders for a time stood their ground well, but the Marylanders and Virginians bore the brunt of the battle, the Pennsylvanians breaking at the first fire. The Marylanders behaved with the greatest gallantry, and gave evidence of the thorough manner in which they had been trained for border warfare. Out of eighty-one men, their loss was twenty-seven privates and one officer—Lieut. Duncan McRae—killed, and nearly one-half of their whole force missing.

"The Marylanders," says the Maryland Gazette, "concealing themselves behind trees and the brush, made a good defense, but were overpowered by numbers, and not being supported, were obliged to follow the rest." The total loss was two hundred and seventy killed and forty-two wounded.

The fugitives were rallied by Capt. Bullitt, who checked the enemy until the whole force could retreat out of danger. Capt. Ware, Lieut. Riley, and Ensign Harrison brought off in safety the remaining Marylanders. On the 12th of October the enemy, who had watched the movements of the army, thinking it a favorable time to strike another blow and complete their victory, attacked Col. Bouquet at Loyal Hanna. After a few hours' struggle, during which the English lost sixty-seven officers and men killed and wounded, the enemy were repulsed. In this engagement Lieut. Prather and two privates of the Maryland troops were killed, Ensign Bell and six privates wounded, and eleven missing. In another skirmish, on the 12th of November, near Loyal Hanna, Capt. Evan Shelby, of Frederick County, killed with his own hand one of the greatest chiefs of the enemy. With fifty miles of road to open across the forests, the winter rapidly approaching, and the disheartened troops beginning to desert, it was decided that it was inexpedient to proceed further in the campaign. Fortunately, Capt. Ware, of the Maryland troops, with a scouting-party, brought in three prisoners, from whom information was obtained of the actual condition of Fort Du Quesne. They learned the weakness and distress of the French garrison, and nerved by this intelligence, Gen. Forbes determined to make a vigorous effort to gain possession of the place before it could be reinforced. Leaving their tents and heavy baggage at Loyal Hauna, they advanced within a few hours' march of the fort, when the French garrison set fire to the works and retreated down the Ohio. Gen. Forbes took possession of the abandoned fort, caused the works to be repaired, and gave it the name of Fort Pitt, in honor of the prime minister, assigning a garrison of four hundred and fifty men, taken from the Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia troops, for its defense.

The contest which commenced in America between England and France was ended by a treaty signed at Paris on the 10th of February, 1763, and as there appeared to be safety for settlers west of the mountains, emigration began to move over those hitherto impassable barriers of civilization. These encroachments aroused Pontiac, a sagacious Ottawa chief, who went secretly from tribe to tribe among the Indians, and obtained their solemn pledges to a confederation, whose object was the expulsion of the English from all the forts and settlements on the frontier. So adroitly were their plans matured that the commanders of the Western forts had no suspicion of the conspiracy until it was ripe and the first blow had been struck, in June, 1763. Their plan was that the border settlements were to be invaded during harvest, the men, corn, and cattle to be destroyed, and the outposts to be reduced by famine. Pursuant to these plans, the Indians massacred traders whom they had invited among them, and seized their property; and large scalping-parties advanced to the frontiers of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, marking their way with blood and devastation. The most remote outposts were attacked about the same time, and within a fortnight all those west of Oswego, except Niagara, Fort Pitt, and Detroit, fell into their hands. The whole country west of Fort Frederick became the prey of the savages, who burned barns and houses, and surprised and massacred the settlers in the fields or asleep in their dwellings. "Another tempest has arisen upon our frontiers," Washington wrote to a friend, "and the alarm spreads wider than ever. In short, the inhabitants are so apprehensive of danger that no families remain above the Conococheague road, and many are gone below. The harvests are, in a manner, lost, and the distresses of the settlements are evident and manifold."

On the 15th of July, 1763, Col. Thomas Cresap wrote from Old Town to Governor Sharpe, as follows:

"I take this opportunity in the height of Confusion to acquaint you with our unhappy and most wretched Situation at this time, being in hourly Expectation of being massacred by our Barbareous and Inhuman Enemy the Indians, we having been three days successively attacked by them, viz.: the 13, 14, and this Instant. On the 13th, as 6 men were shooting some wheat in the field, 5 Indians firing on them as they came to do it and others Running to their assistance;—on the 14th 5 Indians crept up to and fired on about 16 men who were sitting and walking under a Tree at the entrance of my Lane, about 100 yards from my House; but on being fired at by the white men, who much wounded some of them, they Immediately Run off, and were followed by the white men about a mile, all which way was a great Quantity of Blood on the Ground. The white men got three of their Bundles, containing sundry Indian Implements & Goods. About 3 Hours after several guns were fired in the woods, on which a party went in Quest of them and found 3 Braves Killed by them. The Indians wounded one man at their first fire, tho' but Slightly.

"On this Instant, as Mr. Samuel Wilder was going to a house of his about 300 yards Distant from mine with four men and several women, the Indians rushed on them from a rising Ground, but they perceiving them coming, Run towards my House hollowing, which being heard by those at my house, they run to their assistance, and met them and the Indians at the entrance of my lane, on which the Indians Immediately fired on them to the amount of 18 or Twenty, and Killed Mr. Wilder. The party of white men Returned their fire, and killed one of them dead on the Spot and wounded several of the others, as appeared by Considerable Quantity of Blood strewn on the Ground as they Run off, which they Immediately did, and by their leaving behind them 3 Guns, one pistol, and Sundry other Implements of war, &c. &c. I have Enclosed a List of the Desolate men, Women, and Children who have fled to my house, which is Enclosed by a small stockade for safety, by which you'll see what a number of poor Souls, destitute of Every necessary of Life, are here penned up and likely to be Butchered without Immediate Relief and assistance, and can expect none, unless from the province to which they Belong. I shall submit to your wiser Judgement the Best and most Effectual method for such Relief, and shall conclude with hoping we shall have it in time." 1

The inhabitants of Frederick Town did all in their power to relieve the unhappy fugitives, a large part of whom were women and children, who had lost their all, and crowded the streets in a state of destitute misery. Their immediate necessities were relieved by food and shelter, and a considerable sum for their relief was subscribed throughout the province. An interesting contemporary account of the state of things in and about Frederick is given in the following letter published in the Gazette, written from Frederick Town, under date of July 19, 1763:

"Every day, for some time past, has offered the melancholy scene of poor distressed families driving downwards through this town with their effects, who have deserted their plantations for fear of falling into the cruel hands of our savage enemies, now daily seen in the woods. And never was panic more general or forcible than that of the back inhabitants, whose terror at this time exceeded what followed on the defeat of Gen.

1 The Maryland Gazette of July 21, 1763, informs us that the colonel was not yet cut off by the savages, though it is feared he would be if not quickly relieved. Subsequent accounts show that ten men were sent to Cresap's assistance.
Braddock, when the frontiers lay open to the incursions of both French and Indians. Whilst Conococheague settlement stands firm we shall think ourselves in some sort of security from their insults here. But should the inhabitants there give way, you would soon see your city and the lower counties crowded with objects of compassion, as the flight would in that case become general. Numbers of those who have betaken themselves to the fort, as well as those who have actually fled, have entirely lost their crops, or turned in their own cattle and hogs to devour the produce, in hopes of finding them again in better condition should it hereafter appear safe for them to return. The season has been remarkably fine, and the harvest in general afforded the most promising appearance of plenty and goodness that has been known for many years. But alas! how dismal an alteration of the prospect! Many who expected to have sold and supplied the necessities of others now want for themselves, and see their warmest hopes defeated, the fruits of their honest industry snatched from them by the merciless attack of these blood-thirsty barbarians, whose treatment of such unhappy wretches as fall into their hands is accompanied with circumstances of infernal fury, too horrid and shocking for human nature to dwell upon even in imagination.

We were so sensible of the importance of Conococheague settlement, both as a bulwark and supply to this neighborhood, that on repeated notice of their growing distress Capt. Butler, on Wednesday last, called the town company together, who appeared under arms on the court-house green with great unanimity. Just as the drum beat to arms we had the agreeable satisfaction of seeing a wagon sent up by his excellency (whose tender care for the security of the province raised sentiments of the highest gratitude in the breast of every one present) loaded with powder and lead, articles of the greatest importance at this critical juncture, when the whole country had been drained of those necessary articles by the diligence of our Indian traders, who had bought up the whole for the supply of our enemies, to be returned, as we have dearly experienced, in death and desolation among us. A subscription was then set on foot and cheerfully entered into, in consequence of which twenty stout young men immediately enlisted under Mr. Peter Gresh to march immediately to the assistance of the hack inhabitants, and with other volunteers already there raised, to cover the rearers, in hopes of securing the crops. Had not the Governor’s supply arrived so seasonably it was doubted whether the whole town could have furnished ammunition sufficient for that small party, half of which marched backwards in high spirits on Thursday, and the remainder on Friday morning. And on Sunday subscriptions were taken in the several congregations in town for sending up further assistance.

On Sunday afternoon we had the pleasure of seeing Mr. Michael Cresap arrive in town with mokinos on his legs, taken from an Indian whom he killed and scalped, being one of those who had shot down Mr. Wilder, the circumstances of whose much-lamented murder and the success of Col. Cresap’s family you no doubt have received from other hands. Money has been cheerfully contributed in our town towards the support of the men to be added to Col. Cresap’s present force, as we look upon the preservation of the Old Town to be of great importance to us, and a proper check to the progress of the savages; but notwithstanding our present efforts to keep the enemy at a distance, and thereby shelter the whole province, our inhabitants are poor, our men dispersed, and without a detachment from below it is to be feared we must give way, and the inundation break upon the lower counties.”

In consequence of these outrages, the Governor convened the Assembly on the 4th of October, 1763, and further provision was made for the protection of the frontiers. The commissioners of the loan-office having £2120 still unexpended of the several sums appropriated by the act of 1756, were directed to pay to Daniel and Michael Cresap, John Walker, Nathan Friggs, William Young, Abraham Richardson, and Ezekiel Johnson fifty pounds for the scalp of an Indian taken by them in July, and the same amount to James Davis, of Virginia, who, in August, with a party of frontiersmen, had pursued a party of Indians from Cape Capon, on the south side of the Potomae, to George’s Creek, in Maryland, where they overtook the savages, killing one, and rescuing James Coniston and his wife, whom they were carrying off as prisoners.

On July 25, 1764, two women were killed by the Indians near Fort London, and on the following day, at a school-house near Capt. Potter’s, in Conococheague. Robert Brown and nine children were scalped by four Indians, and four children carried off prisoners. Two of the nine children scalped were left living. The schoolmaster was killed.

Fort Pitt was in the mean time surrounded and cut off from all communication with the interior. In July, Gen. Amherst directed Col. Bouquet to proceed with five hundred men to reinforce it and drive back the savages. At Bushy Run Bouquet’s command was attacked by Indians on the 5th of August, and the fight continued all day without decisive result. On the next day the contest was renewed, and the Indians were put to flight. Four days later Bouquet reached Fort Pitt.

In Col. Bouquet’s expedition against the Mingoes, Delawares, and Shawnees in 1764 there were two companies of Maryland volunteers, one consisting of “forty-three brave woodsmen, besides officers, all of them well equipped with good rifles, and most of them born and bred on the frontiers of Frederick County,” under Capt. William McClellan, and the other under the command of Capt. John Wolgomatt. In his letter to the Governor, dated Forks of Muskingum, Nov. 15, 1764, after giving a detailed account of his expedition, Col. Bouquet says, “As such a public spirit ought to be encouraged in our colonies, I beg leave to recommend them to your notice, that they may obtain pay, if possible, from your Assembly. Their conduct has given me great satisfaction, and it would be very agreeable to me if they could receive some gratification, as they (Capts. McClellan and Wolgommatt) have put themselves to considerable expenses to equip the men.”

1 The following are the muster-rolls of the two companies: Wm. McClellan, captain; John Earl, James Dougherty, lieu-
Although the scenes of 1783 were never again repeated within the limits of Maryland, it was many years before the settlements on the western frontiers of the province were entirely relieved from the danger of savage inroads. In 1778 the Indians commenced hostilities on the frontiers, and it was found necessary to call into service the Washington County militia, under Col. Beauty, in conjunction with the militia of Virginia and Pennsylvania. In the following year (1779) we learn by a letter from Washington County, dated April 20th, that the Indians about two weeks previously "struck the settlement of the Yock [York?] Glades, about ten or twelve miles within the State line. It appears that as five men were covering a cabin they were fired on; four were killed on the spot, the other escaped, and says the number of Indians was about thirty-five. A large number of savages were discovered lurking about the Horse-shoe Bottom, no doubt with hostile intentions."

CHAPTER V.
LOGAN AND CRESAP.

The massacre of the family of the great Indian chief, Logan, in the early part of the year 1774, has been so frequently discussed from the time when Mr. tenants; Joseph Hopewell, Henry Grayhill, sergeants; David Blair, John Moran, Edmund Moran, ensigns; Privates, David Shelby, George Rout, Wm. Beadles, John Dean, Richard Asherbert, Nicholas Carpenter, Thomas Vaughan, James Ross, Isaac Flora, Joshua Young, George Mattison, Isaac Wilcock, Wm. Hannibal, John Dougherty, Wm. Colvin, Wm. Flora, Thomas Edington, James Bradmore, Richard Coomere, Wm. Sparks, Thos. Clemens, John Seaton, John Doughland, Patrick O'Gullen, Robert Ford, Joseph Clemens, James Small, Wm. Lockhead, James Ware, Thos. Williams, John Masters, John Murray, Felix Lear, Bartolomew Pack, Charles Hays, and Wm. Polk.

1 The Maryland Journal of June 26, 1789, contains the following: "Last week a person passed through this town on his way from Kentucky, who informs us that on the 22d of May last he and eleven persons were in company, at the distance of four days' journey from the Crab Orchards, in the wilderesses, and were fired upon by a party of Indians. Five of the company were killed; the rest made their escape, but lost all their horses except two. A young man by the name of Funk, from Funk's Town, another of the name of Lewis Myers, from Pike Creek, Jefferson first sought to place the responsibility upon Col. Michael Cresap, that the evidence and argument have grown too voluminous to be presented in full in such a work as the present.

The narrative of the Indian wars in Western Maryland and on the frontier would be incomplete, however, without at least a brief reference to a subject which has become one of the celebrated questions of Indian history, and which is closely connected with one of the most prominent figures in the early settlement of this portion of the State. The charge as originally made by Mr. Jefferson in his "Notes on Virginia," published in 1787, was as follows:

"Col. Cresap, a man infamous for the many murders he had committed on those much injured people (the Indians), collected a party and proceeded down the Kanawhaw in quest of vengeance. Unfortunately, a canoe of women and children, with one man only, was seen coming from the opposite shore unarmed, and unsuspecting an hostile attack from the whites. Cresap and his party concealed themselves on the bank of the river, and the moment the canoe touched the shore singled out their objects, and at one fire killed every person in it. This happened to be the family of Logan, who had long been distinguished as a friend of the whites. This unworthy return provoked his vengeance. He accordingly signalized himself in the war which ensued. In the autumn of the same year a decisive battle was fought at the mouth of the Great Kanawhaw, between the collected forces of the Shawnees, Mingoes, and Delawares and a detachment of the Virginia militia. The Indians were defeated and slain for peace. Logan, however, desired to be seen among the suppliants. But lest the sincerity of a treaty should be distrusted from which so distinguished a chief absented himself, he sent by a messenger the following speech to be delivered to Lord Dunmore:

"'I appeal to any white man to say if ever he entered Logan's cabin hungry and he gave him not meat, if ever he came cold and naked and he clothed him not. During the course of the last long and bloody war Logan remained idle in his cabin, an advocate for peace. Such was my love for the whites that my countrymen pointed as they passed and said, 'Logan is the friend of white men.' I had even thought to have lived with you but for the injuries of one man. Col. Cresap, the last spring, in cold blood and unprovoked, murdered all the relations of Logan, not sparing even my women and children. There runs not a drop of my blood in the veins of any living creature. This called on me for revenge. I have sought it; I have killed many; I have fully glutted my vengeance. For my country, I rejoice at the beams of peace. But do not harbor a thought that mine is the joy of fear. Logan never felt fear. He will not turn on his heel to save his life. Who is there to mourn for Logan? Not one.'"

The charge thus brought by Mr. Jefferson was not known to the Cresap family until 1797, when Luther and a Mr. Blyer, from near Harper's Ferry, were among the unfortunate victims. As this fact is to be depended upon, it inclines us to credit the many various reports that have been lately so much circulated respecting the horrid murders and depredations committed by the Indians upon the frontiers, and makes humanity shudder at the idea of the bloody consequences which must ensue from a war with those barbarians."
Martin, who married a daughter of Michael Cresap, published his defense, and since his day many able writers have taken up the pen in answer to Mr. Jefferson, and in vindication of the character of Cresap. Cresap himself could make no answer to the charge, for he had yielded up his life in defense of his country at the very outbreak of the Revolutionary struggle; but fortunately he left behind him many friends and wit-

1 Thomas Cresap, the father of Col. Michael Cresap, was named in the treaty between the Six Nations and the province of Maryland, dated the 30th of June, 1714, as having "a hunting or trading cabin, about two miles above the uppermost fork of Concordain, or Potomac, on the north branch of said fork." This Thomas Cresap, usually called "the English colonel," was a much trusted agent of Charles, Lord Baltimore (the fifth of that title), and was sent to that portion of the province to guard the interests of Lord Baltimore against the claim of Lord Fairfax. The family of Col. Cresap was therefore one of the oldest Maryland families in that section of the State, and from the time of "the English colonel" to the present have occupied a high position among "the first families" of Western Maryland. "The English colonel" built a stone house, since known as Cresap's Fort, where his trading cabin stood, opposite the Green Spring Run, a station of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, which is still standing and occupied, and can be seen from that station. At an early day settlers built around it, and soon there on any alarm being given all fied to the fort for protection. Col. Thomas Cresap called the place "Skipton," after the place or village of his residence in England. The village is now called "Old Town," situated on the Potomac, about sixteen miles east of Cumberland. Col. Michael Cresap (in Mr. Jefferson's "Notes on Virginia"), said to be "a man infamous for his many Indian murders," had three daughters and two sons. At the time of this publication the eldest daughter was the wife of the celebrated Luther Martin, a lawyer of whom Maryland has always been justly proud. He was one of the counsel for Aaron Burr, who was tried for treason, and was denounced by Jefferson as "the Bulldog of the Federal Party." The second daughter married his brother, Lenox Martin, a lawyer of that portion of Maryland who raised a large and respectable family, still residing in Allegany County. The third daughter married Osborn Sprigg. Their children were the Hon. Michael Cresap Sprigg, a member of Congress from Allegany County, and whose descendants now hold "a first position" in society in this State. Michael C. Sprigg was also at one time president of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company. There was no higher-toned gentleman or man of fairer character in Western Maryland in his day than Michael C. Sprigg. The Hon. James C. Sprigg, his brother, was a member of Congress from Kentucky. His son, James Cresap, was a man of high standing, who married (his second wife) the widow of Capt. Vau Riber, a most accomplished and excellent lady, by whom he had one son, Luther Martin Cresap, a worthy and respectable gentleman, who now resides near Old Town, in the old family residence. A man of unexceptionable character, with a liberal education, and, Cresap-like, of a mild and amiable disposition. The widow of Col. Michael Cresap married John I. Jacobs. Their son, Hon. J. J. Jacobs, ex-Governor of West Virginia, is a man of ordinary ability, and now holds a high position among the citizens of that State. Such was, has been, and now is the position of the Cresap family in Western Maryland for over a century.—Thomas J. McKeeh, in his MS. notes to the author.
their rifles, blankets, and accoutrements carried to the Indian villages.” And thus, as it has been well pointed out, “the Indian hatchet was never buried. The summer after Bouquet’s treaty the savages killed a white man upon the Virginia frontiers; the next year eight Virginians were butchered on the Cumberland, and their peltries brought to the Indian towns, where they were sold to Pennsylvania traders. Some time after, Martin, a Virginia trader, with two companions, was killed by the Shawanese on the Hocking-hocking, only, as it was alleged by Lord Dunmore, because they were Virginians, at the same time that the savages allowed a certain Ellis to pass simply because he was a Pennsylvanian. In 1771 twenty Virginians and their party of friendly Indians were robbed by savages of thirty-eight horses, as well as of weapons, clothes, and trappings, which they delivered to Calender and Spears, and certain other Pennsylvania traders, in their towns. In the same year, within the jurisdiction of Virginia, the Indians killed two remote settlers, and in the following year Adam Stroud, another Virginian, with his wife and seven children, fell beneath their tomahawks and scalping-knives on the waters of the Elk. In 1773 the savages were still engaged in their work of destruction. Richards fell on the Kanawha, and a few months after, Russell, another Virginian, with five whites and two negroes, perished near the Cumberland Gap, while their horses and property were borne off by the Indians to the towns, where they fell a prey to the Pennsylvania traders. These and many other butcheries and robberies of a similar character were committed in the savage raids and forays anterior to the year 1774, and long before Shawanese blood was wantonly shed in retaliation by the irritated people. A Dutch family was massacred on the Kanawha in June of 1773, and the family of Mr. Hogg and three white men on the Great Kanawha early in April, 1774.

“On the 25th of April, 1774, the Earl of Dunmore, at Williamsburg, his seat of government in Virginia, issued his proclamation, which, as dates are of great importance in this narrative, we should regard as unveiling other causes of border difficulty besides the Indian hostilities which were then occurring. In this proclamation of the 25th of April, 1774, before there could have possibly been a communication of any retaliatory murders on the Ohio, committed by the whites upon the Indians, the British earl, then at Williamsburg, declares, that inasmuch as there is trouble within his jurisdiction at Pittsburgh, and the authorities in that place and its dependencies will endeavor to obstruct His Majesty’s government thereof by illegal means, and inasmuch as that ‘settlement is in danger of annoyance from Indians also,’ he has thought proper, with the advice and consent of His Majesty’s council, to require and authorize the militia officers of that district to embody a sufficient number of men to repel any assault whatever. The events that caused the issuing of this proclamation must necessarily have occurred both among the white and the red men a considerable time before, so as to have allowed the messenger to cross the mountains prior to the 25th of April.”

Withers, in his “Chronicles of Border Warfare,” expresses the decided opinion that the hostilities of 1774 were not the result of the outrages of that year alone, but of injuries repeated and continued through a long period of time, and the following letter from Lord Dunmore to Gen. Haldimand, written from Williamsburg on the 24th of December, 1774, “is good authority at least for the fact that it was no ‘Cresap’s war,’ as it has been called by some writers.”

“You have been very much imposed upon by the account given you, which you have thought fit to transmit to his Majesty’s minister. There is no other Col. Cresap than an old man of ninety years of age, who has not removed from his habitation for many years,—for some from my own knowledge, and for the rest from incontestable authority. There is, indeed, one Michael Cresap (not a colonel, but a trader), who with others is said to have killed those Indians (not on a scout, but) returning from the back settlements, where he had been on his private business, and where he found the Indians ravaging the country, and murdering every white man they could lay their hands on, and, therefore, very far from being the cause of a war as you suggest, or even of hostilities. It was the consequence of repeated hostilities committed by the Indians on the people of our frontiers; and both these Cresaps are not Virginians, or even inhabited Virginia, but belonging to Maryland: with respect, however, to which, or the cause of the war with the Indians, I conceive it not necessary for me to send you proofs.”

Early in 1774, Michael Cresap, who had emigrated from Maryland to the new lands of the Ohio with the hope of mending his broken fortunes, was engaged, with the help of laborers brought from his native province, in opening and locating farms in the vicinity of Pittsburgh and Wheeling. His errand was an eminently peaceable one, and his course through all this exciting period shows that he was especially anxious to avoid hostilities with the Indians. While thus engaged he “suddenly received a summons which terminated his agricultural projects in the West. After this region had been explored in 1773, a resolution was formed by a band of hardy pioneers, among whom was George Rogers Clark, who afterward, as a general officer, became so celebrated in the annals of Kentucky, to make a settlement during the following spring; and the mouth of the Little Kanawha was appointed as the place of general rendezvous, whence the united party should descend the river. Early in 1774 the Indians had done some of their habitual mischief. Reports of further and perhaps meditated dangers were rife along the river, as coming from the Indian towns. Many of the promised settlers, alarmed by the news, remained at their homes, so that at the appointed time not more than eighty or ninety men assembled at the rendezvous. In a few days the anticipated troubles with the savages commenced. A small party of hunters, encamped about ten miles below Clark's emigrants, was fired on by the Indians; but the red men were repulsed, and the hunters returned to camp. This hostile demonstration, coupled with the rumors already spoken of, satisfied the Americans that the savages were bent on war. Accordingly, the whole band was enrolled for protection; yet it was resolved to adhere to the original project of settling in Kentucky, inasmuch as the camp was amply furnished with everything needful for such an enterprise. An Indian town called the Horse-head Bottom, on the Scioto, near its mouth, lay in the pioneers' way, and they forthwith resolved to cross the country and surprise it. But when the question arose who should command so perilous an adventure, it was found that in the whole band no one possessed sufficient experience in Indian warfare to be trusted confidently with the fortunes of his companions. It was known, however, that Michael Cresap dwelt on the river about fifteen miles above the camp, engaged with certain laborers in settling a plantation, and that he had resolved to follow this band of pioneers to Kentucky as soon as he had established his people. His experience of frontier life was notorious. The eager settlers with one voice resolved to demand his services in the hour of danger, and a messenger was forthwith dispatched to seek him. In half an hour he returned with Michael, who learning of the unwilling resolution to attack the Indian town, had already set out to visit the pioneer camp. The emigrants at once thought their array, as they called it, complete, and the destruction of the savages certain. But a council was called, and to the surprise of all, the intended commander-in-chief promptly dissuaded his companions from the meditated enterprise." In his address to the pioneers he especially called their attention to the fact that though outrages had been committed, war had not actually commenced, and that the course they meditated would unquestionably provoke an outbreak of hostilities. Cresap's advice was considered so wise that it was determined to return to Wheeling and await further intelligence. On their way to this point they met Killbuck, a celebrated Indian chief, who had been concerned in many of the previous Indian wars, and had "a long but unsatisfactory" interview with him in regard to the anticipated troubles. During this interview Cresap remained on the opposite side of the river, "declaring that he was afraid to trust himself with the Indians, especially as Killbuck had frequently attempted to waylay and murder his father in Maryland, and that if they met his fortitude might forsake him, and he might put the savage to death." All this shows how anxious Cresap was to avoid everything which might give the Indians a pretext for the inauguration of a regular war. When the party reached Wheeling, they found the inhabitants of that section greatly alarmed by the apprehension of an Indian attack, and Cresap's party was soon greatly augmented by the large numbers of farmers, hunters, and woodsman who flocked to the camp, both to obtain and afford protection. The general apprehension was soon increased by an express from Connolly, Lord Dunmore's representative at Pittsburgh, to Capt. Cresap, informing him that messengers returned from the Indian country announced war to be inevitable, that the savages would begin operations as soon as the weather permitted, and "begging him to use his influence with the party to cover the country with scouts until the inhabitants could fortify themselves." This message was received about the 21st of April, and its reception, says Gen. George Rogers Clark, a member of the party, "was the epoch of open hostilities with the Indians. The War Post was planted, a Council Called and the Letter read and the ceremonies used by the Indians on so important an occasion actcd, and War was formally declared. The same evening two scalps were brought into camp. The following Day some Canoes of Indians were discovered descending the River, taking advantage of an Island to cover themselves from our View. They were chased by our Men 15 miles down the River, they were forced ashore and a Battle ensued, a few were wounded on both sides and we got one scalp only; On examining their Canoes we found a considerable quantity of ammunition and other Warlike Stores. On our return to Camp a Resolution was passed to march next Day and attack Logan's Camp on the Ohio, about 30 miles above Wheeling. We actually marched about five miles, and halted to take some Refreshment, here the Impropriety of executing the proposed Enterprise was argued, The Conversation was brought forward by Cresap himself; it was generally agreed that those Indians had no hostile Intentions, as it was a hunting Camp composed of Men, Women & Children with all their Stuff with them. This we knew as I myself and others then present had been at their Camp about four weeks before that time on our way down from Pittsburg; In short every Person present particularly Cresap (upon reflection) was opposed to the projected Measure. We returned and on the Same evening Decamped and took the Road to Red-Stone. It was Two Days after this that Logan's Family was killed."
But while Cresap and his men had thus abandoned the proposed attack, his prudent and friendly advice was not heeded by others, and on the 30th of April, 1774, the murder of Logan's family was committed. 1

Logan's camp, as has been said, was about thirty miles above Wheeling, near the mouth of Yellow Creek, and on the opposite side of the Ohio, near the river-bank, was the cabin of a certain Baker, "who sold rum to the Indians, and of course received frequent visits from them. This man had been particularly desired by Cresap to remove his liquors, and seems to have prepared to take them at the time of the murder." 2

In the latter part of April, 1774, Michael Myers and two companions, who had been called forth to guard the frontier at Baker's Bottom, crossed the Ohio in order to examine the country along the banks of Yellow Creek. While thus engaged they discovered an Indian endeavoring to steal their horse, whereupon Myers fired upon and killed him. A second Indian appeared and shared the same fate, when the whites, fearing to remain longer in this dangerous neighborhood, recrossed the Ohio and took refuge in Baker's cabin. The evening or night before the tragedy a squaw came over to Baker's from the Indian camp on the opposite side of the river, and after some reluctance confessed that the Indians had resolved to kill the white woman and her family the next day. 3

16th of April, some ten days before the formal declaration of war by the whites, it was attacked about forty miles below Pittsburgh by three Cherokees, who killed one of the white men composing the party and wounded another, the third making his escape, and the boat falling into the hands of the assailants.

1 There is some conflict of testimony as to the date of the massacre. Benjamin Tomlinson, in his testimony, in Jacob's "Life of Cresap," places it on "the third or fourth of May"; but John Sappington's statement in the 4th appendix to Jefferson's "Notes on Virginia" fixes it on the 24th of May. Mr. Mayer, to whose "Tah-Gab-Jute" the author is indebted for much of the information contained in this sketch, says, "I am satisfied the massacre occurred on the 30th of April, 1774, and that Sappington's date of the 24th May, given from memory, after a lapse of twenty-six years, is inaccurate. An examination of Washington's MSS. in the archives of the State Department at Washington has disclosed a letter from Valentine Crawford to Col. G. Washington, from Jacob's Creek, on the Monongahela, and dated 'May 7, 1774.'" The following is an extract from it. After describing some of the Indian and pioneer fights before the Yellow Creek massacre, he adds,—

"And on Saturday last, about twelve o'clock, there was one Greeshouse and about twenty men fell on a party of Indians at the mouth of Yellow Creek, and killed ten of them, and brought away one child a prisoner, which is now at my brother William Crawford's." By reference to the almanac for 1774, it will be seen that the Saturday before the 7th of May of that year, the date of Valentine Crawford's letter, was the 23th of April. Valentine Crawford was Washington's land agent in the West."

In consequence of this information, Baker, says Mr. Mayer, "summoned a number of his neighbors, who all reached his house before morning, when it was resolved the strangers should conceal themselves in a back apartment, whence the assaulting Indians might be watched. It was also determined that if they demeaned themselves peaceably they should not be molested, but if hostility was manifested they should show themselves and act accordingly. Early in the morning a party of eight Indians, composed of three squaws, a child, and four married men, one of whom was Logan's brother, crossed the river to Baker's cabin, where all but Logan's brother obtained liquor and became excessively drunk. No whites except Baker and two of his companions appeared in the cabin. After some time Logan's relative took down a coat and hat belonging to Baker's brother-in-law, and putting them on, set his arms akimbo, strutted about the apartment, and at length coming up abruptly to one of the men, addressed him with the most offensive epithets and attempted to strike him. The white man, Sappington, who was thus assaulted by language and gesture, for some time kept out of his way, but becoming irritated, seized his gun and shot the Indian as he was making to the door, still clad in the coat and hat. The men, who during the whole of this scene had remained hidden, now poured forth and without parley slaughtered the whole Indian party except the child. Before this tragic event occurred, two canoes, one with two and the other with five Indians, all naked, painted, and completely armed for war, were descried stealing from the opposite shore, where Logan's camp was situated. This was considered as confirmation of what the squaw had said the night before, and was afterwards alleged in justification of the murder of the unarmed party which had first arrived. No sooner were the unresisting drunkards dead than the infuriated whites rushed to the river-bank, and ranging themselves among the concealing fringe of underwood, prepared to receive the canoes. The first that arrived was the one containing two warriors, who were fired upon and killed. The other canoe immediately turned and fled, but after this two others, containing eighteen warriors, painted and prepared for conflict as the first had been, started to assail the Americans. Advancing more cautiously than the former party, they endeavored to land below Baker's cabin, but being met by the rapid movements of the rangers before they could effect their purpose, they were put to flight with the loss of one man, although they returned the fire of the pioneers." 2

2 All accounts appear to agree in representing the victims of this massacre to have been under the influence of "fire-water"
According to the statement of John Sappington, the only relative of Logan killed at Baker's was his brother; none of the squaws slain was his wife; two of them were old women, while the third, whose infant was spared, was the wife of Gen. Gibson, who was at that time an Indian trader, "and subsequently took care of the child as if it had been his own." It is probable, however, that his mother and sister were also among the slain. Logan's wife was a Shawanese woman, was not present at Baker's on the day of the tragedy, and lived for many years afterwards. She never had any children by Logan. Tod-kah-dohs, or "The Searcher," and probably a son of Logan's sister, did not die until about 1844, at the Cold Spring, on the Allegany Seneca reservation; "so that, in spite of Logan's speech, some of his 'blood' still 'ran' in human veins ninety years after the Yellow Creek tragedy."

Such, as far as they can now be learned, were the circumstances connected with this famous, or rather infamous, incident in border warfare. It fully merited all the indignation which it aroused at the time and all the denunciation which it has since received, and excited a universal feeling of horror even at a period when deeds of violence and death were of every-day occurrence. But the truth of history as well as the demands of justice require that the responsibility for the deed should be clearly placed where it belongs, and that the character of an innocent man should not be made the victim of posthumous vengeance. In considering the evidence on which Mr. Jefferson based his charge against Michael Cresap, it is impossible to repress surprise at the insufficiency of the testimony on which he made it. In point of fact, the only evidence against Cresap is the unsupported statement of Logan, who at the time of the massacre was on the other side of the Ohio, and who based his belief in Cresap's guilt solely upon the fact that he had recently been at the head of a large war-party of white settlers. Of the fact that Logan considered Cresap the chief actor in the tragedy there cannot be any reasonable doubt. Apart from the statement of Gibson, in whose presence Logan pronounced his celebrated speech, and who declares that Logan insisted in charging Cresap with the murder, at the time of its occurrence; is it not just possible that the whites may have been in the same condition? This would account for and to a certain extent palliate the wanton and barbarous murder of the women. It should be remembered also, in considering the weight of the provocation or excuse for the attack upon the unarmed and helpless party of Indians, that we have only the testimony of white witnesses to the occurrences, who would naturally endeavor to put the best face upon the affair possible.

the Indian chief himself left unmistakable record of his conviction in another place and another way. During the open war which blazed forth without concealment or disguise after the affair at Yellow Creek, Logan destroyed the family of a settler named John Roberts, and left in the house of the murdered family the following note, written in "gunpowder ink," and attached to a war-club:

"Capt. Cresap,—What did you kill my people on Yellow Creek for? The white people killed my kin' at Conestoga a great while ago, and I thought nothing of that. But you killed my kin' again on Yellow Creek, and took my cousin a prisoner. Then I thought I must kill too, and I have been three times to war since; but the Indians are not angry, only myself."

Against this unsupported statement of a man who had no possible opportunity of obtaining the real facts in the case there is a large mass of positive evidence showing the entire innocence of Cresap.

Gen. George Rogers Clark, to whom reference has already been made, and who was one of the party which had sought the advice of Cresap, and under his command returned from their projected expedition against Logan's camp, in response to inquiries on the subject wrote as follows, under date of June 17, 1788:

"I was of the first and last of the active Officers who bore the Weight of that War, and on perusing some old Papers of that Date I find some Memoirs, but independent of them I have a perfect Recollection of every Transaction relative to Logan's Story. The Conduct of Cresap I am perfectly acquainted with; he was not the Author of that Murder, but a family of the Name of Greathouse. But some Transactions that happened under the Conduct of Capt. Cresap a few days previous to the murder of Logan's Family gave him sufficient Ground to suppose it was Cresap who had done him the Injury."

After relating the "incidents which gave rise to Logan's suspicions"—Cresap's command of the party of proposed emigrants to Kentucky, which returned at his suggestion to Wheeling—Gen. Clark continues,—

"The war now raged with all its Savage Fury until the following fall, when a Treaty of Peace was held at Dunmore's Camp within five Miles of Chillicothe, the Indian Capital on the Sioto. Logan did not appear. I was acquainted with him, and wished to be informed of the Reason of his absence by one of the Interpreters. The Answer he gave to my Enquiry was 'that he was like a Mad Dog, that his Bristles had been up and were not yet quite fallen—but that the good Talks now going forward might allay them.' Logan's Speech to Dunmore now came forward, as related by Mr. Jefferson, and was generally believed, and indeed not doubted to have been genuine and dictated by Logan. The Army knew it was wrong so far as it respected Cresap, and afforded an Opportunity of rallying that Gentleman on the subject. I discovered that Cresap was displeased, and told him that he must be a very great Man, that the Indians shouldered him with every Thing that had happened—he smiled, and said he had a great mind to tomahawk Greathouse about the matter. What is here related is Fact. I was intimate with Cresap, and better acquainted with Logan at that Time than with any other Indian in the Western Country, and had a Knowledge of the Conduct of both Parties. Logan is the Author of the Speech, as related by Mr. Jefferson, and Cresap's Conduct was such as I have related."

The testimony of Jacob Tonlinson, the brother-in-law of Baker, is of the same positive character. "The attacking party at Baker's Bottom," he says, "had no commander. I believe Logan's brother was killed by a man named Sappington; who killed the others I know not, but this I know well, that neither Capt. Michael Cresap nor any other person of that name was there, nor do I believe within many miles of the place." The testimony of Col. Gibson, to whom Logan's speech was delivered, of Gen. John Minor, Dr. Wheeler, and, in short, of every one who has been called upon to give evidence in this celebrated historical cause, completely exonerates Cresap from all connection with the Yellow Creek tragedy.

Col. Thomas J. McKeag, of Allegheny County, who was born in 1804, at Steubenville, Ohio, about thirty miles below the place of the murder, in a recent communication to the writer, furnishes some interesting facts bearing upon this subject.

"Baker's Fort, as it was called," says Col. McKeag,—

"was nothing more than a comfortable, well-built log cabin, in which Mr. Baker and his wife resided at the time of the murder. The house remained standing for many years, and could be seen from steamboat or rail-car in passing up or down the river. When I was but a small boy my father removed from Steubenville and made him a home on the West Fork of Beaver, some fourteen miles from where it empties into the Ohio, below Wellsville. I resided with my father until I was over twenty years of age. I was therefore well acquainted with the 'settlers' both on the Ohio and Virginia sides of the river. I was familiar with the story of the murder of Logan's family from my earliest recollection, and had heard it told and retold by those who at the time of the murder lived in our neighborhood. I have heard all the particulars of the murder when a boy from Adam Poe, who resided at the time of the murder a few miles further up the river. I spent a night with his elder brother, Andrew Poe, who resided at the old homestead in the Virginia Neck, some four miles above Baker's house; where the murder was committed. In the course of the evening he gave me the particulars of his terrible sight, on the banks of the Ohio, with the Indian 'Big Foot' and his companions. He also, on that evening, told me the story of the murder of Logan's family, the same as I had heard it frequently from his brother Adam, who lived, from my earliest recollection, within a mile of my father's house in Ohio. The fact is unquestionable that all the particulars of the murder of Logan's family, and who was responsible for that murder, and who were present when the murder was committed were perfectly and universally known to all the settlers of that region of country, and there was no dispute about who were the perpetrators for they were all known. Benjamin Sappington and his party, from Buffalo Creek, in Washington County, Pa., about fifteen miles from 'Baker's Fort,' perpetrated the murder. This was the universal understanding, denied by none in that region of country. The veracity of the Poe's was unquestionable. They were men of large size and of unassuming bodily strength, and he would have been a bold man that dared to question the truth or veracity of either, for they were men of unimpeachable character."

"Adam Poe was the grandfather of the Rev. Adam Poe, who with the eloquent Isaac, opened with prayer the convention at Baltimore in 1810 that ratified the nomination of 'Tippecanoe and Tyler too.'"

"But more especially have I heard 'Old Pew' (for I forget his Christian name, everybody called him 'Old Pew') defending himself and the party who was with him. He lived, when I knew him, in the 'Virginia Neck,' not far from Andrew Poe. He was old and poor, but I never heard his veracity questioned. When a boy I had a great admiration for 'Old Pew,' for his Indian stories, for his lights, and his hairbreadth escapes from the rifle-ball and the tomahawk of the Indian. Whilst I listened I could have exclaimed with Horace, 'Oh, that the first earl had borne me amongst those heroes!'"

"The old man, Pew, told me he was one of Ben Sappington's party; was present at the murder, and knew every man of the party, and I know he lived in that neighborhood until his death at a very advanced age. He never denied his presence at the murder, nor his participation in it. I well remember his justifications of that fact. The Sappington party were residents of a portion of the country that by some fifteen miles distant from the Ohio River, and on that account had but little intercourse with the Indians, for the public highway of the Indian, 'the trail,' as we called it, was by the valley of the Ohio River. Nor did those pioneers of Buffalo Creek understand the absolute necessity that lay upon the sparse settlers of the Virginia side of the Ohio River to cultivate the friendship of the Indian. A quarrel with the Indian was death to the sparse settler on the banks of the Ohio. The settlers were but few, the Indians were numbered by the hundred. The settlers could make no resistance if the Indians, for any offense or outrage by the whites upon one or more of these people, were exorted to revenge. This party from Buffalo, not understanding the position of the settlers on the Ohio, thought that the killing of Logan's family was justifiable in anticipation of the reported attack on Baker's Fort."

"Mr. Poe said it was reported that an attack would be made that morning upon the fort: that it was said and believed that it was the custom of the Indians to send the families of their chiefs before the attack was made to the point to be attacked, that they might be the first to share the plunder. That morning the family of Logan, the Mingoe chief, came to the fort, and they expected every moment to see the boats of the attacking party push off from the opposite side of the river. There was no time for consultation. They considered the danger imminent, and they killed those that had arrived, knowing that they were the family of their chief. Mr. Poe, therefore, to the day of his death insisted that they were justified in the act under all the circumstances. Unfortunately for the whites, they killed their friends, and brought upon themselves the swift vengeance of all the surrounding savages, the Indian war of the summer of 1774. I never heard Mr. Poe or the Poe's speak of Michael Cresap, nor do I believe that Mr. Poe ever knew or saw him. Cresap's settlement was at Grave Creek, more than seventy miles below Baker's Fort, and in the West I never heard Cresap's name connected with the murder of Logan's family."

"In October, 1826, after receiving my baccalaureate from Washington College, Pennsylvania, I came to Cumberland, Md., where I obtained the position of principal of the Allegany County Academy. Being poor but proud, I was fortunate enough to procure board with Mrs. Mary Cresap, the widow of James Cresap, the son, as before stated, of Col. Michael Cresap, one of the most amiable and accomplished ladies I ever met.

"I was admitted into the family, not because her circumstances required her to take boarders, but because she wanted her son, the present Luther Martin Cresap, of Allegany County, to be under my personal control in the academy. At Mrs. Cresap's house I made the acquaintance of all the Cresaps, 'much people,' for the connection was a large one, and in point of rank and character second to none in Western Maryland. Among the many, not the least, was that excellent old man, the Rev. J. J. Jacobs, the father of ex-Governor Jacobs, of West Virginia. 'Father Jacobs,' as everybody called him, had been brought up from boyhood in the family of Capt. Michael Cresap, was his man of business, knew, I might say, all the acts of his life, and after his death married his widow, and had them in the press his defence of Capt. Cresap, a small volume of about one hundred and twenty pages, now on my desk. Here I first saw Jefferson's 'Notes on Virginia,' and heard Capt. Michael Cresap's name in connection with the murder of the Logan family. To charge that 'Col. Michael Cresap,' as his ancestors would have said, 'the chief and hero of the clan,' after he had given his life for his country, and after he had rested over twenty years in an honored grave, 'was a man famous for his many Indian murders' was certainly a cruel and grievous charge, and was so regarded by his friends and by all the community who had known him. It is therefore not 'wondrous strange' that it was resented with so much bitterness. It was utterly repugnant to the well-known character of Col. Cresap, and to every trait of character that belonged to the Cresap family.

"Some short time after I came to Cumberland to reside I paid a visit to Benjamin Tomlinson, an old gentleman, who then resided on his farm some four miles north of Cumberland. Mr. Tomlinson at that time (the close of the year 1826) I would say, from his appearance, must have been over eighty years of age, of fine personal appearance, large stature, and of great dignity of character; his character for truth and veracity 'unimpeached and unimpeachable.' No man in that community stood higher than Benjamin Tomlinson. During the course of our conversation it occurred to me that in passing and repassing from my home in Ohio to Washington College, Pennsylvania, I had frequently crossed a run in the 'Virginia Neck' which old Mr. Pew called 'Tomlinson's Run.' I asked him if he knew anything about it, or knew it got its name. He answered, 'Oh, yes: when I was a young man I had my hunting camp on that run, and it was called after me.' I then said to him, as that run is but a few miles from 'Baker's Fort,' you may know something of the murder of the Logan family. His answer was emphatic. 'I know all about it. I know every man who was present at the murder. Mr. Baker was my brother-in-law. He built the house called Baker's Fort, and resided in it with his wife, my sister, at the time of the murder. He had settled at that place and built the house for a permanent home.

"I made my home with my sister at that time. On the night before the murder, as was my usual mode of sleeping, I lay down before the fire, with my rifle at my side on the floor, wrapped in my blanket. At early dawn I was awakened by a knock at the door. I sprang up, seized my rifle, and called out, 'Who is there?' A voice from without answered, 'Is that you, Lin?' The voice was familiar, and I proceeded to open the door by removing the cordwood which was placed with the end of the wood against the door. When the door was opened I found at the door Benjamin Sappington and a party, some fifteen in number, who lived at a settlement on Buffalo Creek, in now Washington County, Pa., distant fourteen, or fifteen miles. I cannot now recall the names of any of the party except the names of Benjamin Sappington, Daniel Greathouse and his two sons, and Mr. Pew, my old acquaintance, 'Old Pew.' They were much excited, and said that it was reported in their settlement that 'Baker's Fort' would be attacked by the Indians that morning.

"Mr. Tomlinson said he assured Sappington and his party that he did not think that there was any danger of an attack, that there had been some nonsense felt amongst them on account of the killing of an Indian in a canoe down the river towards Steubenville, but the Indians knew that the settlers had nothing to do with it. The Indian was shot in his canoe by some strolling hunters out of mere wantonness. For the consequences the passing huntsmen cared nothing. The vengeance of the Indians could not affect them, and that the Indian knew this as well as the settler. They seemed, as Mr. Tomlinson said, to be much relieved, and said they would return to their homes. Mrs. Baker said as they had come so far to defend them, they must not go until she had prepared breakfast. To this all agreed. Mr. Baker, my brother-in-law, said Mr. Tomlinson, was very near-sighted, and could not see an animal at any distance, so he asked me to go with him to bring in the horses while my sister got the breakfast. We went but a short time in the forest, not far distant from the house, when we heard the report of several rifles towards the house. We ran with all our speed for the house. When we got there we found Sappington and his party had shot the Logan family. When I heard their story I drew my rifle on Ben Sappington, and would have killed him had not others interfered. It appeared, said Mr. Tomlinson, that within a few minutes from the time we left, a canoe passed off from the Ohio side containing Logan's mother, brother, and sister, the wife of a renegade white man, Simon Girty, who had a child in her arms that was not killed. Their object apparently was to visit Baker's house, and they crossed the river directly, went to the house, and sat down, when Sappington's party shot and killed the mother, brother, and sister, believing, as they said, that they were the advance of the attacking party. There was no breakfast that morning. Sappington and his party left, and we knew that it was death to the settler or instant flight. We took with us the child and what we could conveniently carry, and fled for an unexposed settlement that same morning.' That is a correct statement of the facts and circumstances under which the murder was committed, I have no doubt. It agrees with what was universally believed, and held to be the truth in all that portion of the country where the murder was perpetrated. I asked, 'was Michael Cresap present at the murder?' Mr. Tomlinson said he was not, nor was he at that time in the portion of the country. If on the Ohio at all, he was at his settlement at the flat of Grave Creek, seventy-four miles lower down the river. No settler would have done a deed of that kind, for the settlers on the Ohio at that time were too few to defend themselves against the Indians on the opposite bank of the Ohio.'

The evidence in favor of Cresap was so.overwhelming that Mr. Jefferson felt it necessary to substantiate or correct his statement, and on the 21st of March, 1800, he addressed a letter to Col. Gibson, in which he says,—

"I was within a day or two of putting into the press the evidence I had collected on this subject. I have been long in collecting it, because of the distance and dispersion of those acquainted with the transaction. However, I have at length that of a dozen or fifteen persons who clear up the mystery which threw doubt on this piece of history. It appears that instead of one, there were four different murders committed on the Indians. The first by Cresap and his party, a little above Wheeling, on two Indians. The second by the same persons, on the same or the next day, on a party of Indians encamped below Wheeling, at the mouth of Grave Creek, among whom were some of Logan's relatives. The Indians here returned the fire, and wounded one of Cresap's party. The third by Greathouse and Tomlinson, a few days after. This was a hunting-party of Indian men and women, encamped at the mouth of Yellow Creek, opposite to Baker's Bottom. Greathouse went to their camp as a friend, found them too strong, and invited them over to Baker's to drink. They came over, were furnished with as much rum as they would drink, and, when the men were quite drunk, Greathouse's party fell on and massacred the whole except a little girl, Logan's cousin, whom they made prisoner. Here his sister was murdered and some of his relations. The Indians over the river, alarmed at the guns, sent over two canoes of men to seek for their friends. Greathouse and his party received them as they approached the shore with a well-directed fire, and killed and wounded several. The popular report at a distance from the scene had blended all these together and made only one transaction of it; and passing from one to another unacquainted with the geography of the transaction, the Kanawha had been substituted for the Ohio. Hence, too, arose the doubt whether it was not Greathouse instead of Cresap who killed Logan's relations. The principal murder was by Greathouse, at Yellow Creek, but some of them had been killed a few days before, by Cresap, at Grave Creek."

In this letter Mr. Jefferson directly acquits Cresap of all participation in the Yellow Creek massacre, but endeavors to support his previous assertion that Cresap had been concerned in the murder of Logan's relatives by reference to the affair at Grave Creek, where he alleges some of Logan's relatives had been killed a few days before by Cresap's party. As a matter of fact there is no proof that any of Logan's relatives were killed in that encounter. Logan, in the note left at the house of John Roberts during the war, charges that the murder of his people occurred "on Yellow Creek," and refers to that alone as the cause of his anger. As regards the two Indians killed "a little above Wheeling," it appears from a contemporaneous account published in Philadelphia, that a man of the name of Stephens with two Indians were descending the Ohio in a canoe, in which one white man had been killed and another wounded a few days previous by three Cherokees, as he (Stephens) alleged; that they saw another canoe with some persons in it, whom he supposed to be Indians; that he tried to avoid them by crossing the river, and was fired upon and the two Indians killed. To this account Stephens added that "he suspects the murder was committed (not by Cresap himself), but by persons in confederacy with him." That was the first case of "murder" referred to by Mr. Jefferson, and yet Stephens does not charge Cresap with any participation in it, but "suspects it was done by some persons in confederacy with him." Even if this murder was committed by members of Cresap's party, could he be held responsible for the acts of a set of wild borderers, among whom the restraints of military discipline were not recognized?

The second affair mentioned by Mr. Jefferson in his letter of "confession and avoidance" was a fight between Cresap and fifteen men with fourteen Indians, who were concealed at the mouth of a creek "with the expectation of being attacked." Certainly there is no resemblance between a fair battle between men and the treacherous and bloody massacre of unarmed women and children. In the last edition of his "Notes on Virginia," Jefferson substituted the following in place of the original charge made against Cresap: "Capt. Michael Cresap and a certain Daniel Greathouse, leading on these parties, surprised at different times traveling and hunting-parties of the Indians, having their women and children with them, and murdered many. Among these were unfortunately the family of Logan, a chief celebrated in peace and in war, and long distinguished as a friend of the whites." This, as Mr. Mayer observes, "is certainly a mitigation of the charge against Capt. Cresap, but it leaves altogether indefinite the fact as to whether Greathouse and Cresap conjointly directed these parties, or which of the two murdered Logan's relatives. It relieves Cresap, however, altogether from the charge of murdering the Logan family in canoe on the Kanawha." As already pointed out, Mr. Jefferson, in his letter to Col. Gibson, had previously abandoned the charge that Cresap had committed the murders at Yellow Creek, and had shifted his ground to the assertion that a party under his command had killed a brother of Logan in an open fight at Grave Creek.

The authenticity of Logan's speech has often been called in question, and its genuineness may, perhaps, still admit of doubt. While it is unnecessary in this connection to enter into a full discussion of the probability or improbability of its being the production of the person to whom it is credited, it is not irrelevant to the subject under consideration to call attention briefly to the evidence which tends to establish it as the original production of Logan, and to that which has been collected against its authenticity.

The first witness on this point is John Gibson, who on the 4th day of April, 1800, twenty-six years after the event occurred, made affidavit that while the treaty of peace was under consideration by Lord Dunmore and the Indian chiefs, Logan "came to where this deponent was sitting and asked him to walk out with him; that they went into a copse of wood, where they sat down, when Logan, after shedding abundance of tears, delivered to him the speech nearly as related by Mr. Jefferson in his 'Notes on the State of Virginia'; that he, the deponent, told him then that it was not Col. Cresap who had murdered his relatives, and although his son, Capt. Michael Cresap, was with the party who had killed a Shawanese chief and other Indians, yet he was not present when his relatives were killed at Baker's, near the mouth of Yellow Creek, on the Ohio; that this deponent, on his return to camp, delivered the speech to Lord Dunmore; and that the murders perpetrated as above were considered as ultimately the cause of the war of 1774, commonly called Cresap's war." The testimony of Gen. George Rogers Clark, on the same side, has already been given, and according to his evidence it appears that Cresap's name was in Logan's speech as read by Lord Dunmore. James Dunlap, of Pittsburgh, in a letter to Mr. Brantz Mayer, declares that he frequently heard Col. Gibson give the same account of the speech as contained in his affidavit, with the addition that Gibson stated "he returned at once to his friends and wrote down the language of Logan immediately, and delivered it to Lord Dunmore in council." "The message or speech," says Mr. Mayer, "was circulated freely at Williamsburgh immediately after Dunmore's return from his campaign in the winter of 1774, and was published then in the Virginia Gazette on the 4th of February, 1775, and in New York on the 16th of February, 1775." William Mc Kee testifies in the IVth Appendix to Jefferson's "Notes," that being in the camp on the evening of the treaty made by Dunmore, he heard "repeated conversations concerning an extraordinary speech made at the treaty, or sent there by a chiefman of the Indians named Logan, and heard several attempts at a rehearsal of it." Against the authenticity of the speech, there is, in the first place, the argument of Luther Martin, son-in-law of Capt. Michael Cresap, dated the 29th of March, 1797, which may be found in the Olden Time Magazine, vol. ii. p. 51. Withers, in his "Chronicles of Border Warfare," says, "Two interpreters were sent to Logan by Lord Dunmore, requesting his attendance; but Logan replied that 'he was a warrior, not a counselor, and would not come.'" Mr. Withers, commenting on this, says, "Col. Benjamin Wilson, Sr., then an officer in Dunmore's army, says that he had conversed freely with one of the interpreters (Nicholson) in regard to the mission to Logan, and that neither from the interpreter, nor from any other one during the campaign, did he hear of the charge preferred in Logan's speech against Capt. Cresap as being engaged in the affair at Yellow Creek. Capt. Cresap was an officer in the division under Lord Dunmore; and it would seem strange, indeed, if Logan's speech had been made public at Camp Charlotte, and neither he (who was so naturally interested in it, and could at once have proven the falsehood of the allegation it contained) nor Col. Wilson (who was present during the whole conference between Lord Dunmore and the Indian chiefs, and at the time when the speeches were delivered sat immediately behind and close to Dunmore) should have heard nothing of it until years after." Mr. Neville B. Craig, in the second volume of the Olden Time, says, "We will state that many years ago, Mr. James Mc Kee, the brother of Alexander Mc Kee, the deputy of Sir William Johnson, stated to us distinctly that he had seen the speech in the hands of one of the Johnsons, whether Sir William or his successor, Guy, we do not recollect, before it was seen by Logan." The following testimony of Benjamin Tomlinson, of Allegany County, Md., and a brother-in-law of Baker, given in Cumberland on the 17th day of April, 1797, twenty-three years after the occurrence to which it relates, is of the same positive character: "Logan was not at the treaty. Perhaps Cornwallis, the chief of the Shawanese nation, met the announcement of grievances the Indians killed on Yellow Creek; but I believe neither Cresap nor any other person were named as the perpetrators; and perfectly recollect that I was that day officer of the guard, and stood near Dunmore's person, that consequently I saw and heard all that passed; that is, two or three days before the treaty, when I was on the outguard, Simon Girty, who was passing by, stopped me and conversed; he said he was going after Logan, but he did not like the business, for he was a surly fellow; he, however, proceeded on, and I saw him return on the day of the treaty, and Logan was not with him; at this time a circle was formed, and the treaty began. I saw John Gibson, on Girty's arrival, get up and go out of the circle and talk with Girty, after which he (Gibson) went into a tent, and after returning into the circle drew out of his pocket a piece of clean new paper, on which was written in his own handwriting a speech for and in the name of Logan. This I heard read three times, once by Gibson, and twice by Dunmore, the purport of which was that he, Logan, was the white man's friend; that on his journey to Pittsburgh to brighten this friendship, or on his return thence, all his friends were killed at Yellow Creek; that now when he died who should bury him, for the blood of Logan was running in no creature's veins; but neither was the name of Cresap nor the name of any other person mentioned in this speech. But I recollect to see Dunmore put this speech among the other treaty papers." There are many letters and documents of a highly interesting character throwing further light upon the subject, but more than enough has been adduced to convince the reader of Cresap's entire innocence of all participation in the massacre at Yellow Creek. That some Indians may have been killed by the party under Cresap's command is not denied, but they were killed after the commission of similar outrages by the Indians themselves, after information from the most reliable sources that the Indian tribes had determined upon and were about inaugurating hostilities, after the formal declaration of war by the whites, and in a fair encounter between men, in which there was no surprise or treachery, and for which both sides were prepared.

In regard to Logan's speech, Mr. Mayer, after an impartial consideration of all the testimony, expresses the opinion that "Gen. Clark's letter seems to prove conclusively that Cresap's name was in the message when read in the camp, for he jeered with his asserted importance in originating the war, whereupon Cresap broke forth in bitter invective against Greathouse; and, moreover, it is evident that Logan had previously charged Cresap with the murder, as will be seen by reference to the note addressed to 'Capt. Cresap,' which the Indian left in the house of Roberts, whose family he had murdered in 1774."

Col. Gibson, upon whose testimony the authenticity of the speech mainly rests, "was always regarded," says Mr. Mayer, "as an honest and truthful person. He enjoyed the confidence of Washington, who in 1781 intrusted him with the command of the Western military department. In 1782, when Gen. Irvine had succeeded him, Gibson was intrusted with the command during the general's absence, which continued for several months. Jefferson, Madison, and Harrison respected him. He was a major-general of militia, secretary of Indian territory under the administrations of Jefferson and Madison, member of the Pennsylvania Convention in 1778, and an associate judge of the Court of Common Pleas of Alleghany County, Pa. Chief Justice Gibson and Gen. George Gibson, sons of Col. George Gibson, who was mortally wounded at St. Clair's defeat, are his well-known and esteemed nephews."

In a letter dated "Alleghany, March 8, 1848," addressed to J. W. Biddle, of Pittsburgh, Rev. William Robinson, Jr., says, "I knew Gen. Gibson from my earliest childhood. He was one of the most artless and unsophisticated men in the world, and the last man on earth that would make a false statement in narrating events. He was a pretty good English scholar, with a remarkable memory, yet without any fancy or imagination, though watchful and observant of all around him."

In a letter to Lyman C. Draper, written in November, 1846, John Bannister Gibson, chief justice of Pennsylvania, and a nephew of Col. John Gibson, says,—

"At his return to camp, Mr. Gibson made an accurate translation of it (Logan's speech), which, as it was much admired, was probably preserved by Lord Dunmore among the archives of the government. After the lapse of almost half a century, Gen. Gibson would not assert that the speech published by Mr. Jefferson was a literal copy of his translation; but he was sure it contained the substance of it. Here it is proper to remark that he was as competent as Mr. Jefferson, or any one else, to give it the simple dress in which it appears. But whoever was entitled to the merit of it, Gen. Gibson said it was a poor picture of the original, uttered, as it was, in accents dictated by an abiding sense of his wrongs, and in tones expressive of the hopeless desolation of his heart. It was its last passionate throng. The man was done with impulses, even of revenge. He sunk into apathy from intemperance, and in the course of a year was murdered in a drunken fray." 1

BOUNDARY LINES.

The territory granted by Charles I. on June 20, 1632, to Cecilius Calvert, the second Lord Baltimore, under the name of the province of Maryland, was bounded on the east by the Atlantic Ocean and Delaware Bay and river, on the north by the fortyith parallel of north latitude, on the west by a line drawn from the northern boundary southward to the most western source of the Potomac River, and thence down the southern bank of that river to the Chesapeake Bay, and on the south by a line running from the last point to Watkins' Point, on the Eastern Shore of the bay, and thence east to the ocean. It will at once be perceived that these boundaries of the province are not those which now define the limits of the State. By examination of the original boundary of Maryland, it will be seen that the State has been deprived of the whole State of Delaware, and a strip of territory about twenty miles wide now forming part of the State of Pennsylvania, including in its limits the present city of Philadelphia, and a great part of Chester, Delaware, Lancaster, York, Adams, Franklin, Fulton, Bedford, and Somerset Counties. The whole number of acres of territory lost to Maryland may be summed up thus: to Delaware, one and a quarter millions; to Pennsylvania, two and a half millions; and to Virginia, one million; making a total loss of four and a quarter millions of acres, besides about one hundred and fifty thousand acres.

1 The precise manner of Logan's death seems involved in some obscurity. By one account he is represented as having been killed by his nephew, Tod-kah-dahs.
"left out" between Onancock River and the Scarborough line on the Eastern Shore.

Of the most of this valuable territory Maryland was deprived on the alleged ground that the Swedes and Dutch had established settlements in Delaware before Lord Baltimore's charter was obtained; and this plea was not only urged by the Penns, but has been repeated by historians, without any authentic proof of the assertion on which it is founded. It is certain no settlements of any kind had been made upon the territory granted to Lord Baltimore down to the time he received his charter, either under the authority of the crown or of the charter governments, except the trading-post established by Claiborne on Kent Island and the unauthorized settlements of the Dutch on the Delaware in 1631, which were abandoned in March of the following year. No permanent settlements were made upon the Delaware until the arrival of the Swedes in 1638, when disputes arose between them and the Dutch at Manhattan (now New York), who in 1655 finally succeeded in conquering "New Sweden." A number of the Swedes fled to Maryland, where they were kindly received.

Lord Baltimore, hearing of the proceedings of the Dutch, ordered Col. Nathaniel Utie, of Baltimore County, to notify the settlers on the Delaware within the limits of his grant that they must depart the province or submit to his government. This proceeding led to considerable negotiations between the contending parties for the settlement of their difficulties, without any definite result. On the 19th of October, 1659, the government of Maryland gave an answer to the Dutch ambassadors appointed by Governor Stuyvesant to wait upon the Maryland authorities at Patuxent, insisting on the right of the proprietary to the territory on the Delaware, and refusing to submit the matter in dispute to the governments of England and Holland. This refusal of Maryland to recognize the authority of the Dutch to treat with the province about the disputed territory bordering on the Delaware was followed by constant collisions between the Dutch and Maryland settlers near the disputed land.

In the mean time doubts had arisen in the Council of Maryland whether the Dutch settlement at New Amstel, on the Delaware, was really below the fortieth degree of north latitude, and as the Dutch West India Company appeared determined to maintain their possessions by force, while there was no prospect of any aid from the colonies should a forcible reduction be attempted, all further action was deferred until the will of the proprietary could be ascertained. Lord Baltimore, however, took care to obtain from the king, on July 21, 1661, a confirmation of his patent.

Charles II., provoked by the continued encroachments of the government of New Netherlands, determined to effect the conquest of the whole settlement. To accomplish this, on the 12th of March, 1664 (O. S.), he granted to his brother James, Duke of York and Albany, all that tract of country extending from the west banks of the Connecticut River to the eastern shore of Delaware Bay (including Long Island). The duke took possession in September, not only of the settlement on the Hudson, but of those on the Delaware south of forty degrees of north latitude, which, as we have seen, were within the limits of Lord Baltimore's charter. By the terms of capitulation the Dutch colonists were admitted to all the rights and privileges of English subjects. Under the new government the name of the town of New Amstel was changed to that of New Castle, and Altona to that of Christians, while the river and the bay into which it flows lost their old names, and received the English name of Delaware. From this period until the grant by Charles II. to William Penn, on the 4th of March, 1681 (O. S.), of the territory of Pennsylvania, the settlements on the Delaware were dependencies of the government of New York, although clearly within the limits of Maryland. The singular definition of the southern boundary in Penn's charter, which left open the question whether the boundary circle was to be a circle of twelve miles in circumference, or to be drawn around a diameter of twelve miles passing through New Castle, or with a radius of twelve miles beginning at New Castle, was the origin of the present boundary line ("Mason and Dixon's") dividing the North and South, and was one of the principal sources of the contention between Baltimore and Penn. The latter soon discovered that if his province extended no farther south than the fortieth degree he would not have a good port for ships; so he managed to have the southeast corner of his province fixed at twelve miles north of New Castle, and thus within Lord Baltimore's land. He then further obtained from the Duke of York the grant of the counties south of New Castle, or what is now the State of Delaware, which the duke had no right to convey, as these also were included in the charter of Maryland. Penn, however, claimed this territory on the ground that Baltimore's charter called for "uncultivated land," whereas a portion of this, he asserted, was cultivated by the Dutch at the time that charter was granted. This, as we have seen, was not the case.

1 See a full review of the boundary troubles in the writer's "History of Maryland," vol. i. pp. 230, 395, etc.
CHARLES CALVERT, FIFTH LORD BALTIMORE.
The Board of Trade, however, decided in favor of Penn.

On the 20th of April, 1681, Penn commissioned his cousin, William Markham, as deputy governor, and in May following he was dispatched to the province. He arrived at Upland, now Chester, Delaware, about July, 1681, and in December, 1682, Penn, who had arrived on the 27th of October, had an interview with Lord Baltimore at the house of Col. Thomas Tailler, in Anne Arundel County, to settle the disputed question of their boundaries. Though both charters fixed the fortieth parallel of north latitude as the line between Maryland and Pennsylvania, Penn tried hard to persuade Lord Baltimore to let the line be run farther south, so as to give him a tract of land about twenty miles wide running along the northern border of Maryland, while Lord Baltimore was to repay himself by taking from Virginia a small strip of the narrow peninsula below what is now Worcester County. Lord Baltimore naturally refused to make such an unfair bargain as this, or to rob Virginia for the benefit of Penn, and so the matter remained unsettled until 1732, when John, Richard, and Thomas Penn by some means succeeded in obtaining from Charles, fifth Lord Baltimore, a written agreement conceding to the Penns all their claims.

A large strip of territory about twenty miles wide, now forming part of the State of Pennsylvania, and running westward along the northern border of Western Maryland, was a portion of this disputed region, and in the troubles which arose from the antagonistic claims of the two provinces many of the principal citizens of this section of the province were involved. As early as December, 1732, Lord Baltimore, who had come to Maryland to settle the disputes, wrote to Governor Patrick Gordan, of Pennsylvania, calling his attention to the fact that "a most outrageous riot had lately been committed in Maryland by a great number of people calling themselves Pennsylvanians." John Lowe, of Baltimore County, his wife and family, were the victims of this border raid, which seems to have been entirely without justification or excuse, as far as Lowe, at least, was concerned. The dwellers on the Maryland side of the border, as may be supposed, were not slow in retaliating, and in May, 1734, John Hendricks and Joshua Minshall from their settlements on the Susquehanna, and two others from the borders of New Castle County, were carried off by the Maryland authorities and confined in the Annapolis jail. These troubles, however, would seem really to have begun with Penn's first settlement in the province, for we learn from the Pennsylvania records that at a council held at Philadelphia in 1684 a letter from one Samuel Lands was read "concerning Col. George Tallbot's going with three musquetiers to ye houses of Wm. Ogles, Jonas Erskin, and Andreas Tille, and told them if they would not forthwith yield Obedience to ye Lord Baltimore, and Own him to be their Propor, and pay rent to him, he would Turne them out of their houses and take their Land from them." And from the same source we learn that, in 1686, "ye Marylanders have lately reinforced their fort at Christina, and would not suffer John White to cut hay, but threatened those he employed to do it with their guns presented against them, and that what hay they had cut ye Marylanders sayd they would throw it into river." Moreover, it appears that about this same time one Maj. English "came into ye county of New Castle with about forty armed horsemen; left them at John Darby's whilst Maj. English and a Marry Land Capt. came to New Castle, where John White meeting him, made complaint to him of the abuses don him by ye Marylanders at ye fort. Maj. English told him that if thou wilt say 'you drunken dogg. Ned English, let me cunt hay,' I will give you leave."

Inroads and exasperations of this character continued on both sides for a long period, and appear not to have ceased even after the king himself had commanded the peace. In 1717 we hear complaints of "certain persons from Maryland who had lately surveyed out lands not far from Conestoga, and near the thickest of our settlements to the great disturbance of the inhabitants there;" and in 1722 "the secret and underhand practices of persons" from Maryland are referred to with virtuous indignation in the minutes of the Pennsylvania Councils,—"these secret and underhand practices" consisting apparently in an attempt to survey and take up lands on the west side of the Susquehanna. In the same year Governor Keith sent a letter to the Governor of Maryland, in which he refers to a report that "two magistrates of Pennsylvania, with some others, had been taken prisoners by a party of men in arms from Cecil County and carried before the justices of Kent County, who detained them in custody two days, and afterwards dismissed them upon a verbal promise to appear there next court."

In 1735, William Rumsey, a surveyor of Maryland, was apprehended by the sheriff of New Castle County and taken before the Governor of Pennsylvania, charged with committing and causing others to commit great abuse and violence against several inhabitants of Chester and Lancaster Counties, for no other reason than that those persons asserted the jurisdiction of this province [Pennsylvania] in those parts where they live." In 1736, Governor Ogle directed Thomas White, deputy surveyor, to lay out two hundred acres of land in the disputed territory of Baltimore County, and lying on the west side of the Susquehanna, for each of the following persons: Henry Munday, Edward Leet, Charles Higginbotham, James Kaine, John Smith, Hugh Kaine, James Nickleson, Robert Trotter, Robert Rowland, William Miles, William Greenlee, Stephen White, John Cross, John Kaine, Sr., John Kaine, Edward Ryly, Patrick Savage, Arthur Browlee, James Love, Anthony Dixon, Benjamin Dixon, James Morrow, Thomas King, Ralph Higginbotham, John McNabb, James McGee, Barnibe Clarke, Thomas Moore, Richard Ryan, George Bond, Thomas Linass, William Linass, John Linass, John Coats, Robert Jesson, George Moore, Robert Moore, Gibbons Jennings, Thomas Scarlet, William Carpenter, Richard Pope, Thomas Charlton, John Charlton, Sr., Edward Charlton, John Charlton, Thomas Charlton, Jr., Arthur Charlton, Henry Charlton, Jr., Richard Sedgwick, William Betty, William Betty, Jr., William Webb, Thomas Dawson, and John Dawson. Henry Munday and Edward Leet, however, were arrested by the Pennsylvania authorities, and the design to occupy the debatable land fell through. Among those who suffered in these border frays was Elisha Gatchel, a member of the Society of Friends, and a justice of the peace for the county of Chester, who was carried off by a party of Marylanders under Capt. Charlton, taken across the line, and made to give bail to answer the charge of speaking disrespectfully of Lord Baltimore. The most striking incident of these border feuds was the attack upon the house of Thomas Cresap, a citizen of Maryland, which was made by a body of armed men from Pennsylvania, who set fire to the house in which himself and family and several neighbors had taken refuge, and attempted to murder them as they made their escape from the flames. In this sharp contest one of Cresap's men was killed and himself wounded. He was also made prisoner, and conveyed to Philadelphia, where he was lodged in jail.

The Governor of Pennsylvania, in his report to his Council, gives the following account of the arrest of Cresap, who lived at this time at Wright's Ferry, opposite the town of Columbia, now Pennsylvania, where he obtained a Maryland title to five hundred acres of land:

"The sheriff of Lancaster, having called to his assistance twenty-four persons, went over Susquehanna on Tuesday night, the twenty-third of November [1736], in order to be at Cresap's early next morning and to have taken him by surprise, but they being discovered, Cresap secured himself in his house, and having six men with him he stood on his defence; that the sheriff rend the warrant to Cresap and required him to surrender, but he and those with him swore they would defend themselves to death; that the sheriff finding all persuasive means ineffectual sent for more assistance, but Cresap had fortified his house and fired so furiously on the sheriff and his company that they could not storm the house without the utmost hazard, there being near a hundred firearms in it; that they had taken an oath to stand by one another, with a resolution to kill any one that offered to capitulate; one, however, found means to desert him by getting out at the chimney; that the sheriff and his assistants having waited till near sunset and finding they must either return without executing their warrant or destroy the house to come at him, they set fire to it, but offered to quench it if he would surrender: he nevertheless obstinately persisted in his refusal, neither would he suffer his wife or children to leave the house, but fire at those who proposed; that when the fire prevailed and the floor was ready to fall in, those with him rushed forth loaded with arms, which as they fired at the sheriff and his assistants they threw away, and in the confusion one of Cresap's men, Michael Reisner, shot down by mistake another of the gang, named Lauchlan Malone, on whose body the coroner was taking an inquisition; that Cresap was at length apprehended."

Cresap before his capture had formed, with the knowledge of Governor Ogle, an association of about fifty men for the purpose of driving out the German settlers on the west side of the Susquehanna, and in the prosecution of their design they killed one Knowles Dant, who had resisted them. Cresap was then attacked, as related, made prisoner, and carried to Philadelphia, where the streets and doors were thronged with spectators to see the "Maryland Monster," who taunted the crowd by exclaiming, half in earnest, half in derision, "Why, this is the finest city in the province of Maryland!"

Before the formation of Cresap's association the sheriff of Baltimore County, with the sanction of the Maryland authorities, had marched with three hundred men at his back to eject the German settlers from their possessions, but was persuaded to relinquish his design on a pledge from the Germans that they would consult together, and give an answer to Lord Baltimore's requisition to acknowledge his authority. The attack upon Cresap added fresh fuel to the bitter feeling already prevailing, and Governor Ogle, after in vain demanding the release of Cresap, "ordered reprisals, and four German settlers were seized and carried to Baltimore, and a band of the associates, under one Higginbotham, proceeded forcibly to expel the Germans. Again the Council of Pennsylvania ordered out the sheriff of Lancaster and the power of his county, with directions to dispose detachments in proper positions to protect the people; when the sheriff entered the field the invaders retired, but returned as soon as his force was withdrawn. were made on both sides; the German settlers were harassed perpetually, in many instances driven from their farms, and in others deterred from every attempt to plant or improve." In October, 1737, sixteen Marylanders, under the leadership of Richard Lowder, broke into the jail at Lancaster and released Lowder's brother and a number of others who had been apprehended by the sheriff of Lancaster County.

This fierce border warfare at length attained so alarming a character that the Governor and both Houses of Assembly of Maryland found it necessary to make a true representation to the king and the proprietary "of the impious treatment which this Province in general, and more particularly your Majesty's subjects residing on the northern borders thereof, have of late suffered from the Government and inhabitants of the Province of Pennsylvania."

From this address it appears that the German settlers, of whom so much has been said, had in the first place applied to the authorities of Maryland for permission to settle on the land in dispute, that considerable quantities of land had been allotted to them (in what is now York County, Pa.), and that for a time they had paid taxes to the government of Maryland, and in every other way acknowledged its jurisdiction. The address charged, however, that they had been seduced from their allegiance by emissaries from Pennsylvania, who had promised them lighter taxes under that province, and they had accordingly refused to yield any further obedience to Maryland, under the pretense that their lands were within the limits of Pennsylvania. It was to reduce these people to submission and to maintain the proper authority of Maryland that Cresap's association was formed, and it was in the attempt to defend her territory from encroachment that he was subjected to the violence and imprisonment for which the Governor and Assembly now sought redress. This address had the effect of drawing from the King an order in Council, dated Aug. 18, 1737, in which the Governors of Maryland and Pennsylvania were commanded, on pain of His Majesty's highest displeasure, to put a stop to the tumults, riots, and outrageous disorders on the borders of their respective provinces. The dangerous situation of affairs in the two provinces at this time, and the desire to conciliate the crown, produced a ready compliance with this order, and an agreement was made in 1738 providing for the running of a provisional line between the provinces, which was not to interfere with the actual possessions of the settlers, but merely to suspend all grants of the disputed territory as defined by that line until the final adjustment of the boundaries. Col. Levin Gale and Samuel Chamberlaine on the part of Maryland, and Richard Peters and Lawrence Snowden on the part of Pennsylvania, were appointed commissioners to run the line, and began operations in the spring of 1739, when Col. Gale was called away by sickness in his family, and Mr. Chamberlaine declining to proceed in the absence of his colleague, the Pennsylvania commissioners, by the order of Governor Thomas, continued the work alone, and ran the line westward of the Susquehanna "to the most western of the Kittochtinny hills" (now called North Mountain).

Though this provisional line put a stop to the border troubles, the boundary question remained a subject of contention until the 4th of July, 1769, when it was finally determined by an agreement between the Penns and Lord Baltimore. In 1763 the east-and-west line between Maryland and Pennsylvania, known as Mason and Dixon's line, from the names of the surveyors, Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon, was established. Mason and Dixon, whose services had been secured by Lord Baltimore and Thomas and Richard Penn in London, arrived in Philadelphia on the 15th of November, 1763, and having settled upon their "tangent point, they proceeded to measure on its meridian fifteen miles from the parallel of the most southern part of Philadelphia, the north wall of a house on Cedar Street, occupied by Thomas Plumstead and Joseph Huddle." They thus determined what was to be the northeastern corner of Maryland, the beginning of the parallel of latitude that had been agreed upon as the boundary between the provinces.

On the 17th of June, 1765, the surveyors had carried the parallel of latitude to the Susquehanna River, and thereupon received instructions to continue it "as far as the province of Maryland and Pennsylvania were settled and inhabited." On the 27th of October they had reached North Mountain, and they record in their journal that they got Capt. Shelby to go with them to its summit, "to show them the course of the Potomac," when they found that they could see the Alleghany Mountains for many miles, and judged it "by its appearance to be about fifty miles' distance, in the direction of the line." On the 4th of June, 1766, we find them on the summit of the Little Alleghany, and at the end of that summer's work. The Indians were now troublesome, and the surveyors and their assistants began to feel alarmed for their safety. In 1767 the surveyors began their operations late in the season. A negotiation with the Six Nations was necessary, which Sir William Johnson had promised to conduct; but this was not concluded before May, so that it was not until the 8th of June that the surveyors reached their halting-place of the preceding year, on the summit of the Little Allegany Mountain. On the 14th of June they had advanced as far as the summit of the Great Allegany, where they were joined by an escort of fourteen Indians, with an interpreter, deputed by the chiefs of the Six Nations to accompany them. On the 25th of August the surveyors note that "John Green, one of the chiefs of the Mohawk nation, and his nephew, leaving them in order to return to their own country." The roving Indians of the wilderness, regardless of the escort, began also to give the white men uneasiness, and on the 29th of September twenty-six of the assistants quit the work for fear of the Shances and Delawares. Mason and Dixon had now but fifteen axemen left with them; but, nothing disheartened, they sent back to Fort Cumberland for aid, and pushed forward with the line. At length they reached a point two hundred and forty-four miles from the river Delaware, and within thirty-six miles of the whole distance to be run. And here, in the bottom of a valley, on the borders of a stream marked Dunkard Creek on their map, they came to an Indian war-path winding its way through the forest. And here their Indian escort told them that it was the will of the Six Nations that the surveys should be stayed. There was no alternative but obedience, and retracing their steps, they returned to Philadelphia, and reporting all these facts to the commissioners under the deed of 1760, they received an honorable discharge on the 26th of December, 1767. Subsequently, and by other surveyors, the line was carried out to its termination. A cairn of stones some five feet high, in the dense forest not far from the Board Tree Tunnel on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, now marks the termination of Mason and Dixon's line, calling by that name the southern boundary of Pennsylvania.

The boundary line thus run between Maryland and Pennsylvania was directed by the agreements of the parties to be marked in a particular manner, and the surveyors accordingly planted at the end of every fifth mile a stone, graven with the arms of the Penns on the north side, and of Frederick, sixth Lord Baltimore, on the south side. The intermediate miles were marked with smaller stones, having a P on the north side, and an M on the south. The stones with the sculptured arms were all sent from England. These were planted on the parallel of latitude as far as Siding Hill; but here, all wheel transportation ceasing in 1766, the further marking of the line was the vista of eight yards wide, with piles of stone on the crests of all the mountain ranges, built from six to seven feet high, as far as the summit of the Alleghany, beyond which the line was marked with posts, around which stones and earth were thrown, the better to preserve them.

The Southern and Western Boundary.—Having adjusted her eastern and northern boundaries, Maryland next turned her attention to the settlement of her southern and western boundaries. This related to, and grew out of, the description of "the first fountain of the Potomac," as the terminus of the western and southern boundaries of Maryland. This was predicated upon a grant made by Charles II., in the first year of his reign, to Lord Hopton, Lord Jermy, Lord Culpeper, Sir John Berkeley, Sir William Morton, Sir Dudley Wyatt, and Sir Thomas Culpeper, of "all that tract of land lying and being in America, and bounded within the heads of the rivers Rappahannock and Quiriphone, or Potomac (the courses of the said rivers as they are commonly called and known by the inhabitants), and the Chesapeake Bay." The validity of the grant was subsequently drawn in question, when it was surrendered, and a new one given in May, 1669, to the Earl of St. Albans, Lord Berkeley, Sir William Morton, and John H. Tretheway. Subsequently the title of this grant was vested in Thomas, Lord Culpeper, to whom a new patent was granted of the northern neck of Virginia by King James II. in the fourth year of his reign, and from him it descended to his daughter and only child, who was married to Lord Fairfax, and thus passed into the Fairfax family. This grant of the northern neck called for the lands lying on the south side of the Potomac to its head, while the charter of Lord Baltimore called for all the land to the fountain or source of the Potomac, which was of course its head. At first there were no disputes about the true location of the common call, but as soon as the settlements began to extend towards the head of the Potomac, jealousies and difficulties broke out between the two proprietaries. Lord Baltimore, who claimed from the head of the South Branch of the Potomac, its first fountain, remonstrated at a very early period with the Virginians, who had undertaken to define his limits by granting lands to the North Branch. Notwithstanding these protests, from the year 1753, Fairfax continued to adhere to the line as adjusted by him, and the proprietary of Maryland continued to assert his claim to the first fountain as provided by his charter.

For some years after the controversy was opened the attention of the government of the province was wholly engrossed with its internal concerns, and its efforts, in common with the other colonies, in the prosecution of the French and Indian wars; but those being terminated by the definitive treaty of peace, concluded at Paris in February, 1763, it is probable that the settlements of Maryland would soon have been pushed to its extreme limits. Had this occurred, there would soon have ensued a collision between the grants of the proprietary and of Fairfax, and this collision would at once either have brought about an amicable adjustment of the boundaries, or have forced it for determination before the King in Council. At this moment, when the conflict seemed inevitable, two causes for its suspension arose, which held this difference in abeyance until the Revolution came to convert it into a contest between free and independent States.

By the treaty of Paris, in 1763, a large territory was ceded to the English, within which newly-acquired territory it became necessary to organize colonial governments. For this and other purposes a proclamation was issued by the king on Oct. 7, 1763, by which, and to enable the English government to carry into effect its engagements to the Indians, the colonial governments generally were prohibited from granting any lands lying west of the sources or heads of any of the rivers flowing into the Atlantic from the west and northwest. On the 16th of April, 1764, instructions were issued by Governor Sharpe to the judges of the land-office, which set forth that the proprietary was desirous to have reserved for him ten thousand acres of land in the western part of Frederick County, to be held as a manor; and that he had therefore instructed the surveyor of that county not to execute any warrant on any lands lying beyond Fort Cumberland until that reserve was taken off. Until the manor of Lord Baltimore should be ascertained, Governor Sharpe thought proper to survey, in lieu thereof, five different tracts, containing in the whole 127,080 acres. This general interdict of the Crown, and the reserve to the proprietary, each tended to check the progress of the settlements in the direction of the debatable territory, and the proprietary and his officers now waited for the first favorable opportunity of bringing the question before the council which might present itself. In 1771 the first actual examination and survey of the two branches of the Potomac was made by Col. Thomas Cresap, under the direction of the proprietary, and he decided that the South Branch was the most western source, and therefore the first fountain.

In March, 1774, the subject of the reserve, on the lands lying westward of Fort Cumberland, being brought before the proprietary's board of revenue, which had been organized in 1766-67, that board determined that the object of the reserve had been accomplished in the surveys actually made for the proprietary, and therefore took off the reserve. This determination led to a correspondence between them and Daniel (of St. Thomas Jenifer), his lordship's agent and receiver-general, which fully establishes the fact that Lord Baltimore always claimed the South Branch of the Potomac as the most western source, and therefore the first fountain, and the point at which the meridian for the western boundary ought to start, and that he was only waiting for a favorable opportunity of bringing it before the King in Council. The board, however, still adhered to their determination, and large grants of land on the reserve were immediately made, and continued to be made, until October, 1774, when instructions were received from the proprietary directing the judges of the land-office to suspend all further grants of the reserved lands, and to prepare and transmit to his guardians an accurate list of all warrants issued under the order of the preceding March, and of all settlements and locations made within the territory thrown open by that order since the year 1763.

From the year 1753 to the Revolution the proprietary and his government continued to assert the Maryland claim, and were restrained from making grants of the disputed territory only through the apprehension of the interference of the Crown, and because of the adjustment between the Crown and Lord Fairfax. And if any doubts could arise from the possession of Fairfax, anterior to the Revolution, they are all removed by the constitution of Virginia adopted in June, 1776, which in its twenty-first ar.

2 At the time of the Revolution the following manors belonging to Lord Baltimore were undisposed of in Western Maryland: Monocacy manor and the reserves thereon, as returned by the surveyor of Frederick County, 13,143 acres; My Lord’s two manors and reserves, westward of Fort Cumberland, Allegany County, 125,130 acres.
ticle, after making certain reservations as to the navigation and use of the Potomac and Pocomoke, etc., expressly cedes and confirms to the State of Maryland "all the territory contained within its charter, with all the rights of property, jurisdiction, and government, and all other rights whatsoever, which may at any time heretofore have been claimed by Virginia." Thus, then, at the Revolution, by the express concession of the State of Virginia, the claims of Maryland to her charter limits existed in their full force, and are sustained by an express surrender of all counter-claims which Virginia might have. On the 6th of October, 1777, after the recognition by Virginia of the right of Maryland "to all the territory contained within its charter," by a resolution of the Assembly of Maryland Daniel (of St. Thomas) Jenifer, Thomas Stone, and Samuel Chase were appointed commissioners on the part of Maryland for the purpose of adjusting with the commissioners on the part of Virginia (George Mason and Alexander Henderson) "the navigation of, and jurisdiction over, that part of the Chesapeake Bay which lies within the limits of Virginia, and over the rivers Potomac and Pocomoke," subject to the ratification of the General Assembly. The result of the conferences of these commissioners was a compact, formed at Mount Vernon on the 28th of March, 1785, which accomplished all the purposes of their appointment, and which received the ratification of the Legislatures of both States at their next session.\(^1\)

The compact contains a series of commercial regulations, constituting a treaty of commerce predicated upon the basis of free and equal rights in the navigation of these rivers, to be maintained for their common benefit by their common efforts, and at their joint expense, and securing these in a manner eminently calculated to promote and establish an harmonious and beneficial intercourse. These regulations have been superseded by the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, which devolved upon Congress the power of regulating commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States; but they are worthy of all commendation, says McMahon, and deserve to be the most cherished part of our history, when we remember that to these may be traced the germ of the causes which called that Constitution into being.

Thus by this compact, irrevocable, except by the assent of both States, all differences were ended which could arise about the rights reserved by Virginia under her constitution; and Maryland was now, by the concessions of that very constitution itself, as well as by the intrinsic efficacy of her charter, confessedly entitled to all the territory which fell within her chartered limits, subject to the compact. Had she known and pursued her interests, this compact would never have been formed without making the adjustment of the western boundary a part of it; and had the consideration of it been introduced into the negotiation, and its settlement insisted upon by Maryland, it would doubtless have been conceded. Virginia was too much alive to the deep interests which she had staked upon that negotiation, and which might be lost by its failure, to have hazarded all for an interest comparatively so unimportant as her claim to mere jurisdiction over a portion of what was then her remote territory. That it should have been passed by whilst a subject so intimately connected with it was under consideration, and that it should not have been brought up, even as a subject-matter for negotiation, until 1795, is truly surprising. In that year, by a resolution of the General Assembly of Maryland, Messrs. William Pinkney, William Cooke, and Mr. Key were appointed commissioners on the part of Maryland to meet such commissioners as might be appointed on the part of Virginia, with power to adjust, by compact between the two States, the western and southern limits of Maryland, and the dividing lines and boundaries between it and Virginia, and also any claim of either State to territory within the limits of the other; and in the event of agreement, the compact was to be reported to the Legislature for its confirmation. Delay still followed delay, Mr. Pinkney having left the province, and Mr. Cooke having declined acceptance. In 1796, Charles Carroll of Carrollton and J. T. Chase were appointed in their stead. Mr. Key removed from the State, and Messrs. Carroll and Chase declined acceptance, and thus the State was again left without commissioners until 1801, when, by a resolution of that year, the power of appointment was given to the Governor and Council. Messrs. Duvall, McDowell, and Nelson were now appointed commissioners, and a correspondence upon the subject took place between Governors Mercer and Monroe. The result of it was that a resolution was passed by Virginia authorizing the appointment of commissioners to meet those appointed on the part of Maryland, but limiting their powers to the adjustment of the western line. Virginia was unwilling even to enter into a discussion of her right to the territory between the two branches, whilst Maryland went upon the broad principle of referring the whole subject to the commissioners. The power of the Virginia commissioners being thus restricted, Gov-

The Virginia act was, therefore, entirely different from that of Maryland, which directed the commissioners to begin at the most western source of the North Branch, be that where it might, and being dissimilar, it did not justify the appointment of commissioners on the part of Maryland. The Maryland act of 1818 expressly directed that the appointment, on the part of this State, should be made only after Virginia had embraced its propositions by the passage of a similar act; and no act could be considered similar which did not confide to their commissioners the same powers of adjustment and adopt the same basis of settlement. This was, however, overlooked by the Executive of Maryland, and commissioners were appointed on the part of both States, who assembled on the head-waters of the North Branch in the summer of 1824. The commissioners who acted on this occasion on the part of Maryland were Ezekiel Chambers and James Boyle.

Chancellor John Johnson, who was joined with them in the commission, died at Hancock, Washington Co., when on his journey to the place of assemblage, to the deep regret of his fellow-citizens, among whom he was conspicuous for his abilities as it, an act was passed by the General Assembly of Virginia in the year 1749 which adopts the order in Council, and confirms all previous grants made by the Crown of lands lying within the limits of the Fairfax grant. The line thus settled adopted the North Branch of the Potomac as the first head of that river, by which location of it, thus passing over the Fairfax grant to this branch, without even considering, much less respecting, the claims of the proprietary of Maryland, each of these interested parties were to be benefited at his expense. On the one hand the territory subject to the jurisdiction of Virginia was enlarged, and on the other Fairfax gained a more valuable territory lying between the North and South Branch than that which he lost lying east of the head of the South Branch, and between it and a meridian passing over the head of the North Branch. During all this period the situation of the proprietary of Maryland afforded to these parties the most favorable opportunity for practising the usurpation of his rights. His petition for the confirmation of his grant, so as to exclude the claims of the Penns, was then pending before the King in Council, to await the issue of the proceedings in chancery upon the agreement of 1732, which was all the while progressing. The momentous character of that proceeding was well calculated to engross his attention, and to divert it entirely from these extemporaneous transactions on the part of Fairfax, which did not upon their face even profess to interfere with his grant, and to the purpose of which he was awakened only by the knowledge of the actual location from the North Branch. His death shortly afterwards prevented the proprietary from adopting any decisive measures for the vindication of his rights, but the instructions of his successors in 1753, immediately after his accession to the proprietorship, excluded all inference of acquiescence in these unwarrantable acts, and manifested a full determination on his part to exclude all settlements which might be attempted under them upon his territory."—McLean's Maryland, p. 54.

1 This adjustment, which was the only one that ever took place, was one growing out of controversies between Fairfax and the government of Virginia, having reference solely to the conflicting territorial claims, and concluding by proceedings to which Lord Baltimore was in no wise a party, and of the existence of which he and his government appear to have had no knowledge before they were terminated. It appears that in 1733 a petition was preferred by Fairfax to the King in Council, praying that a commission might issue for running and marking the dividing line between his grant and the province of Virginia, and that the commission was accordingly issued, and the survey made and reported in August, 1737. In December, 1738, the several reports were referred to the consideration of the Council for plantation affairs, by whom a report was made in 1745, which determined the head-springs of the Rappahannock and Potomac, and directed that a commission should issue to extend the line. The report was confirmed by the King in Council; and the line being adjusted in conformity to a lawyer and his worth as a man. His body is buried in a marble tomb in the cemetery at Hancock.

Upon the instant of the assemblage of the boundary commissioners, it was discovered that the positive instructions to the Virginia commissioners would operate as a bar to all further proceedings. The Maryland commissioners came instructed to locate the western line from the most western source of that branch, whilst those on the part of Virginia were limited to Fairfax's location, without regard to the inquiry "whether it was or was not so located." Fairfax's stone is not, in fact, planted at the extreme western source; and even had it been so situated, it was scarcely consistent with the rights and dignity of Maryland to have entered into an adjustment with commissioners who were thus restricted without regard to the question of right. Maryland having by her act offered to relinquish all claim to the territory south of the North Branch, it was not to be expected, after this concession, that she should adopt as the source of that branch a point determined as such by her interested adversaries during the progress of the controversy. The spirit of amity and concession which had characterized all her proceedings in her repeated efforts to close this controversy had been met at every step by one of obstinate adherence on the part of Virginia to the full extent of her pretended claims, and it did not become her dignity as a State to submit herself implicitly to any terms which the latter might dictate. Her commissioners, therefore, properly insisted that the whole question as to the true source of the North Branch should be thrown open for investigation, and this being declined the negotiations ended.

So rests the controversy even to this day, and the proffer of Maryland to confine herself to the North Branch, as contained in her act of 1818, being thus rejected by Virginia, she is remitted to her original rights. Hitherto the course of Maryland has never contemplated aught but an amicable adjustment, and she has already made every advance towards this except that of an unqualified submission to the demands of Virginia. Every effort has failed, and the inhabitants of our western borders begin to feel more sensibly every day the consequences of the protracted struggle. It is a matter of reproach to the two States that this boundary, so extensive and important, should be unsettled to this day; and to Maryland it especially belongs to redeem herself from this reproach by adopting on the instant some legal or equitable decisive measures to bring about its adjustment. Our citizens would deeply regret the necessity of an adversary proceeding against a sister State which has held so high a place in our affections, yet in reviewing the

1 The distinguished lawyer and historian, John V. L. McMahon, in summing up this question, says, "The claim of Maryland, as the successor to the proprietary rights, extends both to the right of soil and the jurisdiction, and it seems to be now well settled that where there is a controversy between States involving the right of soil the Supreme Court of the United States has original jurisdiction over it, and one State may in that court enforce such a right against another State of the Union. It has been doubted whether, upon such a right as that of mere sovereignty or jurisdiction, a State could proceed at law, but even in such a case it has been held that there is at least an equitable remedy by bill praying to be quieted as to the disputed boundaries. Besides this direct mode of bringing the question to an issue, there is also an indirect mode of producing a decision of it which would eventually be equally as efficacious. It is but necessary for the State of Maryland to make a grant within the disputed territory, upon which a suit could immediately be instituted against those claiming it under a Virginia grant, and the question of superior right to grant would at once come up. It being then a case of conflicting claims under grants of different States, it might be at once transferred to the proper Circuit Court of the United States, and thence (if of sufficient value) to the Supreme Court for final determination. These are the modes of proceeding open to Maryland, and if she still retains and intends to adhere to her original claim, she should be prompt in the prosecution of it. All further hopes of obtaining it by cession are at an end, and whatever course she may resolve to adopt should be at once determined upon. What the boundary line may be is not a matter of such moment to her citizens as that it should be definite and undisputed. In any issue of the contest, it would be the duty of Maryland to confirm all the anterior grants from the proprietaries of the neck. No attempt would be made to disturb titles so derived, and the contest would be mainly for the sovereignty of the territory. Thus respecting and protecting private rights, her claim would be stripped of all its harshness, and, if successful, whilst it enlarged and enriched her territory, would be a monument of her justice."
CHAPTER VII.

THE WAR FOR INDEPENDENCE.

The Stamp Act—Declared Unconstitutional in Frederick—The Sons of Liberty—Cresap's Riflemen—The Maryland Line—Conolly's Treason—Hanging of Tories in Frederick—Peace and Independence.

The treaty of Paris of Feb. 10, 1763, gave to Great Britain all the territory east of the Mississippi, from the Gulf of Mexico to Hudson's Bay, and to the American colonies peace along the western borders with the savage enemies who had for nearly a century made them the scenes of pillage, devastation, and murder.

In their joy and exultation it is not wonderful that the colonists believed that a brighter day was about to dawn, and that a future of happiness and prosperity was opening before them. Patriotic and loyal addresses were sent to the king, and public sentiments of gratitude were offered. Yet in the midst of all their happiness and hope lay the amaranth obliqué, the drop of bitterness which was in time to turn all the sweetness to gall.

The main objects of the parliamentary measures which followed the peace of 1763, were to relieve the financial embarrassments of Great Britain, and to punish the colonies for the reluctance and insubordination they had shown in meeting her demands. The manner in which the royal requisitions had been canvassed in the provincial Legislatures, and particularly in that of Maryland, had exhibited a growing spirit of freedom in the colonial governments which was by no means pleasing to the mother-country, and which it was now resolved to repress before it should be too late.

It had long been the avowed right as well as the policy of England to keep to herself the colonial trade, and many acts of Parliament had been framed with this view. The Navigation Act of 1651 has been generally supposed to have been the beginning of that system which had for its object the suppression of the colonial carrying trade; but this is an error. Long before this period, in consequence of the heavy duties and impositions levied by the Crown, the Southern planters sent their tobacco to Holland, to the considerable detriment of English revenue and commerce. To counteract this an order was issued by the King in Council "that no tobacco or other productions of the colonies should thenceforth be carried into any foreign ports until they were first landed in England and the duties paid." This was the beginning of a system of commercial monopoly which continued until the American Revolution.

But though the system of monopoly proved as prejudicial to those who bore its restraints as it was profitable for those for whose benefit it was imposed, it was yet professedly for the regulation of trade and not for the acquisition of revenue. The fundamental principle of exemption from the taxation of England was not only established by the express words of the charter of Maryland, but had been the uninterrupted practice of the colony from the first settlement. The war with France in 1754, however, revived the proposition to tax the colonies; and it was accordingly resolved "to raise funds for American affairs by a stamp duty and a duty on products of the West Indies imported into the continental colonies." A tax upon "stamped paper" was also suggested, and these projects were pressed upon Pitt immediately upon his accession to the ministry, but he " scorned to take an unjust and ungenerous advantage" of the colonies. Others with less lofty ideas of national principle and policy were found to carry out these purposes, and on the 22d of March, 1765, the Stamp Act received the royal assent.

It provided that all bills, bonds, leases, notes, ships' papers, insurance policies, and legal documents, to be valid in the courts, must be written on stamped paper, which was to be sold by public officers at prices that constituted a tax. In America the announcement of the passage of the Stamp Act aroused a strong spirit of indignation and determined resistance to its mandates. Public assemblies put forth protestations the most eloquent, resolves the most determined in opposition, while the merchants of the larger cities, whose patriotism preferred the public weal to private emolument, entered into engagements not to import goods from England until the act should be repealed; and from one end of the continent to the other the love of civil liberty strengthened the nerve and animated the hearts of the colonists. The English ministry selected as stamp distributor for Maryland,—Zachariah Hood, a native of the province, and a merchant of Annapolis. In no section of the province was more determined opposition manifested to the obnoxious measure than in Western Maryland, and on Aug. 29, 1765, the new stamp distributor was burnt in effigy by the people of Frederick Town. While public feeling was thus agitated, the Governor called the Assembly together to take such measures as might be deemed advisable, and Frederick County, which at that time constituted the whole of Western Maryland, sent as her representatives in the important deliberations of this body, Thomas Cresap, Joseph Chaplain, Fielder Gantt, and James Smith.

Tmental Congress proposed by Massachusetts, and adopted resolutions protesting against the Stamp Act; but the bold and aggressive temper of the hardy frontiersmen of the western section of the province did not suffer them to await the uncertain result of petitions, protestations, and deliberations. An opportunity of manifesting their spirit and determination was soon presented. The fall term of the Frederick County Court commenced on the 15th of November, 1765, and among those present were the worshipful justices Thomas Beatty, William Luckett, Charles Jones, Thomas Price, and David Lynn; Sheriff, George Murdoch, and Clerk, John Darnall. On the 18th Justices Joseph Smith, David Lynn, Charles Jones, Samuel Beall, Joseph Beall, Peter Bainbridge, Thomas Price, Andrew Hugh, William Blair, William Luckett, James Dickson, and Thomas Beatty were present, and ordered the following resolution and opinion to be recorded among the minutes of the court:

"Upon application of Michael Ashford Dowden, bail of James Veach, at the suit of a certain Stephen West to surrender said James Veach in discharge of himself, which court ordered to be done, and an entry of the surrender to be made accordingly, which John Darnall, Clerks of the Court, refused to make, and having also refused to issue any process set of his office, or to make the necessary entries of the Court proceedings, alleging that he conceives there is an Act of Parliament imposing stamp duties on all legal proceedings, and therefore that he cannot safely proceed in exercising his office without proper stamps,

"It is the unanimous resolution and opinion of this Court that all the business thereof shall and ought to be transacted in the usual and accustomed manner, without any inconvenience or delay to be occasioned from the want of Stamped Paper, Parchment, or Yellum, and that all proceedings shall be valid and effectual without the use of Stamps, and they enjoin and order all Sheriffs, Clerks, Counsellors, Attorneys, and all officers of the Court to proceed in their several avocations as usual, which Resolution and Opinion are grounded on the following and other reasons:

"1st. It is conceived that there has not been a legal publication yet made of any Act of Parliament whatever imposing a Stamp Duty on the Colonies. Therefore this Court are of opinion that until the existence of such an Act is properly notified, it would be culpable in them to permit or suffer a total stagnation of business, which must inevitably be productive of innumerable injuries to individuals, and have a tendency to subvert all principles of civil government.

"2d. As no Stamps are yet arrived in this Province, and the inhabitants have no means of procuring any, this Court are of opinion that it would be an injustice of the most wanton oppression to deprive any person of a legal remedy for the recovery of his property for omitting that which is impossible to perform."

The clerk of the court, apprehending damage to himself if he made any entry or issued any process without stamped paper, refused to comply with the order of the court, upon which it passed the following order:

"Ordered, that John Darnall, clerk of this Court, be committed to the custody of the sheriff of this county for a contempt of the authority of this court, he having refused to comply with the foregoing order of this Court relative to the execution of his office in issuing processes and making the necessary entries of the Court's proceedings; and that he stands committed for the above offense until he comply with the above mentioned order."

The clerk then submitted to the order of the court, and upon paying the costs was discharged.

The decision of the court was celebrated in Frederick Town on the 30th of November in a manner most characteristic of the times.

The following amusing description of it is published in the Maryland Gazette of Dec. 16, 1765:

"The Stamp Act having received a mortal wound by the hands of justice on Saturday last gave up the ghost, to the great joy of the inhabitants of Frederick County. The lifeless body lay exposed to public ignomy till yesterday, when it was thought proper, for preventing infection from its stench, to bury it in the following manner: The Sons of Liberty assembled at the house of Mr. Samuel Swearingen in the afternoon, and the coffin was taken up exactly at three o'clock."

2. Drums.

3. The banner displayed with this inscription in large characters: 'Constitutional Liberty asserted by the Magistrates of Frederick County, 224 November, 1765.'

4. The Cap of Liberty mounted on a staff with the several following inscriptions: 'Magna Charta, Charter of Maryland, Trials by Juries Restored, Oppression Removed, Liberty and Loyalty.'

5. Conductors.

6. The coffin with this inscription on the lid: 'The Stamp Act expired of a mortal stab received from the genius of liberty in Frederick County Court, 254 November, 1765, Aged 22 days.'

On the ends, sides, and ledges of the coffin appeared several inscriptions, which were all together deposited in the ground as appendages to the Stamp Act, viz.: 'Tyrannty,' 'Villeneuage,' 'Military Execution,' 'Soldiers quartered in Private Houses,' 'Court of Vice-Admiralty,' 'Guarda de Castas to Prevent Corruption in North Americans from a redundancy of Spanish dollars,' 'Britoas Employed in Fasening Chains on the Necks of British Subjects,' 'Fines,' 'Imprisonment,' 'Ruin,' 'Desolation,' 'Slavery taking Possession of America in order to Extend Her Dominion over Great Britain.'

His countenance pale and dejected, his dress disorderly, unsuitable to his rank, and betraying great inward distraction of mind, and his tottering situation (being scarce able to keep his seat) demonstrated the weakness to which he was reduced, and plainly indicated the melancholy catastrophe which shortly ensued.

During the whole procession, which marched through the principal streets till it arrived at the gallows erected on the Court-house Green, the bells continued ringing; and on every buzz by the crowd, or loud laugh of female spectators, Z— II —, Esq., was observed to nod, or drop his head into his bosom, in token of the utmost sorrow and confusion.

dug, the drums ceasing, and proclamation made for silence, Z—II—Esq., was observed to be struck with such astonishment that he seemed to demand audience by a weak motion of his head, he was not able to utter a word, and his features were fixed as death. Being asked whether he had anything to say, he made no answer, but a paper appearing in his bosom, was taken out; and it being demanded whether that paper contained the substance of what he had to say on the occasion, he continued silent, but was seen to make a faint nod of approbation.

"The paper, which was ordered to be read, contained the following words, and appears to have been composed by him by way of funeral oration or lamentation over the body of that beloved act which had engrossed his whole mind and affections:—"Good people,—for countrymen I dare not call you, having forfeited all claim or right to that appellation,—wonder not at my hesitation of speech, or my sighs and groans on this sad occasion, the powers of utterance being, in a great measure, taken from me by the sight of that mournful object! Cursed be the day, that direful day, in which my eyes beheld the fatal catastrophe of the beloved of my soul! May the 23d November be struck out of the Calendar, and never be reckoned in the future annals of time! And shall a record appear to extirpate the downfall of my beloved, naked and unadorned with the beautiful stamp which ought to have been annexed by my influence? Can I possibly survive the dreadful thought? And must all my hopes perish, my schemes for advancing my fortune at the expense of my country be blasted, and public eminence triumph over private gain? Shall Maryland freely export her wheat and corn and find out markets for her flour and provisions without my participation in the fruits of the toil and sweat of her laborious sons? Shall the press continue free, and exist only to publish my disgraces, and instill notions of constitutional rights and liberties into the minds of North Americans? Shall the power of taxing the poor (who are chiefly involved in the duties of the Stamp Act), by imposing an arbitrary price on stamped paper, be wrested from me? and instead of lending it over my countrymen, must I need be reduced to the state of an exile, a fugitive, and a vagabond on the face of the earth? Forbid it, all ye black infernal powers of tyranny, avarice, and oppression! For to you I have devoted myself! But, soft! Your powers are encrusted and your dominion blasted by the bold Sons of Liberty, before whom I now stand. Pardon, good people, this last testimony of my affection to the deceased. For her I despised country, humanity, friendship, kindred, and all the ties of honor, nature, gratitude, and honesty. For her was every motive of justice, benevolence, pity, and compassion banished from my breast. For her could I have sacrificed the good of the public, the happiness of individuals, and (encrusted in her embraces) have smiled at the curses of the poor, the tears of the orphan, the cries of the widow, the groans of the oppressed, and without one pang of remorse have viewed the load of my birth snatching her teeth under the load of bondage, whilst I enjoyed the sunshine of ministerial influence, and decked myself in the spoils of the wretched and unfortunate! Dear object of my warmest wishes! thou art now expired under the hand of Justice. The same spirit animated us both, and the cold grasp of fate is now upon me! My faculties sink together with thee, and death freezes my stagnating fluids! Let me be buried together with thee, and one grave receive our breathless remains! I hope, good people, you will not refuse this last request of a dying person. And, Oh! Oh! Oh!"

"No sooner had the person appointed to read it come to the "Oh! Oh!"—Esq., was seen to sink sud- denly down and tumble out of the chariot, his body becoming instantaneously cold and stiff, so violent an assault had grief made on all his vital faculties, and left him a lifeless figure scarce resembling humanity. As he was falling, a Son of Liberty, with a voice like thunder, cried out, "Let him die like a dog!" A loud buzz and roll of the drums immediately followed, and, according to his own request, his corpse was deposited in the earth together with that of his beloved.

"The grave being filled up, and acclamations repeated, the company marched in their former order, with colors, banner, &c., to the house of Mr. Samuel Swearingen, where an elegant supper was prepared, and a ball given to the ladies, who made a brilliant appearance on the occasion. Many loyal and patriotic toasts were drunk, and the whole concluded with the utmost decorum!"

The opposition against the government was now organized into a compact and enterprising party, strengthening itself throughout the province, and making itself known by its influence over the action of representatives in the Assembly. In Maryland its more aggressive members, under the name of "Sons of Liberty,"—a phrase used by Barré in his celebrated speech in Parliament in February, 1765,—by a series of bold and defiant attacks upon the government of the province, soon increased their power and steadily sapped the reverence for British law and legislative authority. In October (1765) the Sons of Liberty in Frederick County formed an organization under the leadership of Col. Thomas Cresap, and in December about three or four hundred of them, "armed with guns and tomahawks," assembled at Frederick-town, and threatened to "march down in companies to Annapolis, in order to settle the disputes between the two Houses of Assembly." 1

The bold example of Frederick Court, and the firm

1 Dr. David Ross, in his deposition, submitted to the Assembly, said that about the 27th or 29th of October a "writing addressed to the Lower-House of Assembly" was circulated in Frederick County for signatures, which was in substance as follows: "It expressed a satisfaction of the conduct of the Lower House in opposing the Stamp Act, and intimated a reliance that they would endeavor, like the renowned, true, ancient Roman Senate, to suppress any future attempts to deprive them of their liberty; it also expressed that the signers were informed that a large unjust claim in tobacco was made against the public by particular gentlemen in Annapolis [alluding to the Governor and his Council, who insisted on the collection of the twelve pence per hogshead on tobacco exported under the act of 1701, and which the Lower House, since 1729, had constantly and ineffectually declared that his lordship had no right to collect], preventing the payment of other just claims, and desiring that if the said unjust and dishonorable claim should still be insisted upon the Lower House would give speedy intelligence, in order that the signers might come down and cause justice to take place." These threats produced considerable excitement in Annapolis, as it was rumored at one time that some of the "Sons" were already at Elk Ridge, on their march to the capital. The Governor became alarmed, and immediately summoned his Council together, and laid the whole matter before them. (See House Journal, Dec. 11, 1765.)
and determined spirit of the yeomanry of Western Maryland, inspired the Sons of Liberty in other sections, and on the 31st of March, 1766, the Provincial Court at Annapolis, yielding to the stern demands of these representatives of the people, passed the following order, which was at once obeyed by the public officers, and the detested Stamp Act was in Maryland forever null and void:

"It is by the court here ordered that the clerk of this court from henceforth issue all manner of process, file all pleadings, give copies, and transact all business whatsoever in his office for which application shall be made to him by any inhabitant of this province, as usual, without stamped paper."

The universal opposition in the colonies provoked by the Stamp Act, and the injury resulting from it to English commerce and manufactures, caused its repeal on the 18th of March, 1766, and the news of its repeal, which was received in Annapolis on the 22d of May, was celebrated with every manifestation of private and public delight in Western Maryland and every other part of the province.

The first exultation that followed the repeal of the Stamp Act was not destined to be of long duration. In May, 1767, Charles Townshend, Chancellor of the Exchequer, introduced in Parliament a series of revenue acts, the principal of which passed and received the royal assent on June 29th, to go into effect on the 29th of November. These acts, in brief, imposed duties on glass, paper, pasteboard, white and red lead, painters' colors, and tea imported into the colonies; established a board of customs at Boston to collect the revenue throughout America, and legalized writs of assistance. This new scheme of taxation at once revived the spirit of resistance in Maryland, and led to the reorganization of the non-importation associations which had sprung into existence during the previous agitation. The Maryland non-importation association was sustained in vigorous operation by special committees, appointed by kindred associations in each of the counties, who were charged with the duty of inquiring into and reporting the facts of every case of actual or suspected violation of the agreement, and was continued up to the breaking out of the Revolutionary war. In October, 1769, a number of wagons of contraband goods, valued at three hundred pounds, were shipped from Pennsylvania to Frederick, and not being accompanied with the proper certificates, they were stored at the risk and cost of the owners. Meetings were held in all parts of the province to give expression to the popular feeling in regard to the despotic course of the government. The first meeting held in Frederick County, as published in the Maryland Gazette at Annapolis, was convened at the old school-house, not far from Troxell's mill, on Tom's Creek, on Sunday, the 28th of August, 1770. The meeting was largely attended by the old inhabitants, who were deeply impressed by the situation. There were present on that occasion William Blair, an old resident of Scottish descent, James Shields, Sr., William Shields, Charles Robinson, Patrick Haney, Robert Brown, Henry Hockersmith, William Elder, son of Guy, Samuel Westfall, Moses Kennedy, Alexander Stewart, William Curran, Jr., Charles Carroll, William Koontz, Christian Hoover, John Smith, Daniel McLean, John Faires, John Long, Arthur Row, John Crabe, Moses Ambrose, George Kelly, Walter Dulany, Thomas J. Bowie, James Park, Robert Agnew, John Corrick, Frederick Troxell, Rudolf Nead, Octavius S. Taney, George Ovelman, Dominick Bradley, Thomas Hughes, Phillip Weller, Jacob Valentine, William Brawner, Thomas Martin, Daniel Morrison, William Munroe, Henry Brook, and others. It was agreed by a "show of hands" that William Blair should be called to the chair, and John Faires appointed secretary. The meeting was then addressed by Walter Dulany and William Elder, son of Guy, who concluded by offering the following resolution:

"Resolved, by the inhabitants of Tom's Crook, Frederick County, in the province of Maryland, loyal to their king and country, that we reaffirm the great Magna Charta of our Civil and Religious Rights, as granted by Charles of England to Lord Baltimore and the inhabitants of this colony, as reaffirmed on the first landing of the Pilgrim Fathers of Maryland, that there shall be a perfect freedom of conscience, and every person be allowed to enjoy his religious and political privileges and immunities unmolested."

The resolution was read and re-read and adopted by a "showing of hands." It was further

"Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the Annapolis Gazette and Bradford's paper at Philadelphia."

In the mean time local causes of complaint served to intensify public feeling and increase the general opposition.

The Assembly having failed to provide for the fees of public officers, or for the assessments for the support of the clergy, Governor Eden undertook to regulate the former by proclamation, leaving the latter to be collected under an old act of 1702, which he claimed had been revived by the failure of the Assembly to legislate on the subject. Governor Eden's action was a virtual assumption of the legislative prerogative of taxation, and involved in a measure the principle at stake in the contest with the mother-country. It immediately gave rise to great public excitement, warm advocates appeared on either side of the question, and the discussion assumed a tone of much bitterness and animosity. Among the champions of the proclamation appeared a writer who put forth his views in a dialogue between two citizens, one of whom attacked the obnoxious measure, and the other defended it, the victory being given to the "Second Citizen," its defender. The great ability and adroitness of his article marked it as the production of no common mind, and called forth an antagonist of corresponding strength. Charles Carroll of Carrollton stepped forward on February 4th, and assumed the cause and the signature of the "First Citizen," whereupon Daniel Dulany, the provincial secretary, and the ablest lawyer in the province, became Mr. Carroll's antagonist, under the signature of "Antilon." The elections held in May, 1773, during the progress of this discussion, were attended with great excitement, and resulted in the complete triumph of the antiproclamation party. Immediately after the result had been announced the people of Frederick and other counties celebrated the victory with great rejoicings; and at a public meeting the thanks of the people of Frederick were ordered to be formally presented by their delegates to the "First Citizen" for the patriotic service which he had rendered to the popular cause in his discussion with "Antilon," which was accordingly done in the following communication:

"May 23, 1773.

"Sir,—The freemen of Frederick County (to so few of whom you are personally known) are generally acquainted with your merit. The service you have done your country in plainly and clearly stating and evincing the illegality of the late proclamation for officers' fees appears to them justly to claim their thanks, they have therefore directed us, their representatives, to make known their sentiments to you, and we with pleasure take this early opportunity of returning you the thanks of the freemen of Frederick County for your spirited, manly, and able opposition to that illegal, arbitrary, and unconstitutional measure.

"We are, Sir, with the greatest respect, your most obedient servants,

1 On Saturday, May 22, 1773, the polls closed in Frederick County, and Messrs. Thos. Sprigg Wootton, Charles Beatty, Jonathan Hagar, and Henry Griffith were declared duly elected. On the afternoon of that day a numerous and very respectable body of the freemen of the county assembled at the coffee-house, when the proclamation was read, and unanimously declared illegal, unconstitutional, and oppressive, and sentenced to be carried to the gallows and hanged thereon, and afterwards to be buried face downwards, that by every ineffectual struggle it might descend still deeper into obscurity. The proclamation was then put in a coffin prepared for the purpose and carried to the place of execution, attended by a large concourse of at least one thousand people, who moved in slow and regular order, attended with drums, fifes, bag-pipes, playing slow music suitable to the occasion. The sentence was executed, to the universal joy and satisfaction of the spectators, under a general discharge of small-arms.
freedom will be to break off all commerce with Great Britain and the West Indies until the said act be repealed, and the right of taxation given up on permanent principles.

"Resolved, unanimously, That Mr. Henry Griffith, Dr. Thomas Sprigg Wooster, Nathan Magruder, Evan Thomas, Richard Brooke, Richard Thomas, Zadok Magruder, Dr. William Baker, Thomas Crampin, Jr., and Allen Bowie be a committee to attend the general committee at Annapolis, and of correspondence for the lower part of Frederick County, and that any six of them have power to receive and communicate intelligence to and from their neighboring committees.

"Resolved, unanimously, That a copy of these our sentiments be immediately transmitted to Annapolis, and inserted in the Maryland Gazette.

Signed per order.

"ARCHIBALD OME, Clerk."

On the 20th of June a meeting of the citizens of Frederick County was held at the court-house in Frederick Town, at which the following resolutions were adopted, John Hanson presiding:

"I. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this meeting that the town of Boston is now suffering to the common cause of America, and that it is the duty of every colony in America to unite in the most effectual means to obtain a repeal of the late act of Parliament for blocking up the harbor of Boston.

"II. That it is the opinion of a great majority of this meeting that if the colonies come into a joint resolution to stop all imports from, and exports to, Great Britain and the West Indies till the act of Parliament for blocking up the harbor of Boston, as well as every other act oppressive to American liberty, be repealed, the same may be the means of preserving to American her rights, liberties, and privileges.

"III. That, therefore, this meeting will join in an association with the several counties in this province and the principal colonies in America to put a stop to all exports, and imports from, Great Britain and the West Indies, shipped after the 25th day of July next, or such other day as may be agreed on, until the said acts shall be repealed, and that such association shall be upon oath.

"IV. That we, the inhabitants of Frederick County, will not deal or have any connections with that colony, province, or town which shall decline or refuse to come into similar resolutions with a majority of the colonies.

"V. That no act shall be commenced after the step shall be put to imports and exports for the recovery of any debt due to any person whatsoever, unless the debtor be about to abscond, or being appealed to shall refuse to give bond and security.

"VI. That Messrs. John Hanson, Thomas Price, George Scott, Benjamin Dulany, George Murdock, Philip Thomas, Alexander C. Hanson, Baker Johnson, and Andrew Scott be a committee to attend the general congress at Annapolis, and that those gentlemen, together with Messrs. John Cary, Christopher Edelen, Conrad Groth, Thomas Schley, Peter Hoffman, and Archibald Boyd, be a committee of correspondence to receive and answer letters, and in any emergency to call a general meeting, and that any six shall have power to act.

"Ordered, that these resolves be immediately sent to Annapolis, that they may be printed in the Maryland Gazette.

"Signed per order.

"ARCHIBALD BOYD, Ct. Com."

Another meeting was held at Elizabeth Town on the 2d of July, of which the Maryland Gazette gives the following account:

"On Saturday, the 2d of July, 1774, about eight hundred of the principal inhabitants of the upper part of Frederick County, Md., assembled at Elizabeth Town, and being deeply impressed with a sense of the danger to which their natural and constitutional rights and privileges were exposed by the arbitrary measures of the British Parliament, do think it their duty to declare publicly their sentiments on so interesting a subject, and to enter into such Resolutions as may be the means of preferring their freedom. After choosing John Stall, Esq., their Moderator, the following resolves were unanimously entered into:

"I. That the Act of Parliament for blocking up the harbor of the Town of Boston is a dangerous invasion of American liberty, and that the town of Boston is now suffering in the common cause, and ought to be assisted by the other Colonies.

"II. That the stopping all commercial intercourse with Great Britain will be the most effectual means for fixing our Liberties on the footing we desire.

"III. That a general congress of Delegates from the several colonies to effect a uniform plan of conduct for all America is highly necessary, and that we will strictly adhere to any measure that may be adopted by them for the preservation of our Liberties.

"IV. That the surest means for continuing a people free and happy is the dismission all luxuries, and depending only on their own fields and docks for the comfortable necessities of Life.

"V. That they will not, after this day, drink any Tea, nor suffer the same to be used in their Families, until the Act for laying duty thereon be repealed.

"VI. That they will not, after this day, kill any sheep under three years old.

"VII. That they will immediately prepare for manufacturing their own clothing.

"VIII. That they will immediately open a subscription for the relief of their suffering Brethren in Boston.

"After choosing John Stall, Samuel Hughes, Jonathan Hager, Conrad Hogmoire, Henry Szebelly, Richard Davis, John Swan, Charles Swearingen, Thomas Brooke, William McGlury, and Elzé Williams as a committee, they proceeded to show their disapproval of Lord North's Conduct with regard to America by Hunging and burning his effigy, after which a subscription was opened for the relief of the Poor of Boston. In consequence of the Fifth Resolve, a number of mercantile gentlemen solemnly declared they would send off all the Tea they had on hand, and that they would not purchase any more until the Act laying a duty thereon be repealed, among which number was a certain John Parks."

1 As indicating how the poor, out of their limited means, contributed to these subscriptions, we append an interesting memorandum:

"LINGANORE, FREDERICK COUNTY, April 3, 1775.

"As much for the satisfaction of the subscribers to this paper, as the contradicting malicious reports lately propagated in this county to the detriment of the character of the collector of this place, he has thought proper to give the public a state of his collections, with the receipt of the treasurer (appointed by the committee for said county) for the money, as may appear below.

A copy of the subscription paper, with the subscribers' names affixed to it, as followeth: 'We, the subscribers, inhabitants of Frederick County, have paid to David Moore the sums of money affixed to our names, in consequence of an unanimous resolve of the committee for the middle part of said county, to make up, by the first Monday of next January, the sum of one hundred dollars currency, to be sent immediately to Boston, there
The following correspondence, which occurred a few months later, shows how generously these promises of assistance were redeemed:

"FREDERICK TOWN, FREDERICK CO., MD., 17th February, 1775.

"To the Hon. Thomas Cushing, Esq.:
Sir,—We, the Committee for the middle part of Frederick County, Maryland, have this day forwarded £200 currency to Messrs. William Lux and Samuel Purviance, of Baltimore, who are directed to forward the same to you for the relief of the poor of your place, either specie or bills, as may appear to them most advisable. A line from you acknowledging the receipt of the money will oblige the Committee, as it will serve to convince the people from whom it was collected that it had been applied to its proper use.

"Signed for order and in behalf of the Committee.
J. HANSON, President."

"BOSTON, Nov. 15, 1775.

"To Mr. John Hanson, in Frederick Town, Md.:
Sir,—I am to acknowledge your letter of the 17th of February last, directed to Mr. Cushing, who is a member of the committee appointed by the Town to receive and distribute the donations from our friends to the sufferers by Act of Parliament, commonly called the Boston Port Bill, and to acquaint you that agreeable to your directions Mr. Samuel Purviance, Jr., has remitted in a bill of exchange the sum of two hundred pounds, your currency, being a contribution from the gentle- men of the Middle Division of Frederick County, in Maryland, for that charitable purpose. You will be pleased to return the hearty thanks of our committee to these gentlemen for their generous donations, and to assure them that it will be applied to its proper use.

"It will doubtless afford them satisfaction to be informed that their brethren in this place endure the sufferings inflicted upon them by that unrighteous and barbarous edict with patience and fortitude, and that they continue to bear oppression to be divided among the families whose means of sustenance have been so long and cruelly cut off by an Act of British Parliament. We consider the people of Boston as standing in the gap, where tyranny and oppression are ready to enter, to the destruction of the liberties of all America, and that therefore it is the duty of every individual in America to contribute as largely as his circumstances will admit to their support.

On the 22d of June, 1774, deputies from all the counties assembled in-general convention at Annapolis and adopted non-importation resolutions of the strongest character. The convention adjourned on the 25th, but it was not long before a serious infringement of the non-importation agreement occupied public attention. In August the brigantine "Mary and Jane," Capt. George Chapman, arrived in St. Mary's River from London with eleven chests of tea, consigned to Robert Findlay, a merchant of Bladenburg, Robert Peter, of Georgetown, and several other merchants at Norfolk, Va. In consequence of this "alarming" intelligence the Committee of Correspondence of Frederick County held a meeting on the 11th of August, and requested those gentlemen to appear before them. After hearing their statements the committee unanimously resolved "that the importation of any commodity from Great Britain liable to the payment of a duty imposed by an Act of Parliament is in a high degree dangerous to our liberties, as it implies a full assent to the claim asserted by the British Parliament of a right to impose taxes for the purpose of raising a revenue in America." And in order "to discourage the pernicious practice" the committee determined that the "detestable plant" should not be landed in America, but that it "should be sent back in the same ship."

On the 5th of September, 1774, the Continental Congress, which was first proposed by Maryland, and to which she elected the first set of delegates, assembled at Carpenters' Hall, Philadelphia, and adopted a plan "for carrying into effect the non-importation, non-consumption, and non-exportation" association.

At a meeting of the inhabitants of Frederick County "qualified to vote for representatives," held at the court-house, on Friday, the 18th of November, the following resolutions were adopted:

1 The women of Western Maryland were by no means behind the men in patriotic support of all the measures looking to the protection of American rights and liberties. Madeline Sheffey, a woman of fine mind and strong character, and the mother of the celebrated Daniel Sheffey, of Stanton, Va., speaking for the women of Frederick County, said, "We have resolved to drink no more tea for years to come,—not until the war is ended: but we will eat mush and milk, drink water, and live frugally until our fathers, sons, husbands, and brothers achieve a brave victory."
HISTORY OF WESTERN MARYLAND.

"Resolved, That Charles Beatty, Henry Griffith, Thos. Sprigg Wooton, Jacob Funk, Evan Thomas, Richard Brooke, Upton Sheredine, Baker Johnson, Thomas Price, Joseph Chapline, and James Smith attend the provincial meeting on the 21st inst. according to appointment, and that any five have power to act and represent this county."

This convention, after an adjournment from the 21st of November to the 5th of December, adopted resolutions encouraging the colonies to rely upon the products of their own fields and their own industry, and recommending such of the inhabitants of this province as are from sixteen to fifty years of age to form themselves into companies of sixty-eight men; to choose a captain, two lieutenants, an ensign, four sergeants, four corporals, and one drummer for each company, and to use their utmost endeavors to make themselves masters of the military exercise. That each man be provided with a good firelock and bayonet fixed thereon, half a pound of powder, two pounds of lead, and a cartouch-box or powder-horn, and a bag for ball, and be in readiness to act in any emergency."

It was further recommended that £1333 should be raised in Frederick by subscription to be expended by the committee of the county in the purchase of arms and ammunition.

At a meeting of the inhabitants of Frederick County, held at the court-house, on Tuesday, the 24th of January, 1775, John Hanson, chairman, Archibald Boyd, clerk, the association and resolves of the American Congress and the proceedings of the last Provincial Convention were read and unanimously approved. It was also

On the 15th of June, 1775, Col. George Washington, one of the Virginia delegates in Congress, was nominated by his friend and associate, Thomas John-

1 As arms became necessary, a gun-look factory was ordered by the convention in December, 1775, to be erected in Frederick, and the land was purchased. (Land Record B. D. No. 2, folio 171.) The site of the factory is now occupied by the coal-yard of Mr. Groshon, Messrs. Tyson & Son's warehouse, and J. E. Gifford's marble-works. By the act of 1778, ch. 4, it was ordered to be sold.
son, of Frederick, to be commander-in-chief of the Continental forces, and he was unanimously chosen. Having accepted his commission from the "United Colonies," Washington left Philadelphia on the 21st of June to take command of the army.

On the 17th of June the battle of Bunker Hill was fought, and from this hour the colonists were fully roused. In Maryland all was vigilance and activity. The manufacture of gunpowder, arms, and ammunition of every kind was encouraged. The two companies, assigned as the quota of the province under the resolution of Congress, were raised with the utmost spirit and dispatch in Frederick County, which then embraced, besides its present territory, all of Washington, Montgomery, Allegany, Garrett, and part of Carroll Counties. At a meeting of the Committee of Observation of Frederick, held in the court-house in Frederick Town on the 21st of June, a letter was read by John Hanson, chairman, from the delegates of Maryland in Congress, accompanied by the resolution passed on the 14th. The latter represented that two companies of expert riflemen were required of the county to join the army at Boston, "to be there employed as light infantry." The committee thereupon

"Resolved, That agreeable to the resolution of the Congress, and on the terms by them proposed, two companies of expert riflemen be forthwith raised and officered by the following gentlemen: Of the first company—Michael Cresap, captain; Thomas Warren, Joseph Cresap, Jr., Richard Davis, Jr., lieutenants. Of the second company—Thomas Price, captain; Otho Holland Williams, John Ross Key, lieutenants; another lieutenant to be chosen by Capt. Price and approved by the committee."

By the terms of enlistment the captains were to receive $20 per month; the lieutenants, $13; the sergeants, $8; the corporals, $7 1/2; the drummers, $7 1/2; and the privates, $6 3/4; "that they find their own arms and clothes; that each company consist of a captain, three lieutenants, four sergeants, four corporals, a drummer, and sixty-eight privates; that the form of enlistment be as follows:"

"I, A. B., have this — day of — voluntarily enlisted myself as a soldier in the American Continental Army for one year, unless sooner discharged. I do bind myself to conform in all instances to such rules and regulations as are or shall hereafter be established for the government of the said Army."

The character and appearance of the riflemen, and their skill as marksmen, excited the curiosity of a gentleman in Frederick, who, in a letter to a friend in Philadelphia, dated Aug. 1, 1775, thus describes them before they left Frederick:

"Notwithstanding the urgency of my business, I have been detained in this place by an occurrence truly agreeable. I have had the happiness of seeing Capt. Michael Cresap march-im at the head of a formidable company of upwards of 130 men from the mountains and backwoods, painted like Indians, armed with tomahawks and rifles, and dressed in hunting shirts and mocassins; and though some of them had traveled near eight hundred miles from the banks of the Ohio, they seemed to walk light and easy, and not with less spirit than at the first hour of their march. Health and vigor, after what they had undergone, declared them to be intimate with hardships and familiar with danger. Joy and satisfaction were visible in the crowd that met them. Had Lord North been present, and could have been assured that the brave leader could raise thousands of each to defend his country, what think you?—would the hatchet and block have intruded upon his mind? I had an opportunity of attending the captain during his stay in town, and watched the behavior of his men and the manner in which he treated them; for it seems that all who go out to war under him do not only pay the most willing obedience to him as their commander, but in every instance of distress look upon him as their friend or father. A great part of his time was spent in listening to and relieving their wants without any apparent sense of fatigue and trouble. When complaints were before him he determined them with kindness and spirit, and on every occasion concurred to please without losing his dignity.

"Yesterday the company were supplied with a small quantity of powder from the magazine, which wanted airing, and was not good for rifles. In the evening, however, they were drawn out to show the gentlemen of the town their dexterity at shooting. A chairboard, with a mark the size of a dollar, was put up: they began to fire off-hand, and the bystanders were surprised, so few shots being made that were not close to or in the paper.

"When they had shot for a time in this way, some lay on their backs, some on their breast or side, others ran twenty or thirty steps, and, firing, appeared to be equally certain of the mark. With this performance the company were more than satisfied, when a young man took up the board in his hand, not by the end, but by the side, and holding it up, his brother walked to the distance, and very coolly shot into the white; laying down his rifle, he took up the board, and, holding it as it was held before, the second brother shot as the former had done.

"By this exercise I was more astonished than pleased. But will you believe me, when I tell you, that one of the men took the board, and placing it between his legs, stood with his back to the tree, while another drove the centre? What would a regular army of considerable strength, in the forests of America, do with one thousand of these men, who want nothing to preserve their health and courage but water from the spring, with a little parched corn, with what they can easily procure in hunting, and who, wrapped in their blankets, in the damp of night, would choose the shade of a tree for their covering and the earth for their bed?"

At the time Cresap was appointed to command the Western Maryland Rifles, he was returning to his home at Old Town, now Washington County, from his settlement on the Ohio. He was met, it is said, near Cumberland, by a faithful friend with the message that he was chosen to command one of the two rifle companies.

"When I communicated my business," says the messenger, "and announced his appointment, instead of becoming elated, he became pensive and solemn, as if his spirits were really depressed, or as if he had a presentiment that this was his death-warrant. He said he was in bad health and his affairs in a dangerous state, but that, nevertheless, as the committee had selected him, and as he understood from me his father had pledged himself that he should accept of this appointment, he would go, let the consequences be what they might. He then directed me to proceed to the west side of the mountains, and publish to his old companions in arms this his intention. This I did, and in a very short time collected and brought to him, at his residence in Old Town, about twenty-two as fine fellows as ever handled a rifle, and most, if not all, of them completely equipped."

The riflemen set out from Frederick Town on the 18th of July, 1775, on their march to Cambridge, Mass., and after traveling five hundred and fifty miles over the rough and difficult roads of that period, they arrived on the 9th of August at their destination, thus making the journey in twenty-two days without the loss of a man.1

Cresap's company was the first from the South to reach Cambridge, and although in bad health, he marched on the 13th of August with Capt. Daniel Morgan's company of Virginia riflemen to Roxbury, the south side of Boston, where they joined the American army under the command of Gen. Washington. Mr. Thatcher in his military journal of August, 1775, in noticing their arrival, says,—

"They are remarkably stout and hardy men, many of them exceeding six feet in height. They are dressed in white frocks, or rifle shirts, and round hats. These men are remarkable for the accuracy of their aim, striking a mark with great certainty at two hundred yards' distance. At a review, a company of them, while on a quick advance, fired their balls into objects of seven inches diameter at the distance of two hundred and fifty yards. They are now stationed on our lines, and their shot have frequently proved fatal to British officers and soldiers.

1 Extract from a letter from a gentleman in Frederick Town to his friend in Baltimore Town, dated July 19, 1775:
"On Monday last, July 17th, Capt. Morgan, from Virginia, with his company of riflemen (all chosen), marched through this place on their way to Boston. Their appearance was truly martial, their spirits amazingly elated, breathing nothing but a desire to join the American army and to engage the enemies of American liberties. They were met a mile out of town by three companies, viz.: Capt. Price's company of riflemen, Capt.
Grosh's and Capt. Beatty's companies of militia, and escorted a few miles out of town, amidst the acclamation of all the inhabitants who attended them. And yesterday Capt. Price with his company also marched, and surely never were two finer companies raised in any country more determined to conquer or die than these two companies are. Capt. Cresap also with his brave company have marched. I need not say anything of Capt. Cresap's undaunted courage. Not an American but knows him to be an intrepid warrior, and of course he knows his men, and has called them from the many. We are also in houri expectation of Capt. Stinson with his company in this town, on his way to Boston. God grant him a speedy and happy arrival there. So many offered to join the above companies, that not one of them but might have had one hundred men at least."

McCurrie's journal gives some interesting particular s of the earlier experiences of these representatives of Western Maryland in the theatre of war. On the 15th (of August), he says, "we had a most amazing shout of cannon thunders, which at this time seemed strange and shocking to our young soldiers, during this our first alarm." Three days later he relates that as "he was at breakfast in the former dwelling-house of Dr. Williams they (the British) fired four thirty-two-pounders at the house, one of which rushed through the room and dashed one side out of the chimney, broke two partitions, and filled our dishes with plastering, ceiling, and bricks. George Switcher, Serg. Torrel, and William Johnson were in the room when this happened. Any man may judge whether or no this did not surprise us four young heroes; however, as I cannot say for the minds of them who were in company with me, but I know, to the best of my thinking, that I went down two pair of stairs of three strides without a fall, and as soon as I was out of doors ran to the breastwork in great haste, which is our place of safety, without the least concern about my breakfast, to James McCancie's amazement." 2

In 1776 these companies were incorporated in a rifle regiment, of which Stephenson, of Virginia, was appointed colonel, MosesRawlings, of Old Town, Frederick (now Washington) County, lieutenant-colonel, and Otho Holland Williams, of Frederick (now Williamsport, Washington County), major.
Upon Stephenson's death the command devolved upon Rawlings, and the regiment formed part of the garrison of Fort Washington, in the State of New York, at the time it was attacked by Sir William Howe. In this attack the rifle regiment behaved with splendid courage, but were made prisoners of war with the rest of the command on the capture of the fort.

2 Capt. Cresap, as we have before stated, after about three months' efficient service in the neighborhood of Boston, was forced by continued illness to obtain leave to return home; but, finding himself too sick to proceed, stopped in New York, where he died of fever on the 15th of October, 1775, at the early age of thirty-three. On the following day his remains, attended by a large concours of people, were buried with military honors in Trinity Churchyard. Mr. Brantz Mayer says that on a visit to the churchyard of Trinity on the 2d of June, 1869, he discovered the long-neglected grave and gravestone of the pioneer immediately opposite the door of the north transept of the church.
It was of sandstone, and when last seen, in 1865, was broken off near the ground and propped up.

3 On the 30th of August William Norris, a member of one of the rifle companies, died "with a long sickness, and was buried in as genteel a manner as we could get it done."
In the mean time the citizens of Frederick were not idle. At a meeting of the freeholders and others of the freemen of the middle district of Frederick County at the court-house in Frederick Town, the 12th of September, 1775, agreeable to the resolve of the last Provincial Convention, the following gentlemen were chosen a Committee of Observation of said district, viz.: George Stricker, Charles Beatty, Christopher Edelin, Upton Sherедин, Baker Johnson, William Blair, Dr. Adam Fisher, Conrad Gresh, John Hanson, George Murdock, John Adlin, Michael Raymer, Dr. Philip Thomas, William Luckett, John Haas, Joseph Wood, Jr., John Stoner, and made choice of Messrs. The following persons were also appointed to serve as a committee for licensing suits in Frederick County: James Smith, Samuel Hughes, Conrad Hogmire, Col. Beall, John Rench, John Sellars, and Charles Swearingen. Capt. Jonathan Hager was appointed to receive all sums of money that might be voluntarily given for the public good. It was also

"Resolved, That each member of this committee shall pay 5s. fine for each day's non-attendance without a lawful excuse; Col. Cresap excepted.

"Resolved, That each member pay his club of the expenses attending this committee, present or absent."

The committee then adjourned to the first Monday in October, 1775.

From the proceedings of the Committee of Observation for Elizabethtown (now Hagerstown) district we make the following interesting extracts, which show that the hearts of the colonists of this section of the province were full of sympathy for the patriotic cause, and that their hands were full of aid:

"It appears to this committee (from the representation of some of the members who have endeavored to get their neighbors to enroll in companies of militia) that the greatest number refuse in consequence of several religious sects being excepted by the resolves of the convention.

"Resolved, That this committee is of opinion that it is highly reasonable that every person who enjoys the benefit of their religion and protection of the laws of this free country ought to contribute, either in money or military service, towards the defence of these invaluable rights."
Resolved, That two shillings and sixpence, currency, per week (for all those who are constrained by religious principles from.contributing their proportion in military service) would be equal to mustering, agreeable to the directions of the convention.

Ordered, That a letter should be written to the committee of correspondence in the middle district that it is the opinion of this district that the battalion of minute-men for this county would receive great advantage by being kept together and instructed, and that this committee are desirous such a plan should be adopted, and that a meeting of the three districts of this county would be advisable; and, in case such meeting should be appointed, Messrs. James Smith and Samuel Hughes are appointed to attend at said meeting, with full power to act for this committee in the aforesaid business.

Ordered, That all those who have enrolled with Mr. Brook and Mr. Dement, do join and form one company, and immediately proceed to the choice of officers.

On motion of Mr. Thomas Frinck, Sr., of the Upper District of Frederick County, that he hath been often jostled by the residents of the upper part of Frederick County by refusing to pay their public dues, it is the opinion and advice of this committee that they ought to pay their levies and all their public dues for the support of the civil government.

A motion being made by a member of the committee that as sundry companies of the militia that are not yet made up and ordered according to the directions of the provincial convention, and as the numbers of the said companies appointed to be raised do not amount to make up two battalions, it is

Resolved by the committee, in order to satisfy the populace, that an election be held for the Hagerstown battalion on the 22d day of October, 1775, and for the lower battalion on the 30th day of October; and that the said lower battalion shall transmit a full and clear copy of their election to the committee of correspondence for the said district, in order that they may transmit the same to the Council of Safety of this province that they may take order thereon.

Whereas it hath been represented to this committee by Mr. John Swan that his character has been much aspersed by a certain John Shryock, as having said that he suspected the said Mr. Swan of having been an enemy to America, the said John Shryock being called to this committee, and making nothing appear against him, the said John Swan is honorably acquitted by this committee of said charge.

Was brought before this committee B.— and P.—, for speaking unbecoming word against the association, acknowledged the fault, and signed.

The committee adjourns to the 8th of April, nine o'clock.

In Council of Safety, Annapolis, March 23, 1776.

Gentlemen,—The great difficulty we find in providing blankets for the regular forces raised for the defence of this province obliges us to apply to the committee of observation for the several counties and districts, earnestly requesting that they would use their endeavors to procure from the housekeepers in their respective counties and districts all the blankets or rugs that they can with any convenience spare, for which the council will pay such prices as the committees shall agree on, as well as any expense that may arise in collecting them together; and when you have procured any quantity, you will send them to Annapolis, to Col. Smallwood, or, in his absence, to the commanding officer on this station, who will receive the same, and give orders on the council for the payment thereof.

We hope that the friends to our cause in the county will contribute everything in their power to the comfortable subsistence of the soldiery in this respect; it will be an act of great humanity, and render an essential service to the public.

We are, Gentlemen, your most O4' servants. By order:

Daniel, of St. Thos. Jennifer, P.

In consequence of the preceding letter from the honorable the council of safety of this province, we have, agreeably to their request, furnished them with what quantity of blankets and rugs the inhabitants of this district can with any convenience spare, and a price estimated on them by this committee as follows:

1 Great difficulty was experienced at the beginning of the war in obtaining supplies; the arsenal at Annapolis was almost empty. To overcome these difficulties the convention gave encouragement and gratuities for the manufacture of sulphur, materials for clothing, and munitions of war. Powder-mills were erected, and Col. Hughes, of Washington County, agreed to furnish cannon for the province, and established a foundry on the Patuxame River, one mile above Georgetown, where the While her sons were rendering gallant service to the cause of American liberty in a distant section of the country, Frederick itself was threatened with a formidable danger. As early as July, 1775, John Hanson, Jr., wrote to Peyton Randolph, of Virginia, the first president of the "Continental Congress": "There is too much reason to believe that an expedition will be set on foot by the British and Indians in Canada against the western frontiers of this State (Maryland), Virginia, and Pennsylvania. Agents and allies of the king and parliament, of Gen. Gage and Lord Dunmore, it is believed in this place, are now operating with the Delaware and Shawnee Indians in Ohio, and bands in Kentucky and Canada, with a view to destroy our frontier towns and desolate our homes and firesides. We are determined to keep a vigilant eye on all such agents and emissaries, but it would be highly prudent to take early measures to supply the arsenal and barracks at Fredericktown with arms and ammunition, to enable the male population to defend all the inhabitants, in case the emergency should arise in which it will become our solemn duty to act." These fears were not without foundation. Governor Dunmore, of Virginia, who had been making ineffectual efforts to maintain the royal authority in that colony, being at length forced to fly from Williamsburg, sought refuge on board an English man-of-war, and inaugurated a predatory warfare upon the coast, extending his operations to Maryland. Instigated by a ferocious spirit of revenge he reduced the town of Norfolk to ashes, and with the double design of cutting off communication between the Northern and Southern colonies, and of compelling a division of the Continental army under Washington, employed Dr. John Connolly, a native of Lancaster, Pa., to incite the Indians to a war upon the frontier and to raise an army at Detroit, which was to seize Pittsburgh, and from this base invade the back settlements of Virginia and Maryland. After establishing a strong post at Cumberland it was proposed to seize Alexandria, where Governor Dunmore was to meet them with a fleet and a body of runaway slaves from the lower part of the Potomac. Alexandria was to be strongly fortified, and communication cut off between the Northern and Southern colonies.

first cannon were made in this country. A portion of the old stone building still remains, while broken fragments of cannon are at this time to be found in the stream of water that flows at the base of the building. Daniel and James Hughes, of the Antietam Iron-Works, in Washington County, and John Yoast, of Georgetown, also made cannon for the Revolution. Shells and cannon were also manufactured at Catottin Farmace, in Frederick County, by James and Thomas Johnson during the Revolution, and some were used at the siege of Yorktown.

Connolly was born and bred near Wright's Ferry, Pa., and according to Ormsby, led a roving life in the Illinois country "till he could subsist there no longer." He appeared at Pittsburgh a few years before the commencement of the Revolution, where he was introduced to Lord Dunmore, "who traveled through the western country to sound the inclinations of the inhabitants as well as the Indians. Connolly, like a hungry wolf, closed with Dunmore a bargain that he would secure a considerable interest among the white inhabitants and the Indians on the frontier. In consequence of this agreement my lord made him a deed of gift of two thousand acres of land at the Falls of Ohio." Connolly showed himself a serviceable agent in the border troubles between Virginia and Pennsylvania, and when the struggle with the mother-country began, willingly lent himself to the designs of Lord Dunmore. On the 25th of July, 1775, Connolly, who had been stationed at Fort Pitt, joined Lord Dunmore on board the "Fowey" man-of-war, where the plan of attack already described was formed. Lord Dunmore feeling that it was necessary to secure the indenture and authority of Gen. Gage, sent him to Boston, where Connolly presented the following proposals to the British commander:

"Proposals for raising an Army to the Westward, and for effectually obstructing a Communication between the Southern and Northern Governments.

As I have, by direction from his Excellency Lord Dunmore, prepared the Ohio Indians to act in concert with me against his Majesty's enemies in that quarter, and have also dispatched intelligence to the different officers of the militia on the frontiers of Augusta County, in Virginia, giving them Lord Dunmore's assurances that such of them as shall hereafter evince their loyalty to his Majesty by putting themselves under my command, when I shall appear among them with proper authority for that purpose, of a confirmation of titles to their lands, and the quantity of three hundred acres to all who should take up arms in the support of the constitution, when the present rebellion subsided, I will undertake to penetrate through Virginia, and join his Excellency Lord Dunmore at Alexandria early next spring, on the following conditions and authority:

1st. That your Excellency will give me a commission to act as Major-commandant of such troops as I may raise and embody on the frontiers, with a power to command to the westward and employ such serviceable French and English partisans as I can employ by pecuniary rewards or otherwise.

2d. That your Excellency will give orders to Captain Lord on the Illinois to remove himself, with the garrison under his command, from Fort Gage to Detroit, by the Aubanche, bringing with him all the artillery, stores, &c., &c., to facilitate which undertaking he is to have authority to hire boats, horses, Frenchmen, Indians, &c., &c., to proceed with all possible expedition on that route, as the weather may occasionally permit, and to put himself under my command on his arrival at Detroit.

3d. That the comissary at Detroit shall be empowered to furnish such provision as I may judge necessary for the good of the service, and that the commanding officer shall be in-structed to give every possible assistance in encouraging the French and Indians of that settlement to join me.

"4th. That an officer of artillery be immediately sent with me to pursue such route as I may find most expedient to gain Detroit, with orders to have such pieces of light ordnance as may be thought requisite for the demolishing of Fort Dunmore and Fort Finisal, if resistance should be made by the rebels in possession of those garrisons.

"5th. That your Excellency will empower me to make such reasonable presents to the Indian chiefs and others as may urge them to set with vigor in the execution of my orders.

"6th. That your Excellency will send to Lord Dunmore such arms as may be spared, in order to equip such persons as may be willing to serve his Majesty at our junction, in the vicinity of Alexandria, &c., &c. If your Excellency judget expedient for the good of the service to furnish me with the authority and other requisites I have mentioned, I shall embrace the earliest opportunity of setting off for Canada, and shall imme-diately dispatch Lord Dunmore's armed schooner, which now awaits my commands, with an account of what your Excellency has done, and that I shall be ready, if practicable, to join your Lordship by the twentieth of April at Alexandria, where the troops under my command may fortify themselves under the cover of the men of war on that station.

"If, on the contrary, your Excellency should not approve of what I propose, you will be good enough to immediately honor me with your dispatches to the Earl of Dunmore, that I may return as early as possible."

Gen. Gage approved the design, and on the 14th or 15th of September, Connolly left Boston, and in October again joined Dunmore, who, in accordance with the instructions of Gen. Gage, on the 5th of November granted him a commission as lieutenant-colonel commandant of the Queen's Royal Rangers, to be raised "in the back parts and Canada." About the 13th of November he left Lord Dunmore on his way to Detroit, where he expected to meet his commis-sion and instructions. He was accompanied by Allan Cameron and Dr. John Smith. The former, a native of Scotland, had left his country on account of an affair of honor, and had come to Virginia with the intention of purchasing lands in that colony; but finding it difficult to pass through the back country, encouraged by Lord Dunmore and the promise of ad-\n\nancement, he agreed to accept a commission as first lieutenant in the regiment to be raised by Connolly. Dr. Smith, also a native of Scotland, had left Charles County, Md., for political reasons, intending to go to the Mississippi, but finding it impracticable he returned to Norfolk, where he was induced by Lord Dunmore by promises of preferment to accept the appointment of surgeon under Connolly.

The party, consisting of Connolly, Cameron, Smith, and a servant, departed from Norfolk on a flat-bot-tomed schooner, intending to proceed in this vessel up the Chesapeake into Potomac River, and land if possible near to Dr. Smith's house (about two miles below Cedar Point), on Port Tobacco Creek, and to pass through the country on horseback until they reached Detroit.

Fortunately, the people of Frederick County were on the alert, and to their vigilance was due the dis-covery and frustration of this well-conceived plot. Patrols and minute-men were constantly scouring the country, ready to apprise the inhabitants of the first signs of danger, and Connolly and his companions happening to fall in with one of these parties near Hagerstown, and not being able to give a satisfactory account of themselves, were arrested on suspicion and taken to Frederick. Connolly had concealed his papers in the mail pillion-sticks, which were hollow, encased in tin plates covered with canvas.

"When we arrived at Frederick," says Smith, "we were stripped and searched again, and examined separately before the committee, where one of the most illiberal, invertebrate, and violent Rebels, named Samuel Chase (son of a respectable and very worthy eleyman of this Province), a lawyer and member of the Congress, presided. At this place we were not a little abashed lest they should discover our instructions, papers, &c., as they examined everything so strictly as to take our saddles to pieces, and take out the stuffing, and even rip open the soles of our boots, in vain, for the object of their search was not found, although they so frequently handled what contained it. However, by some neglect of Col. Connolly's servant, an old torn piece of paper was found in his portmanteau, which dis-covered some part of our design; and then Col. Connolly, to prevent our falling immediate sacrifice to a frantic mob, acknowledged our commissions. The servant, however, who was faithful to his trust, being allowed to go at large from the first of our confinement, took care to destroy the mail pillion-sticks containing the papers, commissions, and instructions, which we dreaded so much being discovered, as soon as he could effect it with safety, which put an end to our anxiety and alarms on that account."

On the following day John Hanson, Jr., chairman of the Committee of Observation, transmitted to the president of Congress copies of the examinations of the prisoners, a letter to John Gibson, an early resi-dent of the region, a speech of Lord Dunmore to White-Eyes, an Indian chief, and Connolly's pro-posals to Gen. Gage.

In the latter part of December, Connolly was sent to Philadelphia under guard of Dr. Adam Fisher and ten privates. Smith made his escape just before this, but was recaptured in January, 1776, at Little Meadow, with a number of letters from Connolly to British officers and others, which he had written while in con-fineinent at Frederick. Connolly was kept imprisoned for more than a year in Philadelphia, and was afterwards removed to Baltimore. He was subsequently released on parole, but remained a prisoner until near the close of the war.

Among the companies raised in Frederick County in 1775 were those of Capt. William Blair, William Shields, Jacob Ambrose, and Benjamin Ogle. The "game-cock" company of Capt. Blair, which went first to the front, was officered as follows:

William Blair, captain; Jacob Hockersmith, ensign; George Hockersmith, first lieutenant; Henry Williams, second lieutenant; William Curran, Jr., George Kelly, John Smith, Christian Crabbs, sergeants; John Crabbs, George Matthews, Arthur Row, James Park, corporals; Daniel McLean, drummer; and fifty-four privates.

The Second Company, raised in 1775, William Shields, captain; John Faires, first lieutenant; Michael Hockersmith, second lieutenant; John Shields, ensign; Charles Robinson, James Shields, Sr., Patrick Haney, Robert Brown, sergeants; Moses Kennedy, John Hawk, John Long, Thomas Baird, corporals; and fifty-two privates.

The Third Company, raised in 1775, Jacob Ambrose, captain; Peter Shover, first lieutenant; Henry Brotell, second lieutenant; John Weller, ensign; Martin Bartz, Frederick Schultz, John Gump, Casper Young, sergeants; John Protzman, George Kahn, Dominick Bradley, Lawrence Creager, corporals; John Shaw, drummer; Philip Weller, fifer; and fifty privates.

The Fourth Company, raised in 1775, Benjamin Ogle, captain; Henry Matthews, first lieutenant; George Nedd, second lieutenant; James Ogle, ensign; John Spry,ers, Lawrence Protzman, Peter Leonard, Conrad Matthews, sergeants; Jacob Valentine, Adam Knauff, Daniel Protzman, William Elter, son of Guy, corporals; John Roche, drummer; Daniel Linebaugh, fifer; and fifty-two privates.

These companies formed portions of the battalions which were raised in Frederick County, and they were conspicuous during the war for their ardent devotion and steady valor.1

On the 7th of December, 1775, the Maryland Convention assembled, and immediately set about the formation of a military force for the protection of the province. After appointing Messrs. Charles Beatty, James Johnson, and John Hanson, Jr., a committee to establish a gun-lock manufactory at Frederick, they resolved on the 1st of January, 1776, that fourteen hundred and forty-four men should be raised for the defense of the province, that eight companies of the troops, of sixty-eight privates each, should be formed into a battalion, and that the remainder should be divided into companies of one hundred each. Will-

1 On the 8th of December, 1775, the Convention, by resolution, appropriated two hundred pounds currency for building a strong log jail in Fredericktown, thirty feet long, twenty broad, to be lined with two-inch planks, two stories, with split logs and plank floors, the upper story to be divided into three rooms, with a stove in each. That a small house be built for a keeper and guard, and that the treasurer of the Western Shore pay to James Johnson and Thomas Beatty the said sum. The jail was built as directed on Second Street, a few perches east of the present Mechanics' Bank, and the logs were fastened by iron bolts made by Frank Manta, a Tory blacksmith, and was used as such during the continuance of the war, after which it was converted into a stable, a part of which remained standing in 1846.

2 In March, 1776, powder belonging to the province was stored in the market-house at Frederick. The first prisoners confined in Frederick arrived there from North Carolina in May, 1776.

3 As an illustration of the determined spirit which animated the representative men of Western Maryland at this period the following incident is worthy of preservation. Some time after the commencement of hostilities, but long before the Declaration of Independence, Mr. Eden, the last proprietary
GEN. WILLIAM SMALLWOOD.
On the 7th of June, 1776, Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia, submitted to Congress a resolution declaring "That the United Colonies are and ought to be free and independent States; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown; and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is and ought to be totally dissolved." On the 11th of June, Matthew Tilghman, Thomas Stone, and John Rogers wrote to the Council of Safety for instructions, and asking that the county committees call the people together to express their sentiments on the question of independence. In response the freemen of Frederick County, June 17th, unanimously resolved, "That what may be recommended by a majority of the Congress, equally delegated by the people of the United Colonies, we will, at the hazard of our lives and fortunes, support and maintain; and that every resolution of the Convention tending to separate this Province from a majority of the colonies, without the consent of the people, is destructive to our internal safety and big with public ruin." The freemen of the upper district of Frederick County "resolved unanimously" that they would "support the union of the colonies" with their "lives and fortunes."

The same spirit was manifested in all the counties, and urged forward by these expressions of the popular will, the Convention repealed its former resolutions and authorized the Maryland representatives in Congress to concur with the other United Colonies in such measures as should be "adjudged necessary for securing the liberties of America." These instruc-

Governor of Maryland, requested Barrister Carroll to invite Thomas Johnson, afterwards of Frederick, and Samuel Chase, to dine at the Government House. Mr. Chase and Mr. Johnson were among the most distinguished of the Whig leaders of the time, and the invitation occasioned some little embarrassment. The difficulty was finally solved by inviting the Governor, Messrs. Johnson and Chase, and other distinguished gentlemen to Mr. Carroll's. Shortly after the company sat down to dinner the Governor said, "It is understood in England that the Congress are about forming a treaty of alliance with France." A momentary silence prevailed, when Mr. Johnson answered, "Governor, we will answer your question, provided you will answer one for us." The Governor assenting to this proposition, Mr. Johnson said, "Well, sir, we will candidly acknowledge that overtures have been made to France, but that they are not yet accepted. Now, sir, we understand that the king, your master, is about subdividing a large body of Hessians to join his forces to come over to cut our throats." He answered that he believed the report was true; Mr. Johnson immediately rejoined in the following words, "The first Hessian soldier that puts his foot on the American shore will absolve me from all allegiance to Great Britain." Chase exclaimed, "By G—d, I am for declaring ourselves independent." The Governor immediately dropped his knife and fork, and did not eat another mouthful.

1 The parade-ground and place of rendezvous of the Frederick County troops was Gant's Common, near Frederick Town.

2 Many of the descendants of the brave soldiers composing the battalion are to be found in Frederick, Washington, and Carroll Counties. Jacob Sheets, who built Sheets' mill on Piney Creek, in Carroll County, was a private in Capt. Baltzell's company. His descendants reside in the Tom's Creek Valley, near Emmitsburg. Among the German families prominent in the Revolutionary annals of Western Maryland are the Hockersmiths, the Williamses, the Baltzells, the Crengers, the Steiners, and the Millers.
Germans, two in Baltimore County and two in Frederick.

In the battle of Harlem Heights, on the 16th of September following, Griffith's and Richardson's regiments, of Gen. Beale's brigade of the Maryland Flying Camp, with Maj. Price's three independent companies, greatly distinguished themselves. A letter from headquarters, dated September 17th, says, "Never did troops go to the field with more cheerfulness and alacrity, when there began a heavy fire on both sides. It continued about one hour, when our brave Southern troops dislodged them from their posts; the enemy rallied, and our men beat them the second time. They rallied again; our troops drove them the third time, and were rushing on them, but the enemy got on an eminence, and our troops were ordered to retreat, the general considering there might be a large number of the enemy behind the hill concealed, which was the case."

On the 19th of September, by a general order, the six independent companies under Maj. Price were attached to the battalion. By the army returns of September 21st, Gen. Beale's brigade of militia, consisting of Griffith's, Hall's, Richardson's, and Ewing's regiments, had a total roll and file of 2189 men, of which number only 1717 were present and fit for duty. At this time over half the Maryland troops were sick and unfit for service, but those who were able to take part in the campaign did not fail to render a good account of themselves in every engagement with the enemy. After the battle of White Plains, in which Beale's brigade displayed great nerve and steadiness, Col. Moses Rawlings' rifle regiment was sent to reinforce Fort Washington.

This regiment was composed of four companies of Virginians and four of Marylanders, and were at first commanded by Col. Stephenson, of Virginia, who was succeeded by Lieut.-Col. Rawlings. Two of the companies were those raised in Frederick by Cresap and Price at the beginning of hostilities, and were subsequently commanded by Capt. Philomen Griffith and Capt. Richard Davis. The other two companies were commanded by Capt. Thomas Beale and Capt. Smith, and were raised the former in Frederick, the latter in Harford County. Fort Washington was attacked on the 16th of November (1776) by a large force of the enemy, and captured after a struggle, in which the Frederick County riflemen displayed all the nerve and courage of veterans. About four hundred Marylanders were taken prisoners, among whom were Col. Rawlings, Maj. Otho H. Williams, and Lieut. Peter Contee Hanson, who died a prisoner in New York. Lawrence Everhart, of Frederick, and some of his men escaped in a boat after the surrender. The loss of the enemy was nearly nine hundred killed and wounded, more than half of which was sustained in the attack upon Rawlings' riflemen. Some authorities put the loss even higher. Gordon in his "History of the American Revolution," says, "it cost Knyphausen 'near upon eight hundred men' to force the 'single regiment of Rawlings' back.'"

In Green's "Life of Greene" the author says, "Had Rawlings been supported, Knyphausen could not have gained the north lines. But the men refused to man them, and crowded into the redoubt, where they became a compact mass for the enemy's guns. The defense on the east was still more irresolute, and there are questions connected with that on the south which will, it is probable, never be solved. But had it been like that of Rawlings' riflemen it would have well-nigh crippled the enemy." Gen. Washington, in a letter to his brother, John A. Washington, dated Nov. 19, 1776, in referring to the capture of Fort Washington, only mentions the services rendered by Rawlings' regiment. He remarks, "The enemy have suffered greatly on the north side of Fort Washington. Col. Rawlings' regiment (late Hugh Stephenson's) was posted there, and behaved with great spirit."

While the representatives of Western Maryland were thus winning distinction where the soldiers of some other sections only earned disgrace, many important events had occurred at home. The shadow of the proprietary government having vanished by the departure of Governor Eden, the Convention, in pursuance of instructions from the several counties, resolved upon the establishment of a permanent form of government. For this purpose a new Convention was to be elected, consisting of four representatives from each district of Frederick County, four from each of the other counties, and two each from Annapolis and Baltimore Town. In pursuance of these resolutions, elections were held throughout Maryland on the 1st of August, 1776, for delegates to a Convention, which assembled at Annapolis on the 14th of the same month, for the purpose of framing a State constitution and bill of rights. On the 6th of September the Convention divided Frederick County, and erected out of parts of it the new counties of Washington and Montgomery; the former named after the commander-in-chief of the army, and the latter after

1 The four companies of Germans raised were commanded respectively by Capts. Heiser, Graybill, Fister, and Keepers. Together with four companies raised in Pennsylvania they formed a regiment, and were offered by Col. Hansegger, of Pennsylvania, and Lieut.-Col. Geo. Streicker and Maj. Weltner, of Frederick County.

Gen. Richard Montgomery, who was killed in the attack on Quebec. The declaration of rights and the constitution having been formally adopted, the new government was organized on the 13th of February, 1777, by the election of Thomas Johnson, afterwards of Frederick County, as the first Governor of the State. In the mean time Congress, dismayed by the successive disasters which had overtaken the American arms, had adjourned to Baltimore, and a general feeling of despondency prevailed. Washington's troops were reduced to a mere handful, and it was uncertain whether he would be able to obtain reinforcements. Disappointed in his hopes from New Jersey, where the spirit of disaffection was prevalent, he could not tell what reliance could be placed on Pennsylvania and Maryland. In the latter State he was not disappointed, and so soon as intelligence was received of his retreat through the Jerseys every preparation was made to sustain him. Congress dispatched Col. Ewing, of the Maryland Flying Camp, on the 9th of December, to the Maryland Council of Safety with the news of the disasters that had overtaken the army, and immediately the militia of Cecil, Baltimore, Harford, and Frederick Counties were put in motion for the seat of war. On the 1st of December (1776), the term of enlistment of Gen. Beall's Maryland Brigade of the Flying Camp expired, and, owing to the unpopularity of their commander, Washington was compelled to discharge the greater portion in the face of the enemy. Some few remained as volunteers, and many re-enlisted after their return to the State. Maj. Gist's regiment, however, the seven independent companies, and the two artillery companies, with the Maryland part of the rifle and German regiments,—four companies in each,—making a total of 2280 men, all re-enlisted for three years on the Continental plan. On the 19th of January, 1777, Washington made another appeal for reinforcement, and on the 25th the militia of Frederick and other counties, under the command of Thomas Johnson, were ordered to join Gen. Washington at once in the Jerseys. The Legislature also immediately took steps to raise recruits, and barracks were ordered to be erected in Frederick and at other points for their accommodation while preparing for the army. In consequence of an apprehended attack, all the powder and military stores were removed in February from Annapolis to Frederick, and the prisoners confined at Baltimore were sent to the same point, and placed in charge of Lieut. William Beatty. 1

As the spring of 1777 opened the urgent necessity of reinforcing the army became apparent, and in accordance with Washington's request Maryland raised five full regiments of infantry, in addition to the two she already had in the field. These seven regiments, with the German battalion, part of which had been raised in Frederick County, were divided into two brigades; one, composed of three regiments and the German battalion, was placed under the command of Chevalier Deborre, and the other, formed of the four remaining regiments, was assigned to Gen. Smallwood. 2 These troops all participated in the campaign of 1777, and well sustained the reputation of the Maryland line.

Early in the following year, 1778, in accordance with the earnest request of Congress, the Legislature passed an act to raise 2902 men, including the two artillery companies already in camp and the volunteers already on hand within the State. To insure their speedy enlistment, the Legislature apportioned to each county the number of men required according to the number of militia in each. The proportion assigned to Frederick was 309, to Washington 120, and to Montgomery 156.

About this period hostilities broke out along the Western frontier with the Indians, Tories, refugees, and other border desperadoes. To suppress the outrages committed by them, Washington fitted out three expeditions,—the first from Fort Schuyler, under Col. Van Schaick, the second under Gen. Sullivan, and the third under Col. Brodhead, from Pittsburgh, up the Allegany,—against the Mingo, Muncey, and Seneca tribes. The force under Brodhead consisted of the militia of Washington and Montgomery Counties, in Maryland, under the command of Col. Beatty, and the militia of Virginia and Pennsylvania. To supply this force with provisions Maryland pressed into service fifty waggons, and on the 5th of August

Washington. He was succeeded by Col. Rawlings, and in August the prisoners were removed to Sharpsburg and placed in charge of Lieut. Charles Hughes.

1 In August, Lieut. Beatty was promoted to a captaincy in the First Maryland Regiment, and joined the army under 10

2 Late in December, 1777, the commander of Frederick, Col. Beatty, received one hundred prisoners, whom he was compelled to confine in jail until Fort Frederick was fitted up for their reception. Late in the afternoon of Christmas-day they set fire to the jail, and upon the alarm being given the colonel ordered every man to arm himself as quick as possible, and upon reaching the jail-yard the gate was opened by the jailer, and about one-third of the prisoners attempted to make their escape, which compelled the small party of militia to charge them and knock them down with their arms, which had the effect of driving them back. They were finally removed to the Tory House and the fire put out, with little damage. A few days after this they threatened to break out, but were told that they would be sacrificed, which put an end to the disturbance.
Early in December, 1778, Washington distributed his troops in winter-quarters in a line of cantonments from Long Island Sound to the Delaware. The Marylanders, under Lord Stirling, were near Middlebrook, in the Jerseys, and Frederick and Hagerstown were occupied by Baylor's regiment of cavalry. In May, 1779, Col. Moses Rawlings was ordered to march to Fort Pitt and in consequence of the refusal of Gen. Washington to place the German regiment under his command he resigned, and Capt. Beale was placed in command at Frederick. The German battalion and Rawlings' rifle regiment during the same year were merged into one regiment, known as the Eighth Maryland. The Frederick troops were actively engaged in the campaign of 1779, and were transferred with the rest of the Maryland line in 1780 to the South, where they once more illustrated the quality of Maryland courage.

After the defeat of Gen. Gates and the advance of Lord Cornwallis into the interior of North Carolina, on the 16th of October, 1780, Gen. Leslie sailed from New York with about three thousand troops, with orders to penetrate into Virginia and await the orders of Lord Cornwallis. Leslie entered the Chesapeake, and took possession of Norfolk and Portsmouth. His expedition formed part of a design to invade the Western frontier and to release a large number of British prisoners who were confined at this time in Winchester, Strasburg, Leesburg, Sharpsburg, Fort Frederick, and Frederick. Gen. Johnston, with a large force of the enemy, was to operate in the neighborhood of Pittsburgh, while Col. Connolly, who had been exchanged for Lieut.-Col. Nathaniel Ramsey, with the aid of Gen. Leslie and the Tories and refugees on the frontiers and the Eastern Shore, was to co-operate with him. And to procure the aid and assistance of the loyalists in the campaign of 1781, in pursuance of instructions from the king, Sir Henry Clinton in February issued a commission to William Franklin, Governor of New Jersey, Josiah Martin, Governor of North Carolina, Timothy Ruggles, Daniel Coxe, George Duncan Ludlow, Edward Latyche, George Romer, George Leonard, Anthony Stewart, and Robert Alexander, constituting them a board of directors for the control and management of the “Associated Loyalists of America.” The board of directors of this association were authorized to employ “such of his majesty's faithful subjects in North America as may be willing to associate under their direction, for the purpose of annoying the seacoasts of the revolted provinces and distressing their trade, either in co-operation with his majesty's land and sea forces, or by making diversions in their favor when they are carrying on operations in other parts.”

Large numbers of the Tories were enrolled on the frontier, on the Eastern Shore, and in the neighboring States to execute the royal commission of robbing and murdering the inhabitants, when the conspiracy was providentially discovered at Frederick. It is stated that a disguised British officer was to meet a messenger of the enemy at a designated place, to put him in possession of all the plans relating to the conspiracy. The watchfulness of the Americans deterred the officer from fulfilling his appointment, and the papers fell into the hands of a patriotic officer, “who, by a singular coincidence, was at that moment standing where the Tory messenger expected his correspondent.” The plot and the names of the prominent conspirators were at once disclosed, and secret and efficient measures were instantly taken to put them under arrest.

Numbers were accordingly arrested and imprisoned, and on the 25th of July, Peter Sneman, Nicholas Andrews, John George Graves, Yost Pilecker, Adam Graves, Henry Shett, and Casper Fritchie were brought to trial before a special court at Frederick-town, consisting of Alexander Contee Hanson, afterwards Chancellor of the State, Col. James Johnson, and Upton Sheredine. After an impartial trial they were found guilty of high treason, in "enlisting men for the service of the king of Great Britain and administering an oath to them to bear true allegiance to the said king, and to obey his officers when called on."

The following sentence was delivered by Judge Hanson:

"Peter Sueeman, Nicholas Andrews, John George Graves, Yest Plecker, Adam Graves, Henry Shett, Casper Fritchie, attend. It has been suggested to the court that notwithstanding your guilt has been ascertained by an impartial jury, you consider the proceedings against you nothing more than solemn mockery, and have adopted a vain idea, propagated by the enemies of this country, that she dare not punish her unnatural subjects for engaging in the service of Great Britain. From the strange insensibility you have hereunto discovered, I was indeed led to conclude that you were under a delusion, which might prove fatal to your prospects of happiness hereafter. I think it is my duty, therefore, to explain to you your real situation. The crime you have been convicted of, upon the fullest and clearest testimony, is of such a nature that you cannot, ought not, to look for a pardon. Had it pleased heaven to permit the full execution of your unnatural designs, the miseries to be experienced by your devoted country would have been dreadful even in the contemplation. The ends of public justice, the dictates of policy, and the feelings of humanity all require that you should exhibit an awful example to your fellow subjects, and the dignity of the State, with everything that can interest the heart of man, calls aloud for your punishment. If the consideration of approaching fate can inspire proper sentiments, you will pour forth your thanks to that watchful Providence which has arrested you at an early state of guilt. And you will employ the short time you have to live in endeavoring, by a sincere penitence, to obtain pardon from the Almighty Being, who is to sit in judgment upon you, upon me, and all mankind."

"I must now perform the terrible task of denouncing the terrible punishment ordained for high treason."

"You, Peter Sueeman, Nicholas Andrews, Yest Plecker, Adam Graves, Henry Shett, John George Graves, and Casper Fritchie, and each of you, attend to your sentence. You shall be carried to the goal of Frederick-town, and be hanged therein; you shall be cut down to the earth alive, and your entrails shall be taken out and burnt while you are yet alive, your heads shall be cut off, your body shall be divided into four parts, and your heads and quarters shall be placed where his excellency the Governor shall appoint. So Lord have mercy upon your poor souls."

Three of the number were executed in the courthouse yard at Frederick, the remainder having been pardoned.¹

The Southern campaign of 1781 under Gen. Greene turned the tide of war in favor of the American cause. The brunt of this campaign was borne by the Maryland line, and although it does not come within the scope of the present work to follow in detail the operations which resulted in the virtual recovery of the South from the British armies, it can be said without exaggeration that no troops contributed so largely to the accomplishment of these important ends as those from Maryland. The Maryland line was the "Stonewall" legion of every contest, and came out of every conflict with fresh honors and distinction. In the battle of Eutaw Springs, which was one of the most desperate battles of the war, they displayed a gallantry that drew from Gen. Greene the highest expressions of admiration, and to their charge, "exceeding anything he ever saw," he ascribed the success which attended the Americans in the earlier part of the day. The following letter from a gallant soldier who took part in that engagement will be found interesting in this connection:

"High Hills, Santee, Sept. 25, 1781.

"Dear Brother,—I expect before this reaches you you will hear of the severe action that happened on the 9th instant with a body of British troops at the Eutaw Springs, commanded by Col. Stewart. I also expect you will have the particulars of the action before this reaches you, so shall say nothing concerning it, only inform you of the loss of officers killed and wounded in our Line. I have the misfortune myself to be one of the latter. We had 4 killed, which are as follows: Capt. Dobson and Edgely, of the 2d Regiment, Lieuts. Duvall and Gould, of the 1st Regiment. Wounded: Lt.-Col. Howard, Lt. Ewing, Lt. Woodford, Lt. Moore, and myself, of the 2d Regiment; of the 1st, Capt. Gibson and Hugon. My wound is in the left leg and has much shattered the big bone. Its between the calf and ankle. I have had no fevers these seven days. The Doctor has taken, I believe, at least forty pieces of bone out of it, though the most of them were very small. The wound has a very good appearance, and I have not the least doubt but that I shall be able to go upon erectness in the course of two months. Col. Howard's wound is through one of his shouldeirists and is needing fast; Capt. Gibson's through the right arm, and like to do well; Capt. Hugon's in the right groin, and like to do well; Lt. Ewing has two of his ribs broke, was shot through the left thigh, and, I believe, will do well; Lt. Moore has his end of his right thumb shot off, and is doing well. We were brought here upon litters from near the field of action, which is 10 or 20 miles from this place, and are to move again to-morrow to the Warsaw Settlement, about 70 miles from this place,—a very healthy country, where I expect we shall stay till we get well. If you can possibly send me some hard cash do it, for I am in great want of it. I have had no money since last fall. I shall want as much as will purchase me a horse. If I could ride I have no horse; and I have no hat, and had none to wear all the summer but an old borrowed one. If you can procure me one, do send it by the first safe hand, and two or three pairs of stockings. You will please excuse the incorrectness of this letter, for I can write no other way than as I lie upon my side. I can't sit up with any ease. You'll make my love to my Mother and Sisters, and George,
to Col. Brooke and Little Nancy, and to all the neighbours. Tell them I expect to be with them in the course of this winter. Adieu.

"Ye Affect[s] Brother, J. LYNN.

"P. S.—Tell my Mother not to make herself uneasy upon my account. For I would not regret the other leg being broke to give the enemy such another drubbing."

"To Capt. DAVID LYNN, Montgomery County, Maryland.

"By Capt. SHEPP.

In compliance with the request of Congress, Washington, on the 20th of February, 1781, directed Lafayette to march southward for the purpose of capturing Arnold and checking the enemy's operations in Virginia, and he accordingly set out on his march two days later. To expedite his progress, Thomas Beatty, of Frederick, George Murdock and Thomas Beall, of Montgomery, and the lieutenants of other counties were instructed to seize all the salt and fresh meats in their districts, and impress all the wagons, carriages, teams, drivers, &c., and send them to the head of the Elk for the purpose of transporting the troops, cannon, stores, and baggage to Virginia.

This assistance was promptly rendered, but after a short campaign in Virginia Lafayette was obliged to abandon Richmond and retreat towards Fredericksburg before the superior forces of Lord Cornwallis. Continuing his retreat, he crossed the Rapidan, where he was joined on the 7th of June by Gen. Wayne, who had passed through Frederick on the 31st of May with about one thousand troops to join him. The retreat of Lafayette towards Maryland excited apprehensions of invasion, and on the 4th of June the lieutenant of Frederick County was ordered immediately to arm and equip five hundred militia, the lieutenant of Montgomery two hundred and fifty, and of Prince George's two hundred and fifty, and march with them to Georgetown. The troops of horse in Frederick, Baltimore, and Kent Counties received similar orders, and such was the alacrity of the people that two new regiments were formed in a few days, the third under Lieut.-Col. Peter Adams, and the fourth under Lieut.-Col. Thomas Woolford. The Frederick troop of horse was commanded by John Ross Key, who, on the 10th of June, 1781, transmitted the following letter to the Governor:

"Sir,—I have the Honor and Satisfaction to inform Your Excellency that the Frederick Co. Troop of Horse under my Command are now on their Rout to George Town, where I expect to arrive this evening. We are tolerably well mounted and Equipped, and with pleasure Assure you I find a Desire military supplies to Georgetown. At this time all was activity in Maryland. The arrival of Washington, and the prospect of capturing Cornwallis, reawakened the spirit of the people, and measures of cooperation were effectually and promptly carried out. The third regiment of Continentals was speedily completed and dispatched to the scene of action, while the fourth regiment, under Maj. Alexander Roxburgh, mustering upwards of six hundred men, rank and file, and "said to contain the best men who had enlisted from this State since the war," marched from Annapolis on the 4th of September to join Lafayette.

After the surrender of Cornwallis the Maryland Continentals were sent to the support of Gen. Greene in the South, and the British prisoners were marched to Fort Frederick, Md., and Winchester, Va. Those confined at the former point were subsequently removed to Lancaster, Pa. The triumph at Yorktown virtually ended the war and freed the people of Maryland from further serious apprehension. No section of the State contributed more generously to the common defense than Western Maryland, and none were represented in the armies by braver or better soldiers. The declaration of peace was celebrated with public demonstrations of joy in Frederick Town and in all parts of the western section of the State.

On the 25th of April (1783) it is related that a number of the people living on Israel's Creek

"met at Rocky Hill Chapel, having previously engaged a clergyman, instead of the Hessian Band, thinking it their duty before they gave loose to the effusions of joy, so natural on being relieved from the calamitous circumstances under which they had so long labored, to pay the tribute due to the Supreme Disposer of all good by offering up their most grateful and hearty thanks for blessed interference in favor of the American cause, and for his having been pleased to conduct us through the war in so miraculous a manner, and at the conclusion of the same to make us free, sovereign, and independent States. To pray for his Divine blessings, etc., after which there was delivered an excellent sermon, much to the purpose. Upon leaving the chapel they were all most kindly invited to Col. Wood's, where there was a most elegant entertainment prepared. After dinner the following toasts were drank:

1 In looking over the old records of the clerk's office of Frederick County the following criminal proceedings, among others, were discovered in the prosecutions of Tories, instituted near the close of the Revolutionary war: State against one A. C., presented for saying "he wished all persons who went about warning people on militia duty might be all hanged, not by the necks but by the heels." Fined £25 specie. State against J. H., presented for "damning Gen. Washington and the Congress of the United States of America." Fined £15 specie. State against E. L., presented for "drinking health to King George, and damnation to Gen. Washington." Fined £5 specie. The minutes of the court show numerous orders passed by the court appropriating money for the support of the wives and the children of the soldiers in the Maryland line.

The Soldier Lands.—To discharge the engagements of the State towards its officers and soldiers for their services during the Revolution, the General Assembly, at the November session of 1781, appropriated all the vacant lands westward of Fort Cumberland (within the present limits of Allegany and Garrett Counties), reserved or otherwise, except so far as they were fairly covered by warrants, etc., to fulfill these obligations. By this act it was also provided that there should be a land-office for the Western Shore at Annapolis, and another on the Eastern Shore, where the General Court was held. In April, 1787, the Legislature passed a resolution authorizing the Governor to employ a competent person to lay out the vacant lands belonging to the State westward of Fort Cumberland, in lots of fifty acres each. In pursuance of this resolution, Francis Deakins was appointed, and at the November session of the Legislature of 1788, having finished a general plat of the lands, he reported to the General Assembly, whereupon an act was passed "to dispose of the reserved lands westward of Fort Cumberland." To each of the Maryland officers who had served in the Revolution were assigned four lots, and to each private one lot, as follows:

Chapter VIII.

THE CONSTITUTION AND UNION.

After the conclusion of the Revolutionary war, the remnants of the Maryland regiments returned to their native State to be disbanded. Many of these veterans bore honorable scars, still more had their health broken down by hardship and disease, and nearly all were penniless and in rags. The Maryland line, now numbering about five hundred men, under the command of Brig.-Gen. Gist, embarked at Charleston, S. C., on transports, and arrived at Annapolis late in July, 1783. They soon after marched to Baltimore, arriving there on the 27th. Before their departure, Gen. Greene, in a letter to Governor Paeo, thus referred to the Maryland troops in the Southern army:

"Many of your officers are on their return home. I should be wanting in gratitude not to acknowledge their singular merit and the importance of their services. They have spilt their blood freely in the service of their country, and have faced every danger and difficulty without a murmur or complaint. I beg leave to recommend Col. Williams, who has been at the head of your line, to the particular notice of your State, as an officer of great merit and good conduct. A very considerable number of these (Maryland line) returned are not, nor ever will be, fit for service again. They are incapable of doing active duty, and ought to be turned over to the Invalid Corps."

The British prisoners confined at Frederick and Winchester, numbering about fifteen hundred, were marched to Baltimore in May, 1783, and embarked in vessels sent to transport them to New York. By a proclamation of Congress, dated October 18th, all officers and soldiers absent from the army on furlough were discharged from further service, and all others who had engaged to serve during the war were to be discharged from and after the 3d of November. On the 25th of November the British troops under Sir Guy Carleton evacuated New York, and Washington, accompanied by Governor Clinton, immediately took possession. A few days afterwards Washington took an affectionate leave of Gen. Knox and his companions in arms, and then set out for Annapolis, where he resigned his command on the 23d of December, 1783.

While Congress was sitting in Annapolis, on the 14th of January, 1784, it ratified the definitive treaty which had been concluded and signed at Paris on the 3d of the preceding September; and on the 20th of January, Governor Paca issued his proclamation announcing the same to the people of the State.

The Society of the Cincinnati.—Before the dissolution of the army on the Hudson, Gen. Knox, "ever noted for generous impulses," suggested as a mode of perpetuating the friendships which had been formed, and keeping alive the brotherhood of the camp, the formation of a society composed of the officers of the army. The suggestion met with universal concurrence and the hearty approbation of Washington. On May 10, 1783, a meeting of the general officers and one officer from the line of each regiment was held at the headquarters of Baron Steuben, at the cantonment on Hudson River. Baron Steuben presided, and proposals for establishing "The Society of the Cincinnati" were considered. They were referred to a committee composed of Maj.-Gen. Knox, Brig.-Gen. Hand, Brig.-Gen. Huntington, and Col. Shaw. After three days they made a report which was unanimously adopted, and the plan as revised by them was carried into complete effect with little opposition, and is still in force. The next preliminary meeting was again held at the cantonment on June 19, 1783, when Gen. Washington was elected temporary president-general; Maj.-Gen. McDougall, treasurer-general; and Maj.-Gen. Knox, secretary-general. The first general meeting after the disbanding of the army took place at the City Tavern, at Philadelphia, in May, 1788, when permanent officers were elected. On the 15th, Washington was unanimously chosen president; Maj.-Gen. Gates, vice-president; and Maj.-Gen. Knox, secretary. The Maryland Gazette, on the 6th of November, 1783, published the following notice:

"OCT. 30th, 1783.

"The officers of the Maryland Line, upon the present and half-pay establishments, are requested to meet at Annapolis on the 29th of November, where several matters very interesting to the line in general will be communicated and necessarily brought under consideration."

"W. SMALLWOOD, M.-G."

In pursuance of this notice a large number of the officers of the Maryland line assembled at Mann's Tavern, in Annapolis. In consequence of the absence of Maj.-Gen. Smallwood and Brig.-Gen. Gist, the two senior officers of the Maryland line, the meeting was adjourned until the following morning at eleven o'clock. The two officers not appearing, the meeting was again adjourned until the afternoon at three o'clock, when it was organized by selecting Brig.-Gen. Otho H. Williams, of Washington County, as temporary chairman, and Lieut.-Col. Eccleston secretary. The institution of the Order of Cincinnati was read and adopted, and after each officer had signed the constitution they adjourned until the next day. Upon reassembling they proceeded to the election of officers, whereupon Maj.-Gen. Smallwood was elected president; Brig.-Gen. Gist, vice-president; Brig.-Gen. Williams, secretary; Col. Nathaniel Ramsay, treasurer; and Lieut.-Col. Eccleston, assistant treasurer. After the transaction of some minor business, the society then elected Gen. Smallwood, Gen. Williams, Governor Paca, and Col. Ramsay delegates to the general society.

The Indians on the frontier, as has been seen, had given more or less trouble all through the Revolutionary war, and still continuing their hostile demonstrations, Congress on the 29th of September, 1783, authorized the President to call out the militia for the protection of the border settlements, and "to break the power of the savages." On the 6th of October in the same year Gen. St. Clair, then Governor of the Northwest Territory, was directed by Washington to collect fifteen hundred men from the western counties of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, and march against the hostile Indian towns on the Maumee. Col. Henry Lee, of Virginia, was to command one regiment of levies to be raised in Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania. These troops assembled in the vicinity of Fort Washington (now Cincinnati) early

\[1\] While the Society of the Cincinnati was in session at Annapolis, on the 24th of November, 1783, Governor Paca sent the following brief message to the General Assembly: "This morning one of the officers of the Maryland Line called upon me and gave information that a number of soldiers had collected in the city and expressed a design of surrounding the General Assembly, and of making use of some violence to obtain satisfaction of their claims on the public." As a matter of precaution, he ordered Col. James Brice to hold in readiness to march at a moment's warning one company of the Annapolis militia, to prevent the treasury and suppress any violent proceedings. It is scarcely necessary to add that the rumor was false. Great was the need of these veterans, and however just their cause of complaint at the delays of Congress in settling their long arrears of pay, they showed no turbulent disposition, but patiently returned to their farms and workshops.
in September, and consisted nominally of two thousand regulars and one thousand militia, including a company of artillery and several squadrons of horse. On the 4th of November, being reduced to fourteen hundred effective men, after penetrating to a tributary of the Wabash, fifteen miles south of the Miami villages, and almost a hundred from Fort Washington, they were fiercely attacked by a large number of Indians. For two hours and a half the Indians, concealed in the woods, slaughtered the troops from every point, when they fled in disorder, leaving their artillery, baggage, etc., in the hands of the enemy.

The entire loss was estimated at six hundred and seventy-seven killed, among whom was Gen. Butler, and two hundred and seventy-one wounded.

Ensign George Chase, of Baltimore, was killed, and Capt. William Buchanan and a number of Marylanders were wounded.

This defeat produced great alarm on the borders, and Congress took prompt and immediate action by authorizing an army of five thousand men to be equipped for frontier service. Various obstacles, however, prevented a speedy organization of this force, and it was not until the spring of 1794 that an army strong enough to strike a decisive blow could be collected. Gen. Anthony Wayne was appointed commander-in-chief, and Col. Otho H. Williams, of Washington County, and Col. Rufus Putnam brigadier-generals under him.

In May, 1791, Henry Gaither, of Western Maryland, was appointed commander of levies now raising in this State," vice Col. Rawlings, who declined; and Capts. William Lewis and Benjamin Price were appointed to the command of two companies.

Among the Maryland troops engaged in this expedition were the companies of Capt. Campbell Smith, of Baltimore, and of Capts. Lewis, Carberry, and Benjamin Price, of Frederick. The entire force consisted of two thousand regular troops, fifteen hundred mounted volunteers from Kentucky, and some other volunteer organizations, and assembled at Greenville. On the 20th of August, 1794, Gen. Wayne met the Indians at the foot of the rapids on the Maumee, and, after a short but sanguinary struggle, completely defeated them. In this battle Capts. Smith and Price were severely wounded.

In September, 1790, Thomas Sprigg was authorized to collect all the arms in Washington County belonging to the State, and persons having arms in their possession were directed to deliver them to Capt. Ott, at Hagerstown.

1 Included in the killed were thirty women.

In October, 1790, M. Lacassagne, to encourage twenty families to emigrate and improve a tract of land which he possessed on the northwest side of the Ohio, in sight of Louisville, at the rapids, offered to give, among other inducements, two hundred acres of land in fee-simple to each family. Col. Thomas Sprigg, Col. John Barnes, and Dr. Henry Schenckey, near Hagerstown, Col. Wm. Bentley, near Frederick, and James Chapline, near Sharpsburg, were his agents.

The Hagerstown Spy of Oct. 18, 1793, says that on "last Saturday marched from this town, in order to join the main army in the Western country, a detachment of troops, under the command of Lieut. Whistler. The most of this corps was raised in this town, and too much praise cannot well be bestowed on Lieut. Whistler for his indefatigable assiduity in disciplining his men, and rendering them orderly and inoffensive to the inhabitants. We wish them an agreeable march and successful campaign."

While these events were occurring on the border, the country was agitated by apprehensions of war with foreign powers, and by actual insurrection at home. On the 1st of February, 1793, the French National Convention declared war against England and Holland. One of their first acts was to appoint a representative to the United States to solicit the support of the sister republic, and to claim the privileges to which they considered France to be entitled under the two treaties made with Benjamin Franklin on the 6th of February, 1778. Under Articles XVII. and XXII. of the first treaty of friendship and commerce the French assumed that they might claim the exclusive right to arm and commission privateers within American ports, to bring into them their prizes, to cause the prizes thus brought in to be condemned by French consuls and sold, and even to capture vessels of the enemy within the limits of the maritime jurisdiction of the United States. At least such were the pretensions of their envoy, Monsieur, or, as he styled himself, Citizen Genet, a Girondist of the most radical type, whose avowed object was to excite the people of the United States to a war with Great Britain.

On the other hand, Washington, then entering on his second term of office as President, was determined to preserve the neutrality of his country, and immediately on receiving intelligence of the outbreak of war, hastened from Mount Vernon to Philadelphia, summoned his cabinet together, and soon after, on the 22d of April, 1793, issued a proclamation of neutrality. The sympathies of the people of the United States were warmly engaged on the side of France, and Genet was so much encouraged by the popular sentiment that on his arrival in Charleston, in April, 1793, he at once proceeded to disregard the President's proclamation and to organize a system of privateering. He had not been in the country a week before he had commissioned four vessels to sail as privateers. He also authorized the French consuls in one town to hold prize-courts and condeean and sell vessels captured by his privateers, and he then made a triumphant progress from Charleston to Philadelphia, organizing red republican clubs and preaching hostility to England. In consequence of the depredations committed by the American privateers under the French flag against British commerce in 1794, and the extraordinary pretensions and naval power of the British government, the President recommended serious preparations both for offense and defense, and the fortifications at Baltimore and other exposed points were put in readiness to repel attack. In compliance with the act of Congress and the provisions made by the Legislature, Governor Thomas Sim Lee reorganized the militia of the State, and appointed as major-generals John E. Howard, John Hoskins Stone, and Levin Winder. John Davidson was appointed brigadier-general for Calvert and Anne Arundel Counties; John H. Briscoe for St. Mary's and Charles; Uriah Forrest for Prince George's and part of Montgomery; Jeremiah Crabb for part of Montgomery and Frederick; Mountjoy Bailey for Fredericktown; Moses Rawlings for Washington and Allegany Counties; Samuel Smith for Baltimore Town; Charles C. Ridgely for Baltimore County; Josias C. Hall for Cecil and Harford; James Lloyd for Kent and Queen Anne's; John Ecleston for Dorchester, Caroline, and Talbot; and Alexander Roxburgh for Somerset and Worcester.

Allegany County: Lieut.-Col. Daniel Cresap; Majs. John Lynn, Gabriel Jacobs.

The Whisky Insurrection.—While these military preparations were in progress some of the western counties of Pennsylvania lifted the arm of defiance against the Federal government, and acts were committed to defeat the execution of the laws imposing duties upon spirits distilled within the United States. These treasonable measures called for the prompt interference of the executive authority, and hence arose the episode in our history known as the "Whisky Insurrection." Distillers, who resided in Allegany, Fayette, Washington, and Westmoreland Counties, Pa., who were willing to comply with the excise laws passed by Congress, were abused; nails were robbed, outrages committed on the government revenue officers, and Gen. Neville, the chief inspector of revenue, was twice attacked and his house burned to the ground by these lawless insurgents. The government of Maryland watched with interest the efforts of Pennsylvania to suppress this rebellion, and prepared to furnish help if necessary. On May 19th the Secretary of War directed Governor Lee "to organize, arm, and equip, according to law, and hold in readiness to march at a moment's warning 5418 of the militia of Maryland, officers included." In the mean time the rebels were making preparations to seize Fort Fayette in Pennsylvania, and the insurrectionary spirit seemed to be spreading into the adjoining counties of Maryland and Virginia. One Bradford, a native of Maryland, who had assumed by common consent the position of commander-in-chief of the insurgents, issued a call for the assembling of the militia on Braddock's Field on August 1st, with arms and accoutrements, and provisions for four days. Within three days seven thousand men assembled, the greater part with the determination to follow Bradford in resistance to the Federal and State governments whenever he might lead. Mr. Lossing says, "It was Bradford's design to seize Fort Pitt and its arms and ammunition; but he found most of the militia officers unwilling to co-operate in such an overt act of treason. But they readily consented to the perpetration of outrages against excise officers, and the whole country in that region was governed for the moment by the combined powers of mobocracy and military despotism." Upon the receipt of this intelligence the President immediately called his cabinet together to take the necessary measures for the preservation of peace and the enforcement of the laws. It was agreed in the cabinet council that forbearance must now end, and the effective power of the government be put forth to suppress the rising rebellion. Accordingly, on August 7th Washington issued a proclamation warning the insurgents to disperse, and declaring that if tranquillity should not be restored in the disturbed counties before September 1st, an armed force would be employed to compel submission to the laws. At the same time the President made a requisition on the Governors of Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey for militia sufficient to compose an army of twelve thousand men. This number was subsequently increased to fifteen thousand. The troops of New Jersey and Pennsylvania were directed to rendezvous at Bed ford, and those of Maryland and Virginia at Cumberland. The command of the expedition was conferred on Washington on Governor Richard Henry Lee, or "Light Horse Harry," as he was generally called, of Virginia. Governor Mifflin, of Pennsylvania, and Governor Howell, of New Jersey, commanded the militia of their respective States. Gen. Daniel Morgan commanded the militia of Virginia, and Gen. Samuel Smith, the hero of Fort Mifflin in 1777, and at this time the able representative of Baltimore in Congress, commanded those of Maryland. The latter took command August 17th, and immediately proceeded to organize his forces. Volunteers flocked to Baltimore from all portions of the State to await marching orders to the seat of war.

The friends of the government in Western Maryland were in the mean time taking steps for their own protection and for the maintenance of the laws. The following notices published in the newspapers of the period show that in spite of its proximity to the disaffected region the spirit of loyalty was still strong in this section:

"The different Companies of Militia in Hagerstown are requested to assemble at the Court-House, on Saturday next, at two o'clock, at which time the troop will beat." "Daniel Stull, Capt.

"Robert Douglass, Capt.

"John Geiger, Capt.

"John Lee, Capt.

"Casper Shaffer, Capt.

"HAGERSTOWN, Aug. 27, 1794.

"All those Gentlemen who are desirous of joining the volunteer company of Light Horse of Washington County, will please make application to Jacob Schenley, captain.

"Aug. 27, 1794."

"ELIZABETHTOWN, MARYLAND, September 3.

On the 6th of September a meeting of such of the inhabitants as were exempt by law from military duty was held at the court-house in Frederick, Thomas Johnson in the chair, "to consider of the steps necessary to be taken to quiet the alarm occasioned by the insurgents. Besides the military guards on duty, it was unanimously agreed that a company should be formed of persons thus exempt to serve as guards at this place, whenever it may be necessary to act in support of the constitutional civil authority, or to repel any attempt that may be made to disturb the peace of the town or neighborhood. It was further resolved that as soon as fifty persons should enroll themselves, a meeting should be held to choose the proper officers to command the company, and on the same day they were enrolled; but the evening being then too far advanced to complete the business, they adjourned till Monday, eleven o'clock, when Mr. Johnson was unanimously chosen captain, Col. Price lieutenant, and Maj. Miller ensign."

Most of these organizations had been formed previous to this time. Capt. Mackenheimer's company was raised about 1787. Its uniform was light blue faced with white, and its parade-ground was on the
HISTORY OF WESTERN MARYLAND.

The present site of the Front Street Theatre, in Baltimore. The Independent Company, the Mechanical Company, the Baltimore Sans Culottes, and Capt. Jessup's rifle company are said to have been organized about 1792. These, when the State militia was organized, constituted the Fifth Regiment. The First Baltimore Battalion was raised about the same time, and comprised Capt. Hugh Thompson's company of grenadiers, two companies of hatmen, as they were called, wearing cocked hats, and Capt. Robb's company of light infantry. The uniform of the organization was blue coat faced with red and edged with white, white vest and breeches, black knee-bands, short-laced boots, and white cotton hose. Capt. J. Bowen's troop of horse was associated with them; uniform, green faced with red.

The uniform of the Sans Culottes, afterwards called the Independent Blues, was copied from the marine uniform of the frigate "Astrea," then lying at Baltimore. It was worn buttoned close to the body, with the cartouche-belt inside. It was the first company that adopted pantaloons, breeches and stockings being then universally worn.

Messrs. Daniel Cresap, John Lynn, and Gabriel Jacob, in a letter to Governor Lee, dated Cumberland, Sept. 2, 1794, say,—

"We are very sorry to add, but we conceive it to be our indispensable duty to inform your Excellency that the spirit of insurrection is not confined to the western counties of Pennsylvania; those to the eastward of the Alleghany mountains are infected with the contagion; and unless speedily prevented, may rise to a formidable height, and, perhaps, end in our destruction. Cumberland hath been threatened, an attempt hath been made there to raise a liberty-pole (which is the insignia or badge by which the insurgents are now discriminated), but by the exertions of the most respectable citizens it was prevented. In other parts of the country they have succeeded. The papers of the excise officers have been demanded. We are threatened with the Pennsylvanians, whom, the disaffected here say, they will call to their assistance. Should it take place, God only knows what will be the event; however, let the event be what it may, our exertions, friendly, we trust, by the most respectable of the country, will not be wanting. In our situation, we think it our duty to request of you to forward to us arms and accoutrements, these we will distribute amongst the men in whom we may confide. Those who are willing to support the measures of the government have it not in their power. Should you be able to obtain the approbation of council, you will please forward us two hundred stand of arms, and order to our protection a small detachment of militia, consisting of cavalry and infantry, to be selected from those counties which are well disposed to the laws of the Union, and particularly the Excise law. We hope the example of Baltimore Town will sanction the transmitting of public arms, and that your conduct will, on this occasion, as it then did, meet with the approbation of the Legislature."

On September 6th, Secretary Hamilton wrote to Governor Lee,—

"War Department, Sept. 6, 1794."

"Sir,—I am directed by the President to notice to your Excellency that information has been received that some riotous proceedings have taken place in the upper part of Baltimore County and in the neighborhood of Hagerstown, connected with the insurrection in the western counties of Pennsylvania. He instructs me to observe that it appears to him of the highest importance that efficient measures should be pursued to suppress the first beginning of this spirit in your State, and thereby to check the progress of an evil which radically threatens the order, peace, and tranquillity of the country. Much depends, in such a crisis as the present, on an early display of energy under the guidance of the legal precaution. It is understood that the magazine of arms of the State is at Frederick. Adequate means of doubt will be used to prevent the possibility of these falling into bad hands.

"With great respect, I have the honor to be your Excellency's most obedient and humble servant,

"A. HAMILTON.

Again on September 15th, Hamilton wrote to Governor Lee that "it is the President's desire that no time should be lost in uniting the whole of the militia of Maryland at Fort Cumberland. If the commanding officer has not already taken the field, it is desirable that he should do so without delay, in order to combine, arrange, and accelerate their exterior movements."

On September 15th the Governor sent by express a requisition for Baltimore troops, in consequence of a report that the insurgents had assembled in considerable numbers near Cumberland, with the intention of marching to Frederick to seize the State arms deposited in the arsenal. The order reached Baltimore on Sunday, while the people were at their several places of worship. General Smith was at the time attending service at the First Presbyterian church, and was immediately sent for. He at once ordered the drums to beat and the troops to assemble on the parade-ground near Harford Run. A correspondent in the Maryland Gazette of the 15th gives the following graphic description of this call to arms:

"A more warlike appearance, perhaps, our town has not exhibited since the year 1776 than it did yesterday, in consequence of an express from the Governor to General Smith. The militia of this town were requested to meet on the parade, near the old theater, at 4 P.M. They met accordingly, when a circle was formed, and Gen. Smith, in a short but energetic address, informed them of the object of their meeting; that it was in consequence of an intended attack by the insurgents beyond the mountains upon the arsenal at Frederick Town, with a view of taking off all the arms, etc., and that three hundred volunteers of infantry, besides artillery and cavalry, were required immediately to march under the command of Col. Stricker and secure it. 'It is not' said he, 'against an enemy that we have to march, but a set of men more daring than the rest, a lawless banditti, who set themselves up to govern. Shall we permit them to seize our arms and give us laws, or shall we keep them and give laws to ourselves?' (We could not hear the whole of the general's speech.) He concluded his harangue by putting the question, 'Will you go as volunteers or will you be drafted?' Mournful as the circumstance are, it is with pleasure we have it in our power to inform the public that they turned out voluntarily to nearly treble the requisition, and that the unanimity displayed on the occasion could hardly be surpassed. This is the test of patriotism."

The Fifth Regiment was ordered to parade at the court-house on Monday morning following at nine o'clock, in marching order, and at the time appointed took up the line of march for Frederick under the command of Col. Stricker, being twenty-five cavalry and two hundred and twenty-five infantry. The Twenty-seventh Regiment set out on Tuesday morning, followed by a company of volunteers from Worcester County. On the 15th over three hundred more marched, and later in the week six hundred additional men. On the 15th a part of the volunteer militia of Annapolis marched to Frederick, and on the succeeding day a detachment of light dragoons. In a letter dated from Frederick a few days later, after the arrival of part of the militia, a correspondent writing to a friend in Baltimore says,—

"I know your anxiety to hear from us. Reports have, I fear, pictured our situation dreadful. The march of the troops from both Baltimore and Georgetown has been singularly expeditions. Capt. Moore and his troop, that would do honor to any army, arrived about the middle of yesterday. Col. Stricker and a most beautiful corps of fine young fellows are now refreshing themselves at Monocacy. The troops from Georgetown left that place at five o'clock Sunday evening, and arrived here Monday before night. The grenadiers from the city of Washington, and other troops from the neighborhood, came in yesterday. The militia of the county have behaved truly praiseworthy, and as becomes freemen they are returning to their homes; for, rest assured, we shall never see the face of an insurgent unless he is sought for in the mountains, as you would a wolf. We are not, nor ever have been, in any danger. A number of idle reports have alarmed some of our citizens without cause."

On the 19th twenty men on horseback arrived in Frederick from Hagerstown with an account "that the deluded people of Allegany and Washington Counties were embodying, and might be expected to attack Frederick the next day." There were then, according to contemporaneous accounts, five hundred troops at Frederick, "well armed, in high spirits, and desirous that the insurgents would make the attack; and besides, the Baltimore horse were within a few miles; the first detachment of foot would be at New Market on Tuesday evening; the second detachment were apprised of the alarm."

The following letter from Elizabeth Town, Washington County, under date of the 24th of September, gives an interesting account of the condition of affairs in that locality at this crisis:
"Saturday last his Excellency the Governor of this State arrived here, and returned on Monday morning. The opposition of the exiled law grew, by progression, as well to an opposition to all law and authority as to a personal emnity to individuals in this town, inasmuch as the pole, which had been erected in this town by the rabble, was secretly cut down, perhaps by one of themselves, in order to have a colorable pretext again to insult the peaceable citizens, and wreak vengeance on those to whom they had at any time hitherto been affronted. As a prelude to another affray, some dark assassin put a band-hill at the market-house, ordering, by name, some of the principal citizens of the town to erect another pole or they should be put to death. This order and threat was valiantly despised by those worthy citizens. In the mean time a party were assembling along the verge of the South Mountain, in order, as was said, to attack the magazine and town of Frederick. That expedition, however, failed. At this stage of the business, and finding the turbulence of faction still increase, some volunteers of our cavalry and infantry mounted guard, patrolled the streets, sent detachments into the country, apprehended some of the principals, and brought them to justice. The vigilance and alacrity of our citizens on this occasion to support government was too compehensive to be passed over in silence, and, without detracting any merit from the many distinguished patriots of this town, the names of Capts. Lee and Schenley are honorably mentioned. At this juncture, on last Friday, a detachment of volunteers and drafts arrived in town, under the command of Gen. Balley, consisting of seventy cavalry and two hundred and fifty infantry, from Baltimore, Georgetown, and Frederick-town. Their presence had a good effect: ... they assisted in the work which had been begun of bringing the culprits to justice; ... a tribute of gratitude is due to those troops for their kind and prompt assistance, ... but finding there remained little occasion for them here they returned home on last Monday morning, ... about which time arrived two hundred volunteers and drafts, under the command of Maj. Lynn, who are destined for the Western country, but are to remain here till further orders, and are now under the command of that old veteran soldier, Maj. Ott.

"The Hon. Judge Craik, and some of the magistrates of the county, have been busily employed in the examination of the culprits, and have, we understand, admitted many to bail. Upon the whole, we doubt not that justice will be done, and that every species of unnecessary severity will be avoided on the occasion, ... well knowing that affection as well as submission is requisite to the security of a Republican government, ... and that affection arises from a sense and experience of the blessings of liberty and order."

On the morning of the 23d September the volunteers who had marched from different parts of the State to Fredericktown to act against the insurgents, met on the grand parade in Baltimore, and having performed the manual, were drawn up in a large circle, when Col. Stricker, accompanied by the Governor himself, read the following address from his Excellency:

"The commander-in-chief feels it incumbent on him, on this occasion, to present on the part of the State, whose character, peace, and security were so largely endangered, and for himself, his warmest acknowledgments to all the officers and soldiers who had given their services under this requisition, and who by so doing have not only effected the restoration of order and safety in their own State, but have given a material check to the views of the insurgents in Pennsylvania, who will despair hereafter of aiding their wretched designs by the seduction of their neighbors. Thus, conceiving that an important service has been rendered by the militia serving under his orders, the commander-in-chief, with congratulations and thanks, discharges them from the present service.

"THOMAS S. LEE."

At a meeting of a number of the people of Washington County held at the court-house in Elizabeth Town, on Friday, the 26th of September, 1794, Col. Henry Shryock, chairman, and John Thomson Mason, secretary,

"it was proposed and agreed to, that Messrs. Nathaniel Rochester, Henry Schenley, Samuel Ringgold, William Clark, and John Thomson Mason be requested to prepare an address from the meeting to Col. Thomas Sprigg, who prepared the following, which was read, approved, and ordered to be printed in Washington, Frederick, and Baltimore newspapers:

"TO COL. THOMAS SPRIGG:

"Sir,—By the unanimous voice of the persons present at this meeting you are solicited once more to permit us to cast our suffrages upon you as the person, in our opinion, most proper to represent this district in Congress. We beg leave to return your thanks for your past services to that station, and to manifest our approbation of your conduct as our representative. We beg leave, more particularly at this time, to thank you for your late constant, unremitting, prudent, and spirited exertions in endeavoring to suppress those unhappy tumults that have disturbed the peace and threatened the safety of the well-disposed citizens amongst us. The manner in which certain reports have been secretly and industriously circulated, and the inexcusable misrepresentations that have been made, excite our highest indignation, and we feel ourselves injured in the attempts made to calumny you. But whilst we assure you of our determination to support you at the ensuing election, we hope, and confidently trust, that every honorable and manly exertion will be made on your part to gratify the wishes and effectuate the endeavours of your friends.

"Signed, by order of the meeting.

"JOHN T. MASON, Secretary."" oppose their cutting it down; that he had seen a very disagreeable day in Hagerstown, and that if the pole was cut down, and no force remained in that place to prevent its being set up again, the mob would return more enraged than before, set up the liberty-pole, and insult the inhabitants, who were not in a situation to protect themselves. That it would reflect, too, upon Washington County, and that it would be better to suspend cutting the pole down for a short time, until a force sufficient to prevent its being set up again should arrive in Hagerstown to protect the inhabitants, and bring those to justice who had thus offended against the laws of their country.

"N. E.—Capt. Hunter, from Baltimore, Capt. William Campbell, and Maj. Taylor, and some others, were present when this conversation took place. Sprigg’s conversation therein alluded to, and, although it is not probably in his words, it fully conveys the ideas received from his expressions.

"We certify that we were present in Hagerstown on the 1st day of September, 1794, when the mob so much talked of happened. We also certify that Col. Thomas Sprigg was then present, and that he exerted himself in a most singular and spirited manner to prevent the erection of the liberty-pole, that was then raised, and to disperse the mob. We were witness to many insults that he received from the mob in consequence of his exertions, and we often supposed his person in danger. We have also been witness to the active and decided part which Col. Sprigg has since taken to bring those insurgents to justice, and do think this county under particular obligations to that gentleman for the part he has acted.

At the time Washington issued his first proclamation he appointed Senator Ross, Mr. Bradford, the Attorney-General, and Mr. Yates, a judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, commissioners on the part of the Federal government to visit the insurgent counties with discretionary powers to offer lenient terms to the offenders, and, if possible, induce them to submit to the laws, and disband before the 14th of September. They were joined by Chief Justice McKean and Gen. Irvine, commissioners appointed on the part of Pennsylvania. These commissioners visited the insurgents, who refused all compliance, and they returned to Philadelphia and reported the failure of their mission. The President then issued his proclamation of the 25th of September, in which he vividly described the defiant spirit with which the lenient propositions of the government had been met, and declared his determination to reduce them to submission by coercive measures. As if anticipating the result of the commissioners’ mission, Alexander Hamilton had previously addressed the following letter to Governor Lee:

"War Department, Sept. 17, 1791.

"Sir,—The intelligence received from the western counties of Pennsylvania, which comes down to the 13th instant, and announces, as far as it was then known, the result of the meetings of the people in the several townships and districts to express their sense on the question of submission or resistance to the laws,—while it shows a great proportion of the inhabitants of these counties disposed to pursue the path of duty, shows, also, that there is a large and violent party which can only be controlled by the application of force. This being the result, it is become the more indispensable and urgent to press forward the forces destined to act against the insurgents with all possible activity and energy. The advanced season leaves no time to spare,—and it is extremely important to afford speedy protection to the well disposed, and to prevent the preparation and accumulation of greater means of resistance and the extension of combinations to abet the insurrection. The President counts upon every exertion upon your part which so serious and eventual an emergency demands.

"With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

"ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

In October Washington left Philadelphia, determined to lead the army in person, and, accompanied by the Secretary of War, he proceeded to Fort Cumberland, the place of rendezvous for the Maryland and Virginia troops, where he arrived on the 16th.1

1 The following notice throw light upon some of the local military movements at this time in progress in Western Maryland:

"A Troop of Horse.

"Those persons who are desirous of joining a troop of Horse will apply to Samuel Ringgold, he being authorized by the Field-officers to raise a troop.

"Hagerstown, Oct. 1, 1794."

"A meeting of Capt. Schenck’s troop of Horse is requested at Mr. Ragan’s tavern, on Friday evening next, at six o’clock, in order to consult upon the most eligible method of having the said troop equipped.

"Elizabethtown, Maryland, October 7th.

"Accounts from all quarters mention the marching of the militia against the Western insurgents . . . the troops which were stationed here, as well as the quota of this place, marched yesterday, in order to join the other troops of the State at Williamsport, under the command of Gen. Smith."
The Pennsylvania and New Jersey troops had moved from Carlisle on the 10th of October. A large number of the Maryland and Virginia troops were assembled at Cumberland. Upon Washington's arrival he received such information as convinced him that the spirits of the insurgents were broken, and hastened on to Bedford, thirty miles distant, and there this intelligence was confirmed. "The assembling of the militia from Maryland and Virginia at Cumberland created great excitement in the village. How long they remained here is not exactly known, but on the 18th of October Washington arrived, and spent several days inspecting the condition of the men and their supplies. On the 19th he appeared in full uniform, and held a review on the old parade-ground of Fort Cumberland, at which the entire population of the town was present. This was the last occasion upon which we wore his uniform. The troops had been encamped along Will's Creek, on what was known as the 'Island,' where they had good water from a spring near by. On the 19th the command was marched up to the parade-ground, where the court-house now stands, and drawn up for inspection.

"Gen. Washington rode along the line, from the right to the left, and was loudly cheered by the men. Afterwards the command marched in review, and Washington raised his hat as a salute while they passed. Gen. Lee and Morgan were both present and participated. Hon. Alexander R. Boteler has in his possession an oil-painting representing this review. It was the work of an amateur artist, and upon its completion passed into the hands of Gen. Daniel Morgan." 1

Satisfied that his presence would be no longer needed with the army, Gen. Washington returned to Philadelphia, leaving Governor Lee, of Virginia, in command. The troops crossed the Allegheny Mountains in a heavy rain, marching sometimes in mud up to their knees, and the two wings formed a junction at Union Town. As they advanced into the insurgent country all signs of rebellion disappeared, and the leaders fled. After the adoption of a few precautionary measures, most of the troops were sent to their homes, and thus, without the shedding of a drop of blood, ended a rebellion which at one time threatened the very existence of the Union.

The following letter was addressed by Alexander Hamilton to Governor Lee shortly after the suppression of the insurrection:

"War Department, Nov. 24, 1794.

Sir,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter of the 19th instant from the Executive Council of Maryland, and to congratulate you and them on the disappearance of the insurrection in Maryland.

"The President has seen with great satisfaction the laudable vigor with which it was met by the Government, the excellent disposition manifested by the citizens, and the speedy termination of the disturbance. Such an example cannot but have the best effect.

"Though severity towards offenders is to be avoided as much as can consist with the safety of society, yet impunity in such cases is apt to produce too much promptitude in setting the laws at defiance. Repeated instances of such impunity in Pennsylvania are perhaps the principal cause of the misfortunes which now afflict itself, and through it the United States. The disturbances of the peace familiarly appeal to the past experience of unpunished offences as an encouragement to the perpetration of new ones. This general reflection will no doubt be duly adverted to by the judiciary and other authorities of Maryland.

"With great respect and esteem, I have the honor to be, Sir, your most obedient servant,

"Alexander Hamilton.

Upon the return of the Maryland troops, Gen. Lee acknowledged their services in the following letter to the Governor:

"Headquarters, Nov. 26, 1794.

"Sir,—The period having arrived when the army entrusted to my direction by the President of the United States, having accomplished the object of their advance into this country, are about to return home, I should commit violence on my own feelings were I not to express to your Excellency my very high ideas of their merit. Suddenly brought into the field, they were unprepared for the hardships which they encountered. Nevertheless, disregarding the distress to which they were consequently in a greater degree exposed, they continued to evidence, with firmness and zeal, the purity of the principles by which they were moved, and terminated their campaign in perfect correspondence with the patriotism which impelled them to exchange domestic enjoyments for the toils and privations inseparable from military life. To all is due the tribute of applause which ever attends the faithful and animated discharge of duty, but to one class something more is due. Those inestimable and friendless citizens who fill the ranks seem to have been scarcely noticed in the legal provisions for compensation.

"If the example exhibited by my companions in arms is deemed worthy of attention, I derive great consolation from my hopes that the State Legislature will take into consideration the inequality which at present exists in the pay allowed to the officers and to the soldiers, and, so far as respects the faithful army under my orders, will be pleased to manifest their sense of the conduct of the troops by rendering the pecuniary compensation of the soldiers proportionate to that given to the officers. The justice and policy of such interposition are alike evident, and will be peculiarly acceptable.

"Another point, in which both officers and soldiers are interested, claims, in my humble opinion, legislative notice. Although the wise and temperate system adopted by the President of the United States averted the heaviest of all human calamities, and saved the effusion of blood, yet the sufferings which the army experienced from the extreme severity of the weather have deprived many families of their dearest friend and chief support. To alleviate their miseries, by extending to them, with equity and liberality, the public aid, is the only possible retribution which can be made by the community, and I flatter myself it is only necessary to make known the existence of such cases to secure to the sufferers the requisite legal provision.

And as a further recognition of their services, the General Assembly, on the 24th of December, 1794, Rush, unanimously, That the thanks of this Legislature be given to the officers and privates of the militia of this State, who on the late call of the President rallied round the standard of the laws, and in the prompt and severe services which they encountered bore the most illustrious testimony to the value of the Constitution and the blessings of internal peace and order; and that the Governor be requested to communicate the above vote of thanks in such manner as he may judge most acceptable to the patriotic citizens who are its subjects."

1 The military revival caused by the Whisky Insurrection and the anticipated trouble with France did not die out with the suppression of the outbreak in Western Pennsylvania, but continued with increasing force until after the conclusion of the war with England in 1812. Such Washington County notices as the following show that the militia laws were strictly enforced, and the military organizations carefully maintained and kept in a state of preparation and discipline:

Joseph Price,

Lieut.-Col. 8th Regt., Washington County, Maryland.

Hagerstown, Sept. 19, 1799.

Ordered, that the 8th Regiment of the 2nd brigade of Militia, be paraded on Saturday, the 19th day of October next, from their usual avocations to the armies, and this, with other causes, produced a scarcity of provisions in France. Induced by this state of things, France opened her ports to neutral commerce, while Great Britain, in the hope of reducing her enemy by famine, determined to cut off all external supplies. Instructions were accordingly issued on the 8th of June, 1793, and renewed on the 6th of November, 1794, by the British Privy Council to the commanders of British ships-of-war and privateers, directing them "to stop and detain all ships laden with goods, the produce of any colony belonging to France, or carrying provisions or other supplies for the use of such colonies, and to bring the same, with their cargoes, to legal adjudication in our Courts of Admiralty."

This Order in Council, which was a most lawless invasion of neutral rights, in a few weeks swept the seas of our commerce. Hundreds of our vessels engaged in the French West India trade were without previous notice captured, and many of our merchants were reduced to bankruptcy. The intelligence of this procedure excited universal indignation throughout the United States. There was a general clamor for war among all parties. Several violent measures were moved and debated in Congress,—among the rest, the sequestration of all British property in the United States for the purpose of indemnifying our merchants. While Congress was engaged in debating on various modes of procuring redress for the outrages committed on American commerce by the English and French nations, President Washington arrested its career by the appointment of Chief Justice John Jay, of New York, as minister extraordinary to the British government. He embarked from New York on the 12th of May, 1794, and on the 19th of May, 1795, he concluded a treaty with Lord Grenville in London, which was submitted to their respective governments for ratification.

This celebrated treaty, which bears Minister Jay's name, was defective in many parts and very objectionable in others; but owing to the troubled state of Europe, it was the best that he could obtain. The ratification of it disturbed the political atmosphere to such an extent that it shook the Union to its foundation, and produced intense excitement throughout the country. On the 1st of June, 1796, at the close of the exciting session of Congress in which Jay's treaty had been the chief topic of debate, Washington retired for partial repose to his home at Mount Vernon. While there he determined to leave public life at the close of his term of office in March following; and, with this object in view, he prepared his "Farewell Address to the People of the United States," to be published in time to enable them to choose his successor at the appointed season. As this hour was drawing near, the President's enemies did everything in their power to prejudice him in the public mind. His most intimate friends knew that he would not consent to a re-election; but his reserve on the subject and the long delay of making public announcement of his determination puzzled the politicians. However, while political and partisan abuse of the grossest kind was being heaped upon the head of the President, his "Farewell Address" appeared. It was made public about the middle of September, 1796, and produced a great sensation throughout the country. For a time the ribald voice of party spirit was subdued in tone, and to detraction and attack succeeded expressions of veneration and love for the author of the Address.

At the Presidential election which succeeded, John Rousby Plater, Francis Deakins, George Murdock, John Lynn, Gabriel Duvall, John Archer, John Gilpin, John Roberts, John Eccleston, and John Done were chosen electors for Maryland. The votes of the Electoral College for President of the United States were opened and counted in the United States Senate on the 8th of February, 1797, and resulted in the election of John Adams as President, and Thomas Jefferson as Vice-President.

The difficulties with France still continued, and created no little public excitement and agitation. Meetings were held in all sections of the country demanding a vigorous policy against France, and approving the firmness with which the new administration seemed about to deal with the important questions involved. Many meetings of this character were held in Western Maryland.
"At a numerous meeting of the citizens of Fredericktown and county, held at the court-house in Fredericktown on Saturday, the 28th of April, 1798, after public notice being given, Thomas Johnson in the chair, Valentine Brother was appointed secretary, and the following resolutions were adopted and ordered to be published:

1st. Resolved unanimously, That the President of the United States is entitled to the thanks of his fellow-citizens for his wise, firm, and patriotic conduct in endeavoring to bring our differences with France to a speedy, amicable, and honorable adjustment; that his instructions to his ministers and their powers of negotiations were ample, candid, and liberal; and that our envoys ought to have experienced a reception very different from the one they have met with.

2d. Resolved unanimously, That our envoys have discharged their duty in a manner calculated to impress their fellow-citizens with the greatest respect for their ability and patriotism, and with gratitude for their services.

3d. Resolved unanimously, That it is our fixed determination to support the Constitution of the United States as now established, and the liberty and independence of America against all foreign nations whatsoever; and we view with the utmost deterrence the attempts made by foreigners to divide the citizens of this country, and to set them at variance with a government of their own choice.

4th. Resolved, That the chairman be requested to invoice the foregoing resolutions to the representative of this district, to be by him laid before the President and the Congress of the United States."

The following reply was received from the President:

"To the Citizens of Fredericktown and County, in the State of Maryland:

"Gentlemen,—A copy of your resolutions of the 23d of April has been presented to me by your Representative in Congress, Mr. Boer.

"The honorable testimony of your thanks to me, of your applause of our envoys, of your determination to support the Constitution and independence of America against all foreign nations, your detestation of the attempts made by foreigners to divide the citizens of this country, and to set them at variance with the government of their choice, would be highly pleasing under all circumstances, and are increased in value to me by having been passed and certified under the auspices of one of the few who remain of my ancient and most respected colleagues in the first councils of the nation.

"John Adams.

"Philadelphia, May 8, 1798."

Washington did not remain long in retirement, for on the 2d of July, 1798, owing to the attempts of the French to degrade the United States into a tributary of France, the indignities offered to the representatives of our government, and the injuries inflicted upon our commerce, President Adams nominated and the Senate confirmed him as "lieutenant-general and commander-in-chief of all the armies raised and to be raised in the United States." At the same time Congress ordered the army to be increased by twelve regiments, four of which were to be raised in Maryland. The difficulties with France were, however, arranged in a manner satisfactory to both governments, and there was no immediate necessity for the services of the troops which had been called for by Congress.1

The unsettled state of our foreign relations, however, served to keep alive the military spirit of the country, and each new difficulty with England or France added fresh fuel to the military ardor of the times. The hardy inhabitants of Western Maryland, always ready for combat, and by reason of their exposed position rather more accustomed to war than peace, needed no urging to prepare themselves for hostilities, and the large number of military organizations in existence at this period in that section of the State shows the eagerness with which they had responded to the call of patriotism. Prominent among these organizations during the years immediately succeeding 1800 were the companies of horse known as the "American Blues," at Hagerstown, Capt. Otho H. Williams' commanding, and the "Washington Hussars," at Williamsport, commanded by Capt. Frishy Tilghman. Hagerstown at the same time also boasted of two infantry companies, viz., the "Select Volunteers" and another commanded by Capt. Timothy Monahan, the battalion being commanded by Maj. John Reynolds. Besides the frequent militia parades, the people were often gratified by visits from detachments of the United States army as they marched westward via Hagerstown, Cumberland, and Wheeling. Among the frequent references to the passage of troops through Western Maryland at this period we find the following paragraph in the columns of the Herald, under date of April 26, 1805: "On Wednesday morning last arrived a small detachment of soldiers, under the command of Capt. McClellan, marched through this town on their way to St. Louis, in Upper Louisiana." In December of the year, 2 Passed

1 From Fredericktown, May 28, 1800.

"On Saturday evening last arrived in this town, on his way to the city of Washington, the President of the United States. He was met near Monocacy by the troop of horse belonging to Frederick County, headed by our Republican Elector, Dr. Tyler, and by Capt. Brother's company of infantry belonging to the Provincial army. Every respect due the office of Chief Magistrate was paid him by our citizens.

"On Sunday the President attended divine worship, performed by the Rev. Mr. Samuel Knox, in the Lutheran Church (it being more spacious than his own), and the subject was happily adapted to the occasion, while a negotiation is pending with France. The happiness and advantages of peace were fully portrayed, and contrasted with the misery and destruction of war, the curse of any nation. The text was Matthew 5th and 9th, "Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God."" through this town on their way to Washington a detachment of troops and a detachment of twenty-two Indian chiefs, who attended the treaty lately held at St. Louis by Gen. Wilkinson and Governor Harrison. They consist of five of the Little Osage nation, two Missouris, seven Sacs and Foxes, one Canzas, two Ayowas, one Pontowatamis, one Sioux, two Panis, and one Altooes.”

During the winter of 1806–7 a company of the Second United States Infantry, Lieut. John Miller commanding, was stationed at Hagerstown.

The War of 1812.

The aggressions of Great Britain—Orders in Council—Attack upon the Chesapeake—Declaration of War—Campaign in Canada—Battle of Bladensburg—Buster-Rolls—War Songs.

President Jefferson was inaugurated the second time as President of the United States on the 4th of March, 1805, and on the 2d of December of the same year the Ninth Congress opened its first session. The message of the President was chiefly devoted to our foreign relations, which it represented as being in an unfavorable condition, owing to the proceedings of France and England, which were then at war. He said,—

“Our coasts have been infested and our harbors watched by private armed vessels, some of them with commissions, some with illegal commissions, others with those of lawful form, but committing piratical acts beyond the authority of their commissions. They have captured in the very entrance of our harbors, as well as in the high seas, not only the vessels of our friends coming to trade with us, but our own also. They have carried them off under pretense of lawful adjudication, but not daring to approach a court of justice, they have plundered and sunk them by the way, or in obscure places where no evidence could arise against them, maltreated the crews, and abandoned them in boats in the open seas or on desert shores without food or covering.”

1 The following is a correct statement of the returns from the different districts of Frederick County, at an election held on Monday, the 12th November, 1804, for Electors of President and Vice-President of the United States:

In the new European war, France, Holland, and Spain were allied against Great Britain, and the exposure to capture of the merchant vessels belonging to these nations had caused their withdrawal from the ocean. The United States and other neutral nations from this cause were enjoying an immensely profitable carrying trade, not only with the colonies of the belligerents, but with the mother-countries, and on principles recognized by Great Britain and the established rule of international law, “that the goods of a neutral, consisting of articles not contraband of war, in neutral vessels, employed in a direct trade between a neutral and belligerent country, are protected, except in ports invested or blockaded.” In conformity to this principle a direct trade was carried on with the enemies of Great Britain and their colonies, and chiefly by American vessels; and not well pleased to see American merchants so rapidly amassing fortunes, and her enemies receiving by American ships the productions of their own colonies without the hazard which would attend transportation in vessels of their own, Great Britain ordered the capture of our vessels, alleging that the trade was unlawful, on the principle that “a trade from a colony to its parent country, not being permitted to other nations in time of peace, cannot be made lawful in a time of war.”

The Attack on the Chesapeake.—While the depredations on our commerce were yet under discussion, three of the crew of the British frigate “Melampus,” engaged with the British squadron in watching some French frigates blockaded at Annapolis, deserted, and enlisted on the United States frigate “Chesapeake,” lately built in Baltimore, and destined to compose part of an American squadron against the Barbary powers. Four separate demands were made for these men, but without success,—one on Lieut. Sinclair, of the “Chesapeake,” one by the British consul on the mayor of Norfolk, one on Capt. Decatur, and one by Lord Erskine, the British minister, on the Secretary of State. The government, willing to be just and anxious for honorable peace, instituted inquiries concerning the deserters, and Commodore Barron, in a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, dated April 7, 1807, thus gives an account of the men:

“William Ware, pressed from on board the brig ‘Neptune,’ Capt. Crafts, by the British frigate ‘Melampus,’ in the Bay of Biscay, has served on board the said frigate fifteen months.

“William Ware is a native American, born on Pipe Creek, Frederick County, State of Maryland, at Bruce’s Mills, and served his time at said mills. He also lived at Ellicott’s Mills, near Baltimore, and drove a wagon several years between Hagerstown and Baltimore. He also served eighteen months on board the United States frigate ‘Chesapeake,’ under the con-mand of Commodore Morris and Capt. James Barron. He is an Indian-looking man.

"John Strachan, born on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, Queen Anne's County, between Centreville and Queenstown. Strachan sailed in the brig 'Martha Bland,' Captain Wyvill, from New York to Dublin, and from thence to Liverpool. He then left the brig and shipped on board an English Guineaman. He was pressed off Cape Finisterre."

The other, a colored man named Martin, was a native of Massachusetts, and was pressed at the same time and place with William Ware. Ware and Strachan had protections, but Martin had lost his. The "Chesapeake" sailed with these men on board, and on the 21st of June, 1807, when at sea, not far from the Capes of Virginia, was overtaken by the British frigate "Leopard," of fifty-six guns, commanded by Capt. Humphreys. The "Chesapeake" carried forty-four guns. Capt. Humphreys sent his boat with a note to Commodore Barron informing him that his commanding officer, Vice-Admiral Berkeley, by instructions dated June 1st, had directed him to take any British deserters on board the "Chesapeake," by force if necessary, and to allow on his part a search for American deserters. Barron, astonished at the insolence of Humphreys and the assumptions of Berkeley, refused permission to search, and stated that he had no deserters on board the "Chesapeake," and that his crew should not be mustered except by their own officers. On the receipt of this answer the "Leopard" opened fire upon the "Chesapeake," and the latter being taken by surprise, and unprepared for action, did not return the fire, and immediately struck her flag. Three men were killed and eighteen wounded upon the unresisting ship. When the American ensign was lowered, several of the British officers went on board, mustered the crew, arrested the three deserters from the "Melampus," and took a fourth named John Wilson, who had deserted from the "Halifax."1

Capt. Humphreys refusing to receive the "Chesapeake" as a prize, she returned to Norfolk. John Hayden, of Baltimore, was wounded in the attack upon the "Chesapeake."

This outrage excited the utmost indignation throughout the United States, and for a time united all parties in the common clamor for reparation of the insult and injury, or for war. Public meetings were held in all the principal cities from Boston to Norfolk, in which the feelings of the people were vehemently expressed.

The citizens of Western Maryland were in nowise behind their fellow-countrymen, and at a meeting held at the court-house in Hagerstown, July 14, 1807, for the purpose of expressing their sentiments "upon the dastardly outrages committed by the British squadron stationed on our coast on the flag and citizens of the United States," Dr. Richard Pindell was called to the chair, and Upton Lawrence was appointed secretary.

After the proclamation of President Jefferson had been read, it was resolved, "That Col. Nathaniel Rochester, Gen. Thomas Sprigg, Samuel Hughes, Jr., Esq., Dr. Richard Pindell, Col. William Fitzhugh, Maj. Charles Carroll, Dr. Frisby Tilghman, Col. George Nigh, Dr. Christian Boerster, Upton Lawrence, Esq., Dr. Jacob Schenbly, Col. Daniel Hughes, Col. Adam Ott, Mr. William Keyser, and Mr. Alexander Neill be appointed a committee to report resolutions expressive of the abhorrence in which this meeting holds the recent conduct of the British squadron near Norfolk, and our determination to support the constituted authorities of our country, in all such measures as they may think proper to adopt for obtaining satisfaction for the insult and murders committed."

The committee having retired for a short time, returned and reported several vigorous resolutions, which were unanimously adopted; and it was ordered that the chairman and secretary of the meeting transmit copies of the resolutions to the President of the United States and the Governor of Maryland, and that they be published in the newspapers of Hagerstown.

The critical situation of our foreign relations during the President to convene the Tenth Congress on the 25th of October, 1807, and in a special message on the 18th of December he recommended to that body the passage of an act laying an embargo on all vessels of the United States. The subject was immediately discussed in Congress in secret session, and an embargo bill passed on the 22d of December, 1807. At this session of Congress measures of defense were adopted, and on the 6th of July the President made a requisition on the States for one hundred thousand men to take the field at a moment's warning. Of this number the Governor of Maryland was authorized to furnish a quota of five thousand eight hundred and sixty-three men, and such was the enthusiasm of the people that double that number volunteered their services to the government.2

1 The unfortunate deserters were taken to Halifax and sentenced to be hung. The three Americans were imprisoned on condition that they should re-enter the British service, but Wilson, the English subject, was hanged. One of the Americans died in captivity in the English navy, and the others, after five years' hard service, were restored to the deck of the "Chesapeake."—Loring, "War of 1812."

2 Among the volunteers was the Third Regiment, commanded by Levy Philips, Montgomery County.
On the 17th of July, in response to the call of the President, the following notice was published in the newspapers of Hagerstown:

"THE SPIRIT OF '78!!!

"When our country demands our aid it is a species of treason to be deaf to her call.

"A meeting of the young men of Washington County is requested at Mr. Smith's tavern on Saturday evening next at four o'clock, for the purpose of forming a volunteer corps, whose services are to be at the command of the President as exigencies may demand, or as the public good may require."

As a result of this meeting, a company known as the "Hagerstown Volunteer Rifle Company" was formed, and the officers chosen were as follows: Capt. John Ragan, Jr., captain; Thomas Post, first lieutenant; and William B. Rochester, second lieutenant. This company was soon after mustered into the United States service for a period of six months, but was not called upon to perform any active duty.

Besides the companies already mentioned, there were in existence at that time those of the Eighth Maryland Militia, commanded respectively by Capts.

1 These officers all became prominent in subsequent years. Col. John Ragan, Jr. was appointed a captain in the United States Army in 1808, and served in that capacity at New Orleans and Camp Terre a Boeuf about eighteen months. In 1810 he returned to his native place (Hagerstown), and upon his marriage resigned his commission in the regular service. He was afterwards appointed by the Executive of Maryland lieutenant-colonel of the Twenty-fourth Regiment of militia, and during the war of 1812 was in command of a regiment of militia at the battle of Bladensburg, where, although his command early in the engagement broke and fled in the utmost disorder, he particularly distinguished himself in his brave efforts to rally his raw and panic-stricken troops, but in the fruitless attempt was thrown from his horse, severely injured, and finally taken prisoner by the enemy. In private life Col. Ragan was generous and upright, a valuable neighbor, and a most worthy, member of society. He died at his residence in Hagerstown, May 4, 1816, in the thirty-fourth year of his age.

Capt. Thomas Post, besides serving as sheriff of Washington County for a number of years, commanded a company of Washington County militia during the war of 1812, and filled most creditably many other public positions.

William B. Rochester was the eldest son of Col. Nathaniel Rochester, and was born in Washington County. He removed to the Genesee country with his father in 1816, and afterwards became one of the most prominent citizens in Western New York. During the war of 1812-14 he served as captain of a company of New York State Volunteers, and with his command was present at Buffalo and its vicinity during the series of war-like operations carried on there. He held many important civil positions in the state of his adoption, and was a man of fine legal acquirements, and much respected for his ability. He was a representative in Congress from New York from 1821 to 1823, and subsequently held the office of circuit judge in New York, but resigned to compete with De Witt Clinton for the office of Governor. He was lost, with many others, off the coast of North Carolina, by the explosion of the steamer "Pulaski," June 15, 1858.

Daniel Hughes, Jr., Henry Lewis, John Abel, Joseph Chapline, George Binkley, John Harry, and others; and this regiment was placed in as efficient condition as possible, as is shown by the following order from its veteran commander, Col. John Carr:

"The officers commanding companies in the Eighth Regiment are requested to make out rolls of their respective companies and attend with them at Hagerstown on Saturday, the 15th inst., which will enable me to make out a regimental return to forward to the brigadier-general. I hope the officers will be accurate in their returns and punctual in their attendance at this interesting crisis, as their injured country calls aloud for the exertions of its citizens."

"John Carr,

"Lieut.-Col. Eighth Regiment.

"Aug. 5, 1807."2

Great exertions were then being made to raise, by volunteering, Maryland's quota of the one hundred thousand militia required for national defense, but it was not until December, 1808, that the requisite number of volunteers was obtained in Washington County. At that time, however, from among the organizations just mentioned, many more than were 2 Thomas Sprigg, who died in December, 1809, and was succeeded by Col. Samuel Ringgold, who assumed command in July, 1810.

3 Aug. 12, 1807, the volunteer company in Frederick was offered by Capt. Henry Steiner, Lieut. John Ritchie, and Ensign Lawrence Breegle.

Aug. 17, 1809, Henry Kemp was elected captain of the first Frederick troop of cavalry. April 19, 1810, Stephen Steiner chose lieutenant-colonel of Sixteenth Regiment Militia. June 13, 1811, the Governor appointed John Cook captain. Otho Sprigg first lieutenant, Nicholas Hall, Jr., second lieutenant, and Joshua Johnson cornet of a troop of horse attached to the Seventh Brigade, Frederick County; Oct. 26, 1811, John Cook chosen captain of New Market Light Dragoons; May 9, 1812, Ezra Mauz was appointed major First Battalion Maryland Militia, and John Ritchie lieutenant-colonel of the Sixteenth Regiment Militia.
wanted signified their readiness to march at a moment's notice. The members of the Washington Hussars met at Rockland, and listened to a spirited address from their commander, Capt. Friebi Tilghman, in which he ably proved the necessity of rallying around the country's standard. He then drew his sword, as a token that he was ready to obey her call. His patriotic example was instantly followed by the rest of the officers, and almost unanimously by the whole of the troopers present. The following resolutions were also adopted by the troop:

"Resolved, That though fully sensible of the blessings of peace where they can be enjoyed without the sacrifice of national honor, yet we consider war a lesser evil than submission to any foreign power under any form or pretence whatever.

"Resolved, That we are ready and willing to offer up our all in defense of the rights or of avenging the wrongs of our much injured country, and therefore make a voluntary tender of our services as a part of the quota called for from Maryland by the President of the United States."

Capt. Tilghman's company enlisted on the 9th of December, and on the 17th of the same month Col. Schnebly's regiment, also Capt. Williams' company of horse, tendered their services to the general government. The editor of the Herald speaks of the event as follows in his issue of the 23d:

"On Saturday, the 17th inst., the Twenty-fourth Regiment of Maryland Militia, under the command of Col. Jacob Schnebly, assisted by Maj. Beard and Reynolds, paraded on its customary ground in the neighborhood of this town. The call by Brig.-Gen. Spring was for volunteers, to the end that a draft might not be made on the citizens whose will might urge them to the field, but whose peculiar circumstances (for the present) admonished them to remain at home. It was with heartfelt gratification we witnessed the patriotic spirit of our regiment in volunteering the whole, and more than the whole, of their proportionate numbers. We will not make invincible distinctions, but we were pleased in noticing some of the companies turning out with Spartan mind a number uncall'd for from among them.

"Capt. O. H. Williams' troop, called 'American Blues,' behaved as we had expected,—all his men on parade (thirty-seven in number) tendered their services. It is said that Capt. Williams is not an admirer of the present administration; but we know that he is friendly to American Independence and honor. 'The times were which tried men's souls,—the times may shortly come which will try men's souls; but, be it as it may, happy and safe are we in our defense.'"

Capt. George Binkley, of the Twenty-fourth Regiment, in addressing his company previously to their volunteering, spoke as follows:

"Citizens! soldiers! You have appeared on this ground today in obedience to the commands of your general, but more especially in obedience to the call of patriotism.

"Dear soldiers! we have a triple call,—our general, our country, but most of all a lively sense of honor and Independence sounds the alarm. Shall we be heedless to these calls? No; as a band of brother patriots we will erect a proud crest against every foe, foreign or domestic.

"Soldiers! your captain and other officers of this company now tender their services to their country. Will you follow them? I know many of you will; then those who are so disposed advance forty paces in front. The God of battles is on our side."

Thereupon twenty-two men of the forty-one present volunteered.

Before the date last mentioned, however, Capt. Ragan's company of riflemen was mustered into the service of the United States as part of its regular force, and in October, 1808, marched from Hagerstown to the barracks at Carlisle, Pa. From thence the company was soon after sent forward to New Orleans, La.

Thus did the people of Western Maryland attest their devotion to their country during the years 1807, 1808, and 1809; but, although British naval officers still continued to impress our seamen, and to offer indignities to the American flag wherever encountered on the high seas, the crisis, as regarded an open rupture with Great Britain, was, in the summer of 1809, considered passed, and the volunteers under pay of the general government were mustered out of service.

There was another feature connected with the history of the period mentioned deserving of notice, perhaps, in this connection,—the original poetic effusions which appeared in the "Poet's Corner" of the newspaper prints of that time. The following were published in the Maryland Herald. Some were written by the Hon. Thomas Kennedy, of Williamsport (afterwards of Hagerstown), who was (if we may use the term) the poet-laureate of Washington County in his day, as well as one of the ablest and best-known writers in the State of Maryland. He also represented Washington County many years in the State Legislature, where he distinguished himself in debate, but more particularly as the originator and champion of the bill abolishing the "religious test," an old law which denied to the Hebrews political rights in common with all other citizens."

2 In 1810 he published a volume entitled

"POEMS.

- Composed on several occasions,
- In usual places and in divers manners.

- By Thomas Kennedy,
- Washington County, Md."

"Ye generous sons of honest Columbia's soil,
'Tis yours to recompense the poet's toil,
'Tis yours to give or to withhold applause,
To weigh his merits and to judge his cause."

The prospectus likewise stated that "the Poems will be printed on good paper, and decently bound and lettered. They “A NEW SONG.

“TUNE,— John Anderson my Jo’

“The Volunteers of Hagers-town, Great praise to them is due,
They’ve tender’d down their services
To face old Britain’s crew,
And every other warlike tribe
That dares to be our foe;
With courage great, fair steps we’ll take Their schemes to overthrow.

“When Britain’s host, some years ago,
Did try us to enslave,
The sons of freedom forward came,
With courage stout and brave;
Though undisciplin’d as they were,
Undauntingly did go Into the field where none would yield,
Revenge for to show.

“Old Georgy’s crew they try’d their best,
Their plans were made to nought,
The Hessians crew, and Dunmore’s too,
They all against us brought;
The savages and all their aids
Were soon reduced so low,
That home they flew, with part their crew,
To let old Georgy know.

are now preparing for the press, and will form a volume of a handsome size. The price to subscribers two dollars each copy, payable on delivery. Those who procure ten subscribers and become responsible for the payment shall have one copy gratis.”

In conclusion he said,—

“When an author makes his first appearance before the public he is apt to think it necessary to state some reasons by way of excuse for his presumption; in the present instance this must be dispensed with. Nor is it now necessary to enter into any commendation of the intended work, its merits are yet to be examined and its worth decided by an impartial tribunal. Suffice it therefore to say that, in the humble opinion of the author, the publication will be found deserving all the encouragement it may receive, and hope promises as favorable a reception as it deserves. If in this he is disappointed, if the present generation treats the labors of his Muse with neglect, like other authors, he must enter an appeal on his behalf to the supreme court of posterity.

“The charms of beauty and the love of liberty first awakened his Muse, and with honest pride he can say that there are none among the numerous pieces in the volume that owe their origin to mean or mercenary motives, and may be cease to be ere he becomes a flatterer, ere he prefers fortune to fame, or the private to the public good.

“Those who intend to become subscribers are requested to do so immediately. And let them all remember that the author does not pretend to the sublime in poetry, his verse is unpolished and chid in homely attire. But if—

“— And flattering hope does this presage—
If in some future time, some distant age,
These strains shall sound some sweet pleasing thrill impart,
For sorrow soothing, or cheer a drooping heart,
For stop a struggling sigh, or check a tear,
He will be blest; such fame is truly dear,
And such the laurels that he bores to wear.”

“Now they’ve begun the second time
Our courage for to try,
So, Volunteers, we’ll all rouse up,
And fight them till we die;
And every tender-hearted soul
That with us cannot go,
May keep behind, some kind of blind,
While we do face the foe.

“America has oft received Insults of every kind,
But Jefferson, that worthy man,
For peace was still inclined;
So their abuse did still increase,
For which we’ll let them know
That we’re prepar’d, and on our guard,
To give them blow for blow.

“So here’s a health to all the Greens,
And every Volunteer
Who is intent, and fully bent
With honor for to steer;
We’ll to a man join hand in hand
To meet our treacherous foe,
With fire and ball we will them Maul,
And drink before we go.

“MR. PRINTER:

“Be so good as to let the following epigram have a place in your Poet’s Corner:

“God in his wrath may often change
A Whig into a Tory;
The circumstance is nowise strange,
‘Tis on record in story.
But no such instance can we show,
That all the Tory race
A Tory once, will still be so,
In spite of God and Grace.

WASHINGTON COUNTY, AUGUST, 1809.”

THE SOLDIER’S CALL.

“A SONG.

“TUNE.— The Soldier’s Return.

“Rouse, rouse, ye brave, ye gallant souls,
Who cherish Independence,
That country you so dearly love
Demands your quick attendance.
Injured, insulted, she has been
By Britain—haughty nation;
Then haste to arms, for honor calls Aid for repairation.

“Remember your forefathers bold,
For freedom who contended,
Who nobly dear Columbia’s cause
With their best blood defended.
O! do not sully their fair fame;
O! tarnish not their glories;
Disrep the deeds, despise the name
And actions of old Tories.

“In infant days Columbia bore
The storms of war unmoved,
For tyrant’s wrath and deep designs
More than a match she proved;
O! who can think upon those times
Nor feel his burns glowing,
Nor feel sensations, sweet, sublime,
His patriot soul overfrowning.

"And if in infancy she failed
The plans of wild ambition,
To her united youthful might Vain will be opposition.
In Him who rules the hosts of Heaven
Her hope, her stay, and trust is,
He will with victory crown the cause
Of liberty and justice.

"Too long has our lov'd country sought,
By mild negotiation,
To have her rights restored in peace,
For wrongs, some compensation.
But patience hitherto has made Her claims be more neglected,
The last resort then must be tried,
She then may be respected.

"Though war we never do desire,
We do not dread its terrors.
Columbia's thunder shall once more Show kindred all its errors.
Her Volunteers will rally round
The starry flag of freedom.
Nor shall Quebec arrest their march,
If heroes only lead 'em.

"Then heat the drum, the trumpet sound,
And let the cannons rattle;
Glory on your swords, your muskets seize,
Be all prepared for battle.
Go forth to conquer or to die,
The cause is good, is glorious,
And sacred Union will ensure
The final end victorious.

"WASHINGTON COUNTY, Jan. 16, 1810."

"THE BIRTHDAY OF WASHINGTON.

"As the blush of the rose in the dew of the morn,
As the beautiful blossoms of Spring,
When snow-drops and hyacinths sweetly adorn
The fields and the forests, and from every thorn Wild warblers their sonnets do sing.

"So sweet's the remembrance of virtue most dear,
Of valor with wisdom combin'd,
Of the patriot sage, whose great name we reverence,
Whose praises with pride and with pleasure we hear,
Whose worth is impressed on each mind.

"O! Washington, when recollection recalls Thy noble, illustrious deeds,
The tear of warm gratitude glistens and falls,
Sublime admiration each bosom entralls,
And in pleasing captivity leads.

"Thy courage, thy prudence, thy patriot zeal,
Thy constancy in truth's great cause,
Thy attention alive to America's weal,
Will furnish forever, while freemen can feel,
Fit themes for their love and applause.

"And O! may foul factions thy hallowed name
To cloak their designs never assume;
Ye assassins pollute not the shrine of his fame,
Lest the blaze of his glory burst forth in a flame
And you with just vengeance consume.

"For who are his friends? Not all they who pretend,
But those who his precepts obey,
Who cherish firm Union, who nobly contend
For the rights of Columbia, and to defend Are ready to act in his way.

"Immortal his actions, his name shall descend
To ages unknown, distant climes;
Far and wide as the earth or the sea does extend,
The friend of his country—the friend of mankind,
Shall be honored in all future times.

"Appalling historians his worth shall relate,
The muses his praise in sweet strains,
His example will fire future warriors to fight,
And patriot statesmen shall read with delight
The instruction his maxims contain,

"But chiefly Columbians his deeds shall inspire,
And their bosoms with ardent inflame,
His story shall pass from the son to the sire,
Even innocent infants will learn to admire,
And prattling lip his dear name.

"For he was the friend of their forefathers brave,
And for them, O! what toils he endured,
His greatest ambition his country to save,
Or find in her wreck and her ruin a grave—
How blest when his aim was secured!

"And sooner shall sink in the midst of the main Columbia, earth's favorite spot,
Of old Allegany no vestige remain,
And time to eternity yield up the rein,
Ere Washington can be forgot.

"Yea, even when time and when space are no more,
When the sun and the stars cease to shine,
His fame, like the sovereign eagle, shall soar
Bright worlds unknown, and immortal explore,
And rank high in the regions divine."

"THE WASHINGTON HUSSARS."

"A SONG.

"To—Hall Columbia."

"Ye brave Hussars who nobly stand, Prepare to guard with sword in hand
The laws and rights you hold so dear,
The laws and rights you hold so dear,
Who bear the high, immortal name
Of Washington, the great in fame,
Like him, undaunted, meet the foe,
Like his, may all your bosoms glow
With liberty's celestial fire,
The godless freemen most admire.

"Chorus.—When the trumpet sounds attend,
Fear not danger, death, nor scars,
As like Washington Hussars.

"With Honor, Friendship full in view,
The path of glory still pursue.
Of cherish union's sacred ties,
Of cherish union's sacred ties,
For freedom ev'ry danger dare,
Your country's weal your constant care,
For her no peril ever shun,
For her no duty leave undone,
For her no sacrifice refuse,
Nor life itself regret to lose.
"Chorus.—When the trumpet, etc.

"Your fathers bold, they knew not fear,
Their names, their deeds will long be dear.
Hark! from the tomb their spirits cry,
Hark! from the tomb their spirits cry,
'Shall coward sons our glory stain,
And have we bled and died in vain?'
No, Rest in peace, ye truly brave,
And let green hollows round you wave,
The flame of freedom still inspire,
The sons are worthy of their sires.
"Chorus.—When the trumpet, etc.

"Hussars, in arms you're not alone,
The Blues are, too, of Washington,
And they, like you, are volunteers,
And they, like you, are volunteers.
With you as friends they will unite
At the feast or in the fight.;
With you, the foe they will engage,
And in the battle's hottest rage
Hussars and Blues shall firmly join
And force the enemy's strongest line.
"Chorus.—To the charge when trumpets call,
On each side, when thousands fall,
Laugh at danger, death, and scars,
Act like Blues, and like Hussars.

"And O! how blest, the battle o'er,
When war's alarms are heard no more,
When beauty bids you welcome home,
When beauty bids you welcome home,
And with approving, sweetest smiles,
Repay your troubles and your toils,
From your lov'd country then you'll hear
Such praise as this to charm your ear:
'None were distinguished in the wars
More than the Washington Hussars.'
"Chorus.—When the trumpet sounds attend,
Your dear country to defend;
And in love, in peace, or wars Act like Washington Hussars."

"THE AMERICAN BLUES."
"A SONG."
"TUNE.—To Anacreon in Heaven."

"Ye American Blues, who have gallantly drawn Your swords in defense of the rights of the Union,
Whose glory is bright as the sun at the dawn,
Whose souls are all joined in sweet, sacred communion,
Let honor still guide,
With truth at her side!
May valor and wisdom with pleasure preside,
And furnish for ages a theme for the Muse,
Be worthy the name of American Blues!"

1 Capt. O. H. Williams' company of Hagerstown.

"The rich vale you inhabit receiv'd its dear name
From Washington, he who in arms was victorious, Whose actions immortal, whose talents and fame
Shine brightly and pure, with a lustre most glorious,
That loved name when you hear
Will banish all fear.
Like him, . . . may yours be a noble career,
And furnish for ages a theme for the Muse
Deserving the name of American Blues!

"Remember the heroes in Liberty's cause,
Who fought and who bled with a brave resolution,
Their patriot names with deserved applause
Will be gratefully honor'd till Time's dissolution.
Like them, O! be brave, Independence to save,
And swear that no despot this soil shall enslave,
And furnish for ages a theme for the Muse
Deserving the name of American Blues!

"The tyrants of Europe, e'en should they combine,
Can ne'er conquer freemen whose bosoms are glowing With liberty's flame, and whose hands ever join
In supporting the cause . . . with a zeal overflowing.
Then let Britain or France,
Or both, e'er advance.
They will fall 'neath the stroke of America's lance,
And furnish for ages a theme for the Muse
And prove that Americans all are True Blues!

"And, troopers, see where a brave squadron appears,
The Hussars who bear Washington's name, too, assemble;
Should war e'er approach, you are all volunteers,
And united will make every enemy tremble.
When the trumpets do sound,
And your foes bite the ground,
The Blues and the Hussars shall together be found,
And furnish for ages a theme for the Muse
Deserving the name of Hussars and of Blues!

"Returning with glory, received with regard,
As troopers who faithfully have done their duty;
How blest when enjoying the noble reward
That you'll meet from the eye, from the sweet smile of beauty!
The fav'rites of Mars,
All covered with scars,
The American Blues will return from the wars,
And furnish for ages a theme for the Muse
Deserving the name of American Blues!

"Columbus, our country, oh, pure be thy peace!
Thy freedom be lasting as old Allegany!
The bonds of thy Union in strength still increase,
Thy foes few and feebly, thy friends firm and many.
While foremost among
The patriot throng
May the Blues be seen rushing undaunted along,
And furnish for ages a theme for the Muse Deserving the name of American Blues!"

"A SONG."
"Come, all ye hearts of temper'd steel,
Come, leave your flocks and farms,
Your sports, your plays, and holy-days,
And haste away to arms."
A soldier is a gentleman,
His honor is his life,
And he that won't stand by his post
Will ne'er stand by his wife!
And be that won't, etc.

"Sure, love and honor are the same,
Or are so near allied
That neither can exist alone,
But flourish side by side,
Then farewell, sweethearts, for awhile,—
Our sweet, dear girls, adieu,—
But when we've drove those foes away
We'll come and stay with you!
But when, etc.

"We'll chase our foes from post to post,
Attack their camp and lines,
And by some well-contrived schemes
We'll haffle their designs.
No foreign power shall make us slaves,
No British tyrant reign,
'Twas our fathers' prowess made us free,
And freedom we'll maintain,
'Twas our fathers' prowess, etc.

"In shady tents, by curling streams,
With hearts both firm and free,
We'll drive the cares of life away
With songs of liberty;
And when the wars are over, boys,
We'll sit us down at ease,
We'll plow, we'll sow, we'll reap and mow,
And do just as we please,
We'll plow, we'll sow, etc.

"This rising world shall sing of us
Ten thousand years to come,
And children to their children tell
The wonders we have done;
Brave, honest fellows, here's my hand,
My heart, my very soul,
With all the joys of liberty,
Our sweethearts and our bowls,
With all the joys of liberty,
Our good wives and our bowls!"

WASHINGTON COUNTY, 1812."

During the days of Federalism Washington County was one of the Republican strongholds of Maryland, and upon the inauguration of President Madison, March 4, 1809, a large number of her citizens convened at the court-house (which then occupied the present public square in Hagerstown) for the purpose of rejoicing and celebrating the event.

The day was ushered in by the ringing of bells, martial music, and the firing of cannon. At twelve o'clock William L. Brent delivered an address to the meeting, and recommended the propriety of adopting resolutions expressive of their sentiments upon the political situation of the country. Col. Nathaniel Rochester was appointed chairman, and William L. Brent secretary of the meeting, when, upon motion, it was

"Resolved, That Col. David Schencky, Dr. Christian Boerstler, Mr. H. Gaither, Mr. M. Collins, Col. Samuel Ringgold, Col. Adam Ott, Col. Jacob Schencky, Col. N. Rochester, and Dr. Wm. Downey be a committee to prepare and report resolutions for the consideration of this meeting. All of which having been done, and a resolution passed that the full proceedings of the meeting be transmitted to Mr. Madison, President of the United States, it was further resolved, "That William L. Brent, Esq., Maj. Martin Kibben, Col. Jacob Schencky, Capt. Henry Lewis, and Col. Nathaniel Rochester be a committee to prepare and report a suitable address to the late President of the United States, Thomas Jefferson, upon his retiring from office."

Having expressed their sentiments as to the situation of their country, the vast concourse present then partook of a feast prepared for the occasion. The table was furnished with the best viands and vegetables that the season would afford; and among many excellent meats which were dressed, a large bullock was spitted and roasted whole. After dinner the following toasts were drank amidst the loud acclamations of the people and the roaring of cannon, fired at intervals between the toasts:

"1. The day we celebrate, which placed the destinies of this country, eight years ago, in the hands of our worthy and beloved fellow citizen, Thomas Jefferson, late President of the United States, and a Republican majority in Congress, and this day in the hands of James Madison, his successor, and a greater Republican majority in Congress.
"2. James Madison, President of the United States, the patriot, statesman, and uniform friend of the people, may he show to the world, and particularly to disorganizers and traitors, that a republic is not only the best but the strongest government in existence.
"3. The patriotic members of the late Congress who would not forfeit their country's rights for a tributary commerce, nor be driven from their duty by a weak and unprincipled faction.
"4. The heads of departments, superior in wisdom and integrity to the ministers and councils of European potentates.
"5. The militia of the United States, the grand bulwark of American liberty and independence.
"6. The army and navy of the United States, composed of patriots and not mercenaries.
"7. The memory of Gen. George Washington, the father of his country, may his valiantly addressed be ever remembered, and the advice therein given to his countrymen be better observed than it recently has been by the Essex Junta and other British advocates in the United States.
"8. Thomas Jefferson,—well done, thou good and faithful servant,—may your patriotic and useful labors for our common country be a guide to present and future statesmen in conducting the political affairs of this happy land of freedom, and may your remaining days, in the retirement you have chosen, be peaceful and happy, until you partake of the joys above with other benefactors of mankind.
"9. The patriotic Governor of Massachusetts (Levi Lincoln) and other friends to their country in that State, who have declared their determination to support the laws and reduce to order a daring faction that has reared its head in favor of anarchy and confusion, with a view to dissolve the union of these United States.
"10. John Quincy Adams, William Gray, and William L. Smith, who have proved themselves friends to their country by seceding from their party and supporting the measures of their government when they discovered the machinations of the Exsex Junta, in conjunction with a foreign power, were exciting opposition to the laws, with a view to destroy the best government in the world.

“11. The agriculture of the United States, may it never pay tribute to a foreign power to gratify the avarice or ambition of the dishonest part of our merchants.

“12. The manufactures of the United States, may they soon be capable of furnishing substitutes for those of foreign powers.

“13. Commerce, unshackled by foreign orders or decrees, but no foreign commerce subject to tribute.

“14. Peace with all the world, if to be had on honorable terms, but no alliance with any power while they disregard the law of nations, and war, with all its privations and other evils, rather than disgraceful submission to French decrees or British Orders of Council.

“15. The friends of the government throughout the United States, their numbers and firmness, will support the laws and appall the spirit of faction.

“16. A speedy passage to Europe of Tories and apostate Whigs, where they may enjoy their favorite government of master and vassals.

“17. The fair daughters of America, may they smile on the defenders of their country’s liberty and laws, and leave in the forborn state of celibacy towards and the enemies of their own country.”

In the evening a more brilliant illumination took place than had ever been witnessed in Hagerstown upon a like occasion. A band of music paraded the streets with a large lantern, exhibiting on the four sides a portrait of President Madison and figures emblematic of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, which was carried by some of the most prominent men of the county. However, among the many individual illuminations and displays of transparent paintings, the one which attracted universal attention and applause was an elegant full-length portrait of James Madison, which was displayed in a large door in the second story of Capt. Henry Lewis’ residence.

During the years of Madison’s administration, from March, 1809, to June, 1812, the English continued their insults, aggressions, and depredations. Our harbors were insulted and outraged, our commerce swept from the ocean, our seamen impressed into British fleets, scourged and slaughtered, fighting the battles of those who held them in bondage, and studied indignities were offered to our national flag wherever displayed. All efforts for redress from the British government had failed, and at length (acting in accord with a majority of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States) the President issued his proclamation declaring war against Great Britain on the 18th day of June, 1812.

Anticipating this event, however, and determined to place the militia of the State in as effective condition as possible, the Legislature, by an act approved Jan. 18, 1812, provided that the State be divided into eleven regimental (cavalry) districts and one extra squadron. In the formation of these districts, Washington and Frederick Counties were to constitute the first, while Allegany County was to furnish the extra squadron, which (for the time being, or until a regiment could be formed in that county) was attached to the first regimental district.

In February following, Capt. Frisky Tilghman was appointed lieutenant-colonel in command of this regiment, while Capt. O. H. Williams was appointed major of the same. Thereupon, to fill the vacancy in the “Blues” occasioned by the promotion of Capt. Williams, a meeting was held at Strauss’ tavern, in Hagerstown, Feb. 25, 1812, when Moses Tabbs was elected captain, Jacob Barr first lieutenant, David Clagett second lieutenant, and David Newcomer cornet. At about the same time Edward Greene Williams (brother of Maj. O. H., and both sons of Gen. Otho H. Williams, of Revolutionary fame) was appointed to the command of the Hussars, vice Capt. Frisky Tilghman promoted.

To add to the military excitement, Lieut. John Miller, of the United States army, established a recruiting station at Hagerstown during the same month. The inducements held out by him to encourage enlistments were as follows:

“Every able-bodied man from the age of eighteen to thirty-five years who shall be recruited for the army of the United States for the term of five years will be paid a bounty of sixteen dollars; and whenever he shall have served the term for which he enlisted, and obtained an honorable discharge, he will be allowed, in addition to the aforesaid bounty, three months’ pay and one hundred and sixty acres of land; and in case he should be killed in action or die in the service his heirs and representatives will be entitled to the said three months’ pay and one hundred and sixty acres of land.

1 The final vote was carried in the Senate by nineteen to thirteen, and in the House of Representatives by seventy-nine to forty-nine. In the House of Representatives the Maryland delegates voted as follows: In the affirmative—Stevenson Archer, Joseph Kent, Peter Little, Alexander McKim, Samuel Ringgold, and Robert Wright. In the negative—Charles Goldsborough, Philip Barton Key, and Philip Stuart. In the Tippecanoe, visited Hagerstown, Friday, Feb. 28, 1812, and as a mark of respect due to him for his undaunted conduct in that battle a dinner was given by the citizens. After drinking to seventeen regular toasts, the following "volunteers" were added:

By Col. Boyd:

"The Militia of Maryland—Energetic Men and Measures."

After Col. Boyd had retired, Maj. O. H. Williams gave the following:

"Col. John P. Boyd—a hero of Tippecanoe. His services are recorded in our hearts, and may his example stimulate the honor of every soldier."

By Col. John Ragan:

"The New Army—

Be the sword of our vengeance erected on high,
And forever be it waved for Columbia's cause;
May its bright, dazzling beam when flashed to the sky
Be quenched in the blood of her foes."

In leaving the town on his way to the seat of government Col. Boyd was escorted a short distance by the American Blues and the command of Capt. Tabbs.

As a rule the county gave a warm support to the war, although a majority was evidently against its declaration; but when once begun the great body of the people rallied in its favor. Still there were some who steadily opposed it as unwise and unnecessary. At a district-meeting of the friends of peace, at New Windsor, now Carroll County, on July 28, 1812, it was recommended that each district in the county appoint a committee to meet in general committee at the "Washington Hotel," August 12th. Col. Joshua Gist, Curtis Williams, and John Mittens were appointed for Westminster. At a similar meeting in Liberty (Frederick County) District, of which F. B. Sappington was chairman and Samuel Thomas was secretary, the following were appointed a committee, to meet in general committee: Gen. R. Cumming, Col. Henry Barrick, D. D. Howard, John Daddan, Joshua Delaplane, Sebastian Groff, Dennis Poole. Until the third week of August, 1812, the people of Frederick Town witnessed but little of the war movements. On August 17th a troop of cavalry, enlisted in Virginia and commanded by Capt. White, passed through en route to Trenton, N. J.; and on the 20th, Capt. Worthington's company of drafted militia from the town and neighborhood marched for Annapolis. These men were to supply the place of a part of the Fifth United States Regiment ordered to the North. Capt. Worthington was escorted out of town by the companies commanded by Capts. Henry and Stephen Steiner. On August 25th there arrived in Frederick the Hagerstown Volunteers, under Capt. Thomas Quantrell, who two days later left for the front. They were a part of the State's quota ordered in compliance with the Secretary of War's request for three hundred and fifty men for the defense of Annapolis.

Meantime the most strenuous exertions were being put forth by the executive (Governor Winder) to place upon a war footing the infantry commands of the State militia; also to furnish the State's quota of six thousand men, and to organize, arm, and equip the latter ready for service at a moment's warning. Gen. Samuel Ringgold's Second Brigade of the Third Division (Maj. Thomas B. Pottinger, Brigade Inspector) was at this time composed of Lieut.-Col. David Schenley's Eighth Regiment (Majs. John McClain and Christian Hager), Lieut.-Col. Daniel Malott's Tenth Regiment, Lieut.-Col. John Ragan's Twenty-fourth Regiment, and Maj. O. H. Williams' squadron of horse,—i.e., the "Blues" and "Hussars." Among the company commanders of militia infantry were Capts. Thomas B. Hall (of the "Washington Rangers"), David Cusawa, Joseph Hunter, Wherritt, Stonebraker, Miller, Stevens, Chaplin, Lewis, and Blackford.

Volunteering progressed favorably during the spring and summer months of 1812, and the quota of Washington County was filled without resorting to a draft. On Monday, Aug. 21, 1812, the "Home-spun Volunteers" of Hagerstown, under command of Capt. Thomas Quantrell, marched en route to Fort Madison, Annapolis, escorted for several miles by Capt. Tabbs' troop (the "Blues") and many enthusiastic citizens; and on the 31st of the same month Capt. Parker's detachment of United States troops passed through Williamsport and Hagerstown on their march to Albany, N. Y. They were placed at Williamsport, Gen. Samuel Ringgold, Col. Prisy Tillman, and Capt. E. G. Williams forming the reception committee, and the "Hussars" doing escort duty. The general government was then concentrating all of its available regular force on the Canadian frontier, and in April, 1813, a detachment of three hundred and twelve regulars from Virginia, under command of Lieut.-Col. James Preston, passed through Hagerstown on their march to Black Rock, in the vicinity of Buffalo, N. Y.

In March, 1813, Maj. Williams' squadron, the "Blues" and the "Hussars," were ordered to Annapolis, where they performed duty for a brief period; and in May of the same year companies of volunteers, under the command of Capt. Wherritt, of Funkstown, Capt. Miller, of Sharpsburg, Capt. Stevens, of Hancock, and Capt. Bell, of Allegany County, proceeded to Baltimore.

On May 8, 1813, Capt. Steiner's artillery and Capt. Dawson's infantry companies left Frederick for Baltimore to aid in the defense of that city, then threatened by the British. Two days previous Capt. Plant's rifle and Capt. Samuel Ogle's infantry companies had gone to the same rendezvous. On the 9th two other companies from Washington and Allegany Counties passed through Frederick for Baltimore. On the 7th thirteen wagons loaded with specie arrived at Frederick from Baltimore. On the 10th of May thirty-seven regulars left Frederick under Ensign W. G. Shade, who had all been recruited in the county. On May 19th about a hundred militia from various parts of Frederick County went to Annapolis. On the 3d of July a general discharge took place of the troops called for the defense of Baltimore, who were highly excited in a general order, particularly Capt. Henry Steiner's company of artillery, which arrived home on the 5th. On the 6th the companies of Capt. Samuel Dawson and of Capt. Miller, of Sharpsburg, and also most of the troops of Washington and Allegany Counties, returned. On the 16th of September, Capt. Marker's fine company of "Mountain Rangers," which had been summoned to Annapolis, passed through Frederick on route home. On October 21st there was a grand illumination in Frederick in honor of the victory of the American arms in Canada. In 1814 the entire militia of the county went again to the defense of Baltimore, and many participated in the bloody engagement at North Point. Large numbers of the citizens of Frederick County entered the regular service of the United States, and served with honor on the Western frontiers and the Canada line.¹

While these events were transpiring in the State the sons of Western Maryland were winning fame on the Canadian frontier. The projected invasion of Canada in 1812 resulted in the battle of Queenstown, in which the Maryland troops under Col. Winder bore a conspicuous part. The expedition resulted in a failure, however, which Gen. Smythe attempted to stone for by organizing another for the same object. He gave orders on the 25th of November, 1812, for "the whole army to be ready to march at a moment's warning." Everything being in readiness, an advance was embarked near Buffalo, in two divisions, at three o'clock on the morning of the 29th.

The first division, under the command of Lieut.-Col. Charles G. Boerstler,² with about two hundred men of Col. Winder's regiment, in eleven boats, was to cross the river at a point about five miles below Fort Erie, capture the guard stationed there, kill or take the artillery horses, and with the prisoners, if any, return to the American shore. The second division was under the command of Capt. King, who with one hundred and fifty regular soldiers, and seventy sailors under Lieut. Angus, in ten boats, was to cross higher up the river at the "Red House," and storm the British batteries. Col. Winder was to remain on the American side to give directions.

At the appointed hour the boats started for their respective destinations. King's division, when within about a quarter of a mile from the shore, was discovered by the enemy, who opened upon him with such good effect as to compel six of his boats to return. The other four made good their landing, and forthwith carried the British batteries by storm. But the enemy came upon them from distant stations, and with no more help from Gen. Smythe, these gallant men were soon overpowered, Sailing-master Watts killed, and their commander taken prisoner, the rest getting back to the American side of the river in great confusion.

Col. Boerstler and his party mean time had been placed in great danger. The firing upon King had aroused the enemy all along the river-bank, and they were moving rapidly to the attack. Mr. Lossing, the historian, in his account of this movement, says,—

"Boerstler's boats became separated in the darkness. Seven of them landed above the bridge to be destroyed, while four others that approached the designated landing-place were driven off by a party of the enemy. Boerstler landed boldly alone, under fire from a foe of unknown numbers, and drove them to the bridge at the point of the bayonet. Orders were then given for the destruction of that structure, but owing to the confusion at the time of landing, the axes had been left in the boats. The bridge was only partially destroyed, and one great object of this advance party of the invading army was not accomplished.

"Boerstler was about to return to his boats and re-cross the river, because of the evident concentration of troops to that point in overwhelming numbers, when he was compelled to form his lines for immediate battle. Intelligence came from the commander of the boat-guard that they had captured two

THE WAR OF 1812.

British soldiers, who informed them that the whole garrison at Fort Erie was approaching, and that the advance guard was not five minutes distant. This intelligence was correct. Darkness covered everything, and Boerstler resorted to stratagem when he heard the trump of the approaching foe. He gave commanding orders in a loud voice, addressing his subordinates as field-officers. The British were deceived. They believed the Americans to be in much greater force than they really were. A collision immediately ensued in the gloom. Boerstler ordered the discharge of a single volley, and then a bayonet charge. The enemy broke and fled in confusion, and Boerstler recrossed the river without annoyance.

Disaster awaited the gallant Boerstler, however, for in June, 1813, he encountered an overwhelming force of the enemy at Beaver Dam, Canada, and after an engagement of three hours' duration was forced to surrender, or sacrifice the lives of the survivors of his brave command. The following letter, written the day after the fight, and addressed to his father, will prove interesting:

"HEAD OF LAKE ONTARIO.
"UPPER CANADA, June 25, 1813.
"Dear Father,—It becomes my unfortunate lot to inform you that yesterday I was taken prisoner with a detachment under my command amounting to near five hundred men, after an engagement of about three hours. I lost not many killed, about forty wounded, and five or six officers,—myself a flesh-wound of no consequence. I am on my way to Kingston, and shall write to you every opportunity. The officers under my command must say whether your son did his duty. I need only state to you that I was seventeen miles from Fort George, and surrounded on all sides by more than my numbers, and the enemy's force increasing, while mine was constantly diminishing; ammunition nearly exhausted, men wearied with a march of ten miles without a mouthful of refreshment; then the engagement, and then to fight our way back the whole distance surrounded by woods filled with Indians. On the score of humanity I determined to capitulate, as it was extremely doubtful whether a man of us would reach Fort George. What I say above will be sufficient for you; my country must apply to those under my command.

"Your son,
"Charles.

"Col. Scott will please seal and forward the above."

"Dear Sir,—I pray you to believe that your son is not condemned for being unfortunate.

"Respectfully, sir,
"Your most obedient servant,
"W. Scott.

"Dr. C. BOERSTLER."

On the 20th of July, 1813, the Buffalo Gazette published the following account of Col. Boerstler's fight at Beaver Dam:

"On Wednesday night last, Maj. C. Chapin arrived in this village, having, together with his company, escaped from the enemy on Monday preceding. The major has given as the following narration of the action at Beaver Dam, which we now lay before the public.

"On the 22d of June last a party of the regular troops, consisting of five hundred infantry and twenty light dragoons, under the command of Lieut.-Col. C. G. Boerstler, together with forty-four mounted riflemen, composed of militia from the country, under Maj. Chapin, were detached from the American encampment at Fort George, for the purpose of cutting off the supplies of the enemy, and breaking up the small encampments they were forming through the country. On the 24th, about nine miles west of Queenstown, they were attacked by a body of above five hundred Indians and nearly one hundred British regulars, who lay concealed in the woods near the road they were passing. The attack commenced on the dragoons, who were placed in the rear. The infantry was soon brought into a position to return the enemy's fire to advantage, and succeeded in driving them some distance into the woods.

"In a short time the Indians, having taken a circuitous route, appeared in front, and opened a fire upon the mounted riflemen who were stationed there. Here they met with so warm a reception that they were compelled a second time to retreat in much haste. After this every exertion was made to draw the Indians from the woods to the open ground, but without much effect. The few who were bold enough to venture were handled so roughly that they soon returned to their lurking-places. Meanwhile the enemy were receiving considerable reinforcements, which at length gave them a great superiority. A retreat for a short distance was ordered, and effected with very little loss. The Indians soon made their appearance upon our right and left, the British regulars and some Canadian militis in front. Our troops were forced into close columns for the purpose of opening themselves a way through the enemy's lines with their bayonets.

"At this juncture a British officer rode up and demanded the surrender of the American party. The demand was made, he said, to prevent the further effusion of blood. He asserted upon his honor, and declared in the most solemn manner, that the British regular force was double that of the American, and that the Indians were seven hundred in number. Lieut.-Col. Boerstler, under a belief of these facts, and thinking it impracticable to get off the wounded, whom he was unwilling to abandon to the mercy of the savages, and deeming it extremely uncertain whether a retreat could be effected, thought proper to agree to terms of capitulation, which were at length signed by himself on the one part, and Lieut. Bishop on the other. By these it was stipulated that the wounded should be taken good care of, the officers permitted to retain their side-arms, private property to be respected, and the militia permitted to return home immediately.

"The articles of capitulation were no sooner signed than they were violated. The Indians immediately commenced their depredations, and plundered the officers of their side-arms. The soldiers, too, were stripped of every article of clothing to which the savages took a fancy, such as hats, coats, shoes, etc. It is impossible to give any correct account of the killed and wounded, as the enemy did not furnish a list. The loss of the enemy is supposed to be much greater than ours. Between thirty and forty Indians were counted that lay dead on the field, and from their known practice of carrying off their killed and wounded, it is believed they have suffered severely.

"The regular troops were in a few days sent to Kingston, from whence it is probable they have proceeded to Quebec.

"Maj. Chapin and his corps were detained under guard at the head of Lake Ontario, and no attention paid to that article of capitulation which provided for their being paroled. On the 12th in-tant they were ordered down the lake to Kingston, for which place they were embarked in two boats, accompanied by a guard of fifteen men under a lieutenant. Thirteen of the guard, with the lieutenant, were stationed in the forward boat with Maj. Chapin and the other officers, while the remaining two (a sergeant and one private) took the direction of the other boat which contained the soldiers. An agreement had been entered into by the prisoners—previous to their departure—of seizing the first opportunity that offered to regain their liberty, which they determined to effect or die in the attempt.

"When they were within twelve miles of York (now known as Toronto), the boat which was filled with the prisoners was rowed by them alongside the other, under pretense of taking something to drink. The signal being given they sprang upon the guard, who little expected such a manoeuvre, and in a moment disarmed them and gained possession of the boats. They immediately changed their course from Kingston to Fort Niagara, and after rowing hard for most of the night, and with difficulty escaping from one of the enemy's schooners which gave them chase, arrived in safety with their prisoners at the American garrison.

"When the major and his company arrived in this village they were welcomed with many demonstrations of the public feeling."

Notwithstanding the friendly assurances of Col. Scott, there were those who basely misrepresented Col. Boerstler's conduct on the occasion alluded to, and his character as an officer and soldier was most shamefully traduced. That these aspersions upon the name and fame of a brave and generous spirit were without foundation, were the emanations of such creatures as fight best on dress-parade, or of insignificant newspaper scribblers who never fight, was shown by his complete exoneration by a court of inquiry, as also by the following extract from a letter written by an officer of rank and distinction in the army (and who was with Col. Boerstler at the time of his surrender) to his friend and brother-officer in Virginia:

"You have seen, no doubt, in the newspapers an account of Boerstler's unfortunate affair, and on my return to Fort George I found to my great mortification that the public prints had handles him very roughly. Never was there a man more unjustly censured. The blame ought to rest with Gen. Dearborn, who ordered him to go on so foolish an expedition from the information he received from lying deserters.

"However, we fought them three hours and twelve minutes at close action, against almost double our force. Boerstler was struck with four bullets, one of which wounded him in the thigh. I was twice in the heat of the action, and my horse received two wounds while I was on him, but Providence protected me. I could not but admire Boerstler's coolness, when, enveloped in smoke, he rode from right to left encouraging the men (who, by the by, fought like devils) to charge them; and as often as we charged did the British and Indians retreat. At length, overthrown by numbers, having seventy-three killed and wounded, and knowing we could receive no reinforcements in time, and being surrounded, the British sent in a flag demanding us to surrender, which Boerstler peremptorily refused.

"The British officer then offered to let any officer go and see his force, and pledged his honor that he had double that of ours. Col. Boerstler sent Karney, who returned, and gave it as his opinion they had nearly double our force; it was impossible for us to retreat, and if we attempted it our wounded would be massacred by the Indians. It was then determined, in a council of war, to surrender. You can guess what was the mortification of your friend Boerstler and mine at such a time. Boerstler wished ten thousand bullets through him, and I wished I was in hell."

Returning to the seat of war in the State of Maryland, we find that nothing of importance occurred wherein Western Maryland men were represented during the remainder of the year 1813. But in July, 1814, when the British, under Admiral Cockburn and Gen. Ross, threatened all points along the Chesapeake Bay and its adjoining waters, Lieut.-Col. John Ragan, Jr., with more than one hundred volunteers obtained from the ranks of his regiment (the Twenty-fourth Militia), marched from Hagerstown to Baltimore, where he was joined a few days later by one hundred and twenty more from the same command. Among the company commanders were Capt. George Shryock, of Hagerstown, Capt. Gerard Stonebreaker, of Funkstown, and Capt. Henry Lowry.

Allegany's quota towards filling the State's requisition was readily supplied, there being a considerable degree of enthusiasm manifested. Two companies of infantry were formed in the county, one under Capt. William McLaughlin, and the other under Capt. Thomas Blair. The first was made up in the lower part of the county, while Capt. Blair's company was composed largely of citizens of Cumberland. Capt. McLaughlin's company marched to Baltimore in August, 1814, and joined the First Regiment of Maryland Militia, under Col. John Ragan, on the 11th of August, serving until October 13th, when it was mustered out, returned to the county and disbanded.

The company formed in Cumberland was made up of excellent material. By frequent drills it attained a state of enviable discipline and proficiency. It marched to Baltimore in the latter part of August, and was in the service of the government as part of the national army from Sept. 2 to Nov. 6, 1814, which time was spent at Camp Diehl near Baltimore.

Battle of Bladensburg.—Early in August, 1814, Maj. O. H. Williams' squadron of cavalry (of Col. Frishby Thrallman's regiment), composed of the American Blues, Capt. Jacob Barr, and the Washington Hussars, Capt. Edward G. Williams, well mounted, armed, and equipped, marched from Hagerstown for the lower counties. They proceeded first to Georgetown, and thence to Washington, D. C., where they encamped at "Camp Stuart," until a short time before the battle of Bladensburg. On the 16th of August two hundred and seventy militia from Allegany County passed through Hagerstown en route to Baltimore, where they joined Col. Ragan's regiment. Thus were included, in the commands already mentioned, all or nearly all of the volunteers and militia from Washington County who participated in the disastrous "battle of Bladensburg," which was fought in the afternoon of Aug. 24, 1814.

Before proceeding to give an account of this battle, to obviate the necessity of tedious interruptions or repetitions, we will give a brief description of the troops which Gen. Winder had collected for the defense of Washington. The first in order were the troops of the District of Columbia, composed of militia and volunteer companies of Washington and Georgetown, formed into two regiments, the first commanded by Col. Magruder, the second by Col. William Brent. These, with two companies of light artillery, having each six six-pound guns, and commanded respectively by Maj. George Peter, an officer of distinguished ability, and Capt. Benjamin Burch, a soldier of the Revolution, and two companies of riflemen, armed with muskets, under Capts. Doughty and Stull, were organized into a brigade, which was commanded by Gen. Walter Smith, of Georgetown. These troops, well disciplined and officered, and comprising some of the most respectable inhabitants of the District, marched from Washington on the 20th of August for the scene of action, and numbered about one thousand and seventy men.

Gen. Robert Young organized another brigade of District militia, consisting of volunteer companies from Alexandria and its vicinity, a company of cavalry, under Capt. Thornton, and a company of light artillery, with two brass six-pounders and one brass four-pounder, commanded by Capt. Marsteller. This brigade numbered about five hundred men, and reported to Gen. Winder on the 18th of August. They were not engaged at the battle of Bladensburg, having been employed to defend the approach to Fort Washington.

As soon as the enemy appeared in the Chesapeake, the President called the Third Brigade of Maryland militia into active service, and on the 19th of August, Gen. Samuel Smith, who commanded the defenses in Baltimore, ordered them to hold themselves in readiness, "completely armed and equipped," to march at a moment's notice. On the following day, Gen. Tobias Stansbury's brigade, composed of two regiments of militia, one of about five hundred and fifty men, under Lieut.-Col. John Ragan, Jr. (late captain of United States Rifles), and another of eight hundred and three men, under Lieut.-Col. Schutz, marched out of Baltimore. This force halted at the Stag Tavern on the evening of the 21st, and on the 22d advanced towards Bladensburg, near which place they encamped, and on the 23d began moving towards Marlborough, the orders of Gen. Winder being to take a position on the road not far from that place. On the evening of the 23d, Lieut.-Col. Sterrett's command, consisting of the Fifth Baltimore Regiment of Volunteers, comprising some of the most substantial merchants and business men of the city and some distinguished professional men, with the rifle battalion of Maj. William Pinkney (previously Attorney-General of the United States), and two companies of volunteer artillery from the same city, under Capts. Myers and Magruder, with six six-pounders, in all about eight hundred men, reached Bladensburg and joined Gen. Stansbury. On the next morning arrived, after a march of sixteen miles, several detachments of Maryland militia, comprising a part of two regiments, and numbering seven hundred and fifty men, under the command of Col. William D. Beall, an efficient officer of the Revolution, and Col. Hood. Another small detachment of two hundred and forty men was under the command of Col. Kramer, and two battalions, amounting to one hundred and fifty men, were under Majs. Waring and Maynard.

The Virginia militia were under the command of Col. George Minor, and consisted of one regiment of about six hundred men and a cavalry company of about one hundred. The regular United States infantry were under the charge of Lieut.-Col. William Scott, and amounted to about three hundred men, and a company of about eighty men from the Twelfth Regiment. Barnoy's command, numbering about four hundred sailors and about one hundred and fifty marines, with two eighteen-pounders, joined the army on the morning of the 22d of August.

The Maryland cavalry, about three hundred men, were commanded by Lieut.-Col. Frisky Tilghman, Majs. Otho H. Williams and Charles Sterrett. Capt. J. C. Herbert commanded the "Bladensburg Troop of Horse." The United States cavalry, numbering about one hundred and twenty-five, were commanded by Lieut.-Col. Lavel. The whole American force, therefore, amounted to about seven thousand men in or near Bladensburg at the time of the battle, and the British not more than four thousand five hundred.

Bladensburg, at which this unlucky engagement was fought, is at the head of small craft navigation on the Eastern Branch of the Potomac, about six miles northeast of Washington, on the old post-road from that city to Baltimore. North of this road is another joining the Washington road, running from Georgetown, and these roads form an acute angle a few yards from the bridge in the town. In the triangular space thus formed, and near the old mill, Gen. Stansbury's command was posted on the morning of the 24th of August. About four hundred yards from the Bladensburg bridge, on a slight eminence in that triangular field, between a large barn and the Washington road, the Baltimore Artillery, under Capts. Magruder and Myers, occupied a temporary breastwork of earth, commanding the bridge and road. Part of the battalion of riflemen, under Maj. William Pinkney, and one other company took position on the right of the artillery, near the junction of the roads, and partially protected by a fence and brush on the low ground near the river.

On the left of the battery, leading to the rear of the barn and near the Georgetown road, two companies of militia from Col. Shutz's regiment, under the command of Capt. Gorsuch and Ducker, and the other portion of Maj. Pinkney's riflemen were stationed. Col. Ragan was posted in the rear of Maj. Pinkney, his right resting on the Georgetown road, Col. Schutz continuing the line on the left, with a small vacancy between the two regiments; and Col. Sterrett formed the extreme left flank of the infantry. In the midst of these confused preparations for battle Cols. Beall and Hood entered Bladensburg with other Maryland militia, after a forced march of sixteen miles that sultry morning from Annapolis, crossed the bridge, and took a position on the most commanding height on the right of the Washington turnpike, about three hundred yards from the road, to secure the right flank.

The march to Bladensburg was rapid, though the day was excessively hot and the road deep in dust. On the arrival of the cavalry and mounted men, they were placed on the left flank a little in the rear. Gen. Winder now arrived on the field, and informed Gen. Stansbury and Col. Monroe that his whole force was on the march to the scene of action, and approved the dispositions which had been made. At this time, however, it had become impracticable, in the opinion of the officers present, to make any essential change, as the enemy had already appeared on the opposite heights of Bladensburg, about a mile distant, where he halted fifteen or twenty minutes. This was about twelve o'clock.

The troops from Washington were disposed of as they came up. Capt. Burch, with three pieces of artillery, was stationed on the extreme left of the infantry of the first line, and a rifle company, armed with muskets, near the battery to support it. About this time the Secretary of War arrived, and a few moments after the President and the Attorney-General, and proceeded to examine the disposition of the troops. In the mean time the enemy, who had been standing in the blazing sun on the opposite hill, advanced into Bladensburg, while the officers were rapidly forming the second line. At this time Gen. Winder became greatly annoyed by "numerous self-constituted contributors of advice, suggesters of position, and intermeddlers with command, gentlemen of respectability and good will; committees, whole democracy of commanders, industriously helped to mar all singleness of purpose and unity of action. Arriving at the bridge while Col. Monroe was displacing the corner-stones of the combat, Gen. Winder met several gentlemen, among the rest Mr. Francis S. Key, not only recommending, but showing where they thought the troops ought to be posted, riding to the spots designated and confounding the outset. Other bystanders were present at the spectacle as such, among them Alexander McKim, the Baltimore member of Congress, on one of his fast trotting horses,—a rich merchant, who said that having voted for war, he could not find it in his conscience if not to fight for it, at least to stand by those who did." 1

In the midst of this confused preparation for battle Commodore Barney, with two eighteen-pounders and his flotilla-men, came up at a trot, and formed his men on the right of the main road in a line with the commands of Cols. Beall and Hood, but with considerable space between them, owing to the formatoin of the ground. Commodore Barney planted his heavy guns in the road, a portion of the men acting as artillerists. Capt. Miller, who commanded the flotilla-men and marines as infantry to support the artillery, stationed three twelve-pounders to the right of Barney. Lieut.-Col. Kramer, with a battalion of Maryland militia, was posted in a wood a short distance in advance of the marines and Cols. Beall and Hood's command. The regiment under Col. Magruder was stationed on the left of Barney, and the regiment of Col. Brent and Maj. Waring's battalion and some other detachments formed the left flank of the second line, and in the rear of Maj. Peter's battery. Lieut.-Col. Scott, with the regulars, was stationed in advance of Col. Magruder, and to the left, forming a line towards Maj. Peter's battery, other small detachments in various directions.

Such was the disposition of the American army when, about half-past twelve o'clock on Aug. 24, 1814, the enemy descended the hills beyond Bladensburg, and the battle commenced which ended so disastrously to the American arms.

The British entered Bladensburg without opposition, and then began crossing by the bridge. When their advance was crowded upon it, the Baltimore battery and Maj. Pinkney's battalion opened upon them with deadly effect, nearly a whole company being swept away at the first discharge. They pressed across, however, threw the first American line into some confusion, and captured one of their guns.

The second line stood firm, and received the enemy with so heavy a fire of musketry and artillery that they were driven back in disorder to the river's bank. The second British brigade had now crossed, and came to the support of the first. Both brigades now pressed forward, Ross extending his line so as to turn the American left flank, and sending at the same time a flight of rockets into their ranks. Two regiments of militia broke and fled, in spite of Winder's efforts; but Sterett's Baltimore volunteers stood firm until Winder ordered a retreat.

The British now attacked the position held by Barney with his guns, Miller's marines, and Beall's militia. The militia (who had arrived on the field that morning, after a trying march of sixteen miles) soon fled, leaving Barney's and Miller's corps uncovered, still fighting like heroes. A party of the British now climbed a hill which commanded the artillery and opened a fire upon them, killing a number, and desperately wounding Barney himself, while the main body charged them with the bayonet. The brave sailors, however, stood to their guns, loading and firing, until some of them were bayoneted at their pieces, and their wounded commander ordered them to retire and leave him a prisoner. As it was evident that they were about to be outflanked, and further resistance was useless, Gen. Winder ordered a general retreat, which soon became a flight, and the day was lost.

Col. Miner was ordered to cover the retreat of the army until all had marched for the capital. The most of the troops, however, instead of moving towards Washington, had scattered in every direction, and, as it afterwards appeared, the greater part had fled towards Montgomery Court-House. Gen. Winder, after consultation with the Secretary of War, decided that it would be useless to think of defending Washington, and therefore proposed to rally the troops on the heights of Georgetown. But the general soon found that but few of the militia could be collected, the greater part having strayed off in search of food or refreshments, and on the 25th orders were given for all the troops to assemble at Montgomery Court-House. Gen. Winder seems to have taken this position with a view to collect his forces and to interpose for the anticipated attack upon Baltimore. On the 26th the army again took up its line of march for the latter city, where it arrived in due time.

Meanwhile, the British forces marched into Washington without further molestation, and destroyed the Capitol, including the Senate chamber and House of Representatives, the President's house, arsenal, navy-yard, Treasury buildings, and the bridge across the Potomac. Besides pillaging many private dwellings and stores, the public property alone destroyed at Washington was worth more than two millions of dollars.

To describe more fully the operations of the cavalry forces during and subsequent to the battle of Bladensburg, we append the following extract from a letter written by an officer in Col. Frisyh Tlighman's cavalry regiment to his friend in Hagerstown:

"Montgomery Court-House,
"Aug. 27, 1814.

"I have this moment returned from Bladensburg, to which place I was sent yesterday morning by Gen. Winder, for the purpose of ascertaining the situation of several officers who were said to have been wounded and made prisoners in the battle at Bladensburg on Wednesday last. You have no doubt by this time heard the issue of that battle, perhaps in a thousand different ways, and have had much anxiety about the fate of several of your friends. I have with my cavalry escaped unharmed, although the enemy directed his first fire with the rockets at the cavalry, which must have appeared to them very formidable, posted upon the left of the army. The cavalry did not participate much in the fight, being ordered not to charge until the enemy showed a disposition to retire, which, unfortunately, did not take place. The left wing of our army first gave way, and we were obliged to retire with them, there being no troops left in that quarter to support us in case of a charge.

"I felt very anxious about Col. Ragan, who was said to have been badly wounded and in the possession of the enemy. I found, however, upon my arrival in Bladensburg, that he had been thrown from his horse in the action, taken prisoner, and paroled. He left there yesterday morning for Baltimore, and I presume will return home in a few days, as he cannot serve until exchanged Commodore Barney and several other officers are wounded and now in Bladensburg.

"The British left their men1 and horses unburied on the field of action. I saw many of them lying in and near the main road, and had them buried before I left."

"A party of the cavalry last night took about one hundred prisoners at Bladensburg, among them were several officers. Reinforcements are coming in daily to our aid; part of them have been ordered to Baltimore, and a part to Washington."

"The enemy have returned to their shipping, and it is thought they will next attack Baltimore. They left the city without destroying the paper-mill, foundry, or Parrott's ropewalk. They did not burn Stull & Williams' powder-works at Bladensburg. They became alarmed, and retreated with a great deal of caution. A British captain informed me they were fearful that Gen. Winder was making arrangements to cut off their retreat to their shipping.

"We have had very arduous service, having been hovering about the enemy ever since we have been in service. We have been for twenty-four hours without provisions or sleep. Our horses and men are literally broken down with fatigue, yet the men bear it like soldiers; and I can truly say they are an honor to any corps."

"You have no doubt heard of the destruction of the Capitol, President's house, navy-yard, and very much other property in and about the city. The scene which Washington this day exhibits cannot be described."

Political Controversy in Washington County.

—During this exciting period in the history of the State, Gen. Samuel Ringgold, commanding the Second Brigade of Maryland militia in Washington County, was not inactive. The moment he heard of the disastrous result of the battle at Bladensburg and the capture of the national capital he ordered the whole of his brigade into service, Boonsboro' being named as the place of rendezvous. The orders were promptly obeyed by the citizens, and on the 27th of August six hundred men were assembled, and armed with muskets hastily procured from Harper's Ferry. However, as it was concluded by those in command that the State's militia already in the field were sufficient to defend Annapolis, Baltimore, and other points threatened on the Western Shore, the members of Gen. Ringgold's brigade were permitted to return to their homes on the 28th.

Strange to relate, in consequence of the zeal and patriotism displayed by Gen. Ringgold on this occasion he was as a candidate for re-election to Congress beaten by a Federalist, a "peace candidate" (Mr. Baer, of Frederick County), in October, 1814, upon the strength of assertions that he had unlawfully ordered his brigade into service; also that he had proposed to the brigade that the single men should march, while the married men remained at home for the defense of the county.

However, in the three counties of Allegany, Frederick, and Washington, which then composed the Fourth Congressional District, Mr. Baer received a majority of but one hundred and seventy-five votes in Frederick County, and one hundred and forty-four in Allegany, while Gen. Ringgold had one hundred and fifty majority in Washington. The latter county then had in the field at Baltimore and Annapolis more than five hundred men. A large majority of these men were Republicans, and had they been at home, notwithstanding the delusive cry of peace and its influence over the weak, the ignorant, and the cowardly, Gen. Ringgold would have been returned.

In 1816, Gen. Ringgold was again a candidate for Congressional honors (and was elected), and in September of that year a citizen through the press queried him as follows: "By what power or authority did you call out your brigade in the month of August, 1814? and why did you not march them after they had assembled and were armed?" To this and other questions Gen. Ringgold replied one week later in the following manner:

"To the Voters of the Fourth Congressional District of Maryland.

"Fellow-Citizens,—In reply to certain questions put to me by one of you in the last Maryland Herald, I beg leave to state that I ordered out the brigade in August, 1814, by virtue of the power and authority vested in me by the 6th section of the Militia Law of this State, in the following words: . . . "And also in pursuance of the order of Gen. Winder of the 20th day of August, 1814, which is as follows:

"A Muster-General's Office,

"Headquarters Military District No. 10,

"Washington City, 20th August, 1814."

"General Orders.

"The commander of the Tenth Military District has made requisitions on the proper officers for such militia aid as the present threatened pressure on his district demands, and he relies with confidence that this demand will be obeyed with the utmost promptitude and alacrity."

"But since the formal proceedings of regular demand may be too slow for the urgency of the occasion, and will certainly be too tardy for the zeal and patriotism of the freemen of America, who see their Capitol threatened by an insolent foe, who insists upon dictating terms to them there, after having desolated their shores and sacked their cities, the spontaneous efforts of the people are demanded. In this momentous period, therefore, the commander of the district appeals with confidence to the people within and contiguous to his command, and calls upon all not included in the requisition already made who wish to avert the calamities which threaten us voluntarily to rally round the standard of their country without waiting for the slower progress of legal calls.

"Organized companies or individuals who will hasten to the scene of action and will perform the services which may be required, armed in the best manner possible, will be received,

1 According to their own statement, the loss on the part of the British was five hundred men killed and wounded, a large majority of whom fell in front of Barony's and Miller's batteries. The American loss was comparatively nothing.
and may finally enjoy the satisfaction of reflecting that they have contributed to save their country from devastation and plunder.

"By order of the commanding general,

"E. G. Hirt,

"So much has heretofore been said in relation to the call of the brigade, at that time that I think it my duty, as an opportunity is offered me, to give you a minute detail of that transaction. On Wednesday, the 24th of August, I received the above order of Gen. Winder, and on the next morning by express the account of the capture of Washington; also that the main body of the enemy, after burning and pillaging the city, were in full march towards Baltimore, and a strong detachment towards Fredericksburg, with a view of seizing the trea-ure of the banks deposited there; and from thence to Harper's Ferry, to destroy the public works and gain the arms and public stores at that place.

"On receiving this information I sent a messenger to Maj.
Pottenger and Capt. Thomas Kellar, my two aides, to repair to my house. On their arrival a consultation was held, at which were present those gentlemen, with Maj.-Gen. James Wilkinson and Maj. Epton Lawrence. They unanimously coincided in opinion with me that I not only had the power, but that the danger with which the State was threatened fully justified the measure and rendered the call of the brigade absolutely necessary."

"The order was immediately issued for the brigade to assemble at Boonsboro', and arms were procured from Harper's Ferry ready for distribution on their arrival. Late in the evening of the assembling of the troops at Boonsboro' I received from a respectable citizen information that the enemy had precipitately left Washington, and were retreating to their shipping at the mouth of the Patuxent. Not wishing to march the troops without there was an absolute necessity, well knowing how very inconvenient it would have been to most of them at that season of the year to leave their homes, I sent the following letter by express to Gen. Armstrong, the then Secretary of War, then at Fredericksburg. On the next morning I received from the chief clerk of the War Department the letter which also follows, in consequence of which I disbanded the brigade.

"I feel confident this candid statement of facts will satisfy every unprejudiced mind I did on that occasion what other generals did in adjoining States, and for which they have received the applause and thanks of their country. I did what it was my duty to do, and what I should do again did the same necessity exist.

"With regard to the Compensation Law, I take occasion to say that I am opposed to it, and should I be honored by a majority of the suffrages of the district, I will use my best endeavors to procure its repeal.

"Once more I am nominated by my Republican fellow-citizens as a candidate for Congress. After serving in public life for a period of twenty years it cannot be necessary that I should make a new profession of my political creed; it is sufcient to say that the principles which have dictated and governed my conduct heretofore afford a sure indication of the course I shall in future pursue.

"I am, most respectfully,

"Your fellow-citizen,

"SAMUEL RINGGOLD."

"Fountain Rock, Sept. 16, 1816."

"Headquarters, Boonsboro',

"Aug. 27, 1814."

"The moment I heard of the capture of the metropolis of the nation I ordered the whole of my brigade into service, to rendezvous at this place. The orders have been promptly obeyed by the citizens, and this day I had under arms six hundred men, independent of the last requisition of Gen. Winder.

"This morning a fine volunteer company marched from Hagerstown through this place, and another company of the last requisition.

"I have dispatched this express for the purpose of consulting you as to the marching of the men to-morrow. If the enemy have returned to their shipping, it will be unnecessary until further orders; if not, they will march at eight o'clock, and can reach Baltimore the next day or the day after.

"I am, sir, respectfully yours,

"SAMUEL RINGGOLD.

"P.S.—Two companies of the requisition made by Gen.
Winder will march to-morrow morning at all events.

"Gen. John Armstrong, Secretary of War,

"Frederick-Town, Md."

"Frederick-Town, Aug. 27, 1814.

"11 o'clock in the evening.

"Dear Sir,—Your letter of this date to the Secretary of War has just arrived by express. I carried it to Gen. Armstrong in his boll. He directs me to offer you his respects, and inform you that so many militia troops are already in motion to meet or overtake the enemy that it is deemed unnecessary for you to march your brigade. The two companies ordered out on Gen.
Winder's requisition should march according to orders.

"The President has this evening sent notice to the Secretaries of War and Treasury at this place that he will meet them in Washington as soon as they can make it convenient. They set out to-morrow morning, when all the public papers, etc., will follow, to resume the proper routine of office as usual in Washington.

"I hope you will do me the honor to accept the assurances of my great respect and esteem.

"DANIEL PARKER, C. C. War Dept.

"Gen. Ringgold."

In September, 1814, nearly all of the Western Maryland troops who were present at Bladensburg participated in the operations around Baltimore, caused by the efforts made by the British to capture that city. The "Homespun Volunteers," of Hagerstown, under Capt. Thomas Quantrill, were attached to Lieut.-
They behaved most gallantly throughout their entire term of service, and were especially complimented for the bravery displayed by them at the battle of North Point. Col. Frisby Tilghman's cavalry also came in for a word of commendation, Gen. Samuel Smith stating in his congratulatory "general orders" that their duties "were performed with an alacrity and promptness highly honorable to the officers and men."

The emergency having passed which rendered it necessary for the volunteers and militia of the county to take the field, they were, in November following, mustered out of service. The peace commissoners representing England and the United States completed their labors at Ghent, Dec. 24, 1814, and the tidings of peace were brought to the United States by Hon. Christopher Hughes, Jr., of Baltimore, who was then our charge d'affaires at Stockholm, and secretary to the commissioners. He arrived in Annapolis on the 13th of February, in the schooner “Transit,” and immediately set out for Washington.

The Prince Regent ratified the treaty on December 30th, and on the 18th of February, 1815, the President’s signature was attached to it, thus perfecting that instrument, and concluding the second war between Great Britain and the United States.1

1 Pursuant to public notice, a meeting of the surviving officers and soldiers of the war of 1812, residing in Washington County, met at the court-house in Hagerstown, on Tuesday, the 26th day of December, 1834, and on motion Col. John Miller was called to the chair, and Daniel Hauer was appointed secretary, and Capt. James Biays assistant secretary. The object of the meeting having been stated by the chair, on motion of William H. Hankey a committee of five was appointed by the chair to draft resolutions for the adoption of the meeting. The following gentlemen were appointed as the committee: William H. Hankey, Capt. George Shryock, Capt. James Biays, William McCordel, and Charles G. Downs. On motion, also, a committee of five was appointed to name twelve delegates to attend the general convention to assemble in Washington City on the 8th of January ensuing, when the following persons were appointed: David Newcomer, Henry Blessing, William Grove, Andrew Duble, Jacob Powles. The meeting then adjourned, to meet again at two o’clock P.M. At two o’clock the meeting reassembled, pursuant to adjournment, when the committee to appoint delegates reported the following: Col. John Miller, Capt. James Biays, David Newcomer, Henry Blessing, Charles G. Downs, Capt. George Shryock, Frederick Humrichhouse, Frederick Betts, Daniel Hauer, Capt. John Eyer, William Freeran, and William McCordel. It was also

CHAPTER X.

THE CIVIL WAR.

Public Feeling—Town Meetings and Resolutions—Opposition to Secession—Western Maryland Home Guards—The Public Safety Bill—Arrest of Maryland Legislature—Secret Correspondence.

On the 6th of November, 1860, the long political struggle between the North and the South on the slavery question, which began in 1803 with the purchase of Louisiana, ended with the election to the Presidency of Abraham Lincoln, and the triumph of the Republican party. The accession of the anti-slavery party to power filled the South with dismay, and created the greatest excitement throughout the country. Hardly had the result been ascertained before some of the extreme Southern States began military preparations, and set on foot measures to carry into effect their oft-repeated threats of secession and combination in resistance to alleged Northern encroachments.

Public feeling was, perhaps, even more intense in Maryland than in other States, from the obvious danger to which she was exposed by her geographical position in event of conflict between the North and South, and from the very strong counter-currents which existed in popular sentiment. This conflict of opinions and sympathies was nowhere more marked than in Western Maryland, and while the majority of the people of that section were pronounced and decided in their support of the Union after hostilities had actually commenced, there was a very large and respectable element which sympathized with the South, and which deprecated the coercion of the Southern States. Meetings were soon called to give expression to public sentiment, and the tone and character of the resolutions adopted forcibly illustrated the condition of the popular mind in Western Maryland at that period.

In accordance with the recommendation of "the National Union Democratic Central Committee of the State of Maryland," a large meeting of citizens of the Fifth Election District of Washington County, without respect to former party associations, was held at the house of Lloyd H. Barton, in the town of Hancock, on Tuesday evening, November 27th, "for the purpose of taking into consideration the present crisis in our public affairs, and to appoint ten delegates to represent the district in the State Convention to meet in Baltimore on the 6th of December." After the selection of Joseph Graves as chairman and R. E. Taney as secretary, a committee of three, consisting of David E. Price, Joseph Harrison, and Devall Stotneyer, reported a series of resolutions, which were unanimously adopted, and which accurately portrayed the feeling of a large proportion of the people of Western Maryland upon the questions then agitating the country. After the expression of regret at the formation of sectional parties and at the triumph of "Northern sentiment," the resolutions proceeded to declare "that notwithstanding some of our fellow-citizens of the South profess to look upon the result of our recent election as a justification for a withdrawal from the National Union, and consequently a disruption of our government, we, standing as we do between the two extremes, and after the most mature consideration, cannot look upon the said result in so disastrous a light, but view it only as another evidence of the great truth of the sentiment, that 'The price of liberty is eternal vigilance.' Resolved, That we believe that under the provisions of our Constitution the legislative and executive departments of our national government possess ample powers to cause the people of the North to do justice to the people of the South in the rendering up of fugitive slaves, and that by a judicious exercise of these powers, and proper appeals to the justice, the sense of right, and the patriotism of the people of the North, all causes of complaint may be easily and speedily removed."

On the 17th of December, in pursuance of a call signed by Richard Potts and other prominent citizens without regard to party, a convention of the people of Frederick County assembled in Frederick City "to consider all constitutional means of vindicating and securing our constitutional rights within the Union, and to petition the Governor, if deemed expedient, to convene the Legislature for the sole purpose of passing a law for a State Convention to take into consideration the present perilous condition of public affairs, to devise such measures as the exigencies of the crisis may call for, and to appoint delegates to represent the State in such general convention of the slaveholding States as may be convoked to guard and protect Southern interests and Southern rights."

The Hon. Richard Potts presided, assisted by a number of vice-presidents and secretaries. After prayer by Rev. J. McK. Riley, the following committee on resolutions was appointed: Grayson Eichelberger, William P. Maulsby, L. J. Brengle, S. D. Walker, B. A. Cunningham, Governor E. L. Lowe, and Outerbridge Horsey. This committee reported a series of resolutions, a portion of which had been previously adopted by a meeting of the workingmen of Frederick. The resolutions protested against disunion and secession; called for conciliatory measures on the part of the North; rebuked many of the public men for want of patriotism; urged the Maryland congressmen to vote for such measures as would be likely to restore harmony to the country; declared that while the mere fact of President Lincoln's election did not justify secession, the conduct of the "anti-slavery fanatics of the North" in the passage of personal liberty bills, their persistent agitation of the slavery question in the pulpit, the press, and in political assemblages, and their active and determined opposition to the return to their owners of fugitive slaves, evidenced unfeigned feeling towards their Southern brethren, was in direct violation of the letter as well as the spirit of the Constitution, was subversive of all good government, deserved the severest reprobation of every good citizen, and warranted the Southern States in asking for further constitutional guarantees from their Northern brethren. The resolutions also requested the Governor of Maryland, when in his judgment it should become necessary, or so soon as a convention of the Southern States should be determined upon, to convene the Legislature, for the sole purpose of providing for the calling of a State Convention and of the election of delegates thereto, "to take into consideration the dangers by which we are environed, to take all necessary constitutional steps for our relief, and, if necessary, to appoint delegates to a convention of slaveholding States to take counsel with our Southern brethren."

Ex-Governor Lowe made a minority report to the following effect: "that each State is sovereign, the Federal Constitution being equally binding upon all as a compact, which compact as (Daniel Webster declared) if broken on one side the other contracting parties are at liberty to consider annulled. Therefore the nullification of the fugitive slave law by several free States is sufficient to justify the Southern States in considering the compact broken, while the election of Lincoln upon an avowed policy of irrepressible conflict with the institution of the South, guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, demonstrated the determination of the controlling political party at the North to convert the Union into an engine of oppression."

The resolution further declared "that the Union, as our fathers made it, ought to be preserved, but can only be by the North fully recognizing all the constitutional rights of the South, the latter never having been the aggressor, while the former has caused all the perils which now endanger the Union; that while deprecating the precipitate action of South Carolina and other adjoining States, before consultation with sister Southern States, the provocation is acknowledged to be excessive, and comes exclusively from the North; that Maryland and Virginia can never go to the North, but must ever remain at the great column of Southern States; that a convention should be held as early as possible to determine the measures of preserving the Union upon the basis of the Constitution, and failing in that, then to devise some way to avert the calamities of a civil war." In conclusion, the resolutions repudiated the idea of coercion by the Federal government, and demanded an early session of the Maryland Legislature. The minority report of Governor Lowe was seconded by John A. Lynch, and supported at length by William J. Ross, J. M. Killgour, and Governor Lowe himself. The majority report was advocated by Col. William P. Maulshy, Grayson Eichelberger, and W. Hobbs. Col. E. Shriver then called the previous question, which was sustained, when Governor Lowe's report was rejected, and that of the majority (substituted by Mr. Eichelberger) was adopted. The former received two hundred and one, and the latter three hundred and fourteen, votes.

1 A committee, consisting of John S. Hedding, Joseph P. Bi hop, and Charles Barton, was appointed at this meeting to select ten persons to represent the district in the State Convention at Baltimore, and reported the names of Jacob Snavely, David E. Price, Robert Bridges, Benjamin B. Boutman, John J. Bowles, A. B. Taney, Jacob Reel, James D. Hook, John J. Broxius, and D. Stottemeyer.

On the 1st of January, 1861, a large mass-meeting of the people of Montgomery County was held at Rockville. John Brewer was chosen president; Thomas Griffith, Sr., E. J. Hall, Z. Waters, Robert Sellman, W. B. Howard, John H. Gassaway, S. C. Viers, S. T. Stonestreet, P. Palmer, B. Brush Roberts, vice-presidents; and John T. Varrison, G. W. Dawson, R. W. Carter, John T. Benson, G. R. Bradock, secretaries. A committee on resolutions was appointed, which, through its chairman, Hon. Richard J. Bowie, reported resolutions sympathizing with the South, but declaring that "every sacrifice should be made before Maryland consents to separate herself from the Union."

The resolutions suggested a convention of the slave States to devise measures to secure their constitutional rights within the Union, and that the Governor of this State "be requested, when in his judgment it shall become necessary, or as soon as such convention in the slave States shall be determined on, to convene the Legislature for the sole purpose of providing for the call of a State Convention and of the election of delegates thereto, to take all necessary constitutional steps to avert the dangers by which they were environed." The resolutions also demanded the repeal of the obnoxious laws of the free States, opposed the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and concluded as follows:

"Resolved, That if, unfortunately, the slavery question cannot now be settled permanently upon terms acceptable to the South and the North, and the Union should be dissolved, then Maryland ought to go with the South or Central Southern Confederacy, and we pledge ourselves to use our influence to that object, which will clearly protect our rights and institutions."

The committee was equally divided on the latter resolution, and the meeting finally laid it upon the table. Upon the resolution relative to an extra session the committee was also equally divided. W. Viers Bowie offered a substitute "that the Governor be requested to convene the Legislature without delay, to consult with him and determine upon the course the State ought to take to protect herself and the Union in the present alarming condition of the country." This led to an earnest and animated discussion, in which the substitute was advocated with much ability by W. Viers Bowie and George Peter, Jr., and the original resolution by A. Bowie Davis, Richard J. Bowie, and E. J. Hall. The substitute was rejected,—a yes 131, nays 133. Thereupon the resolution was adopted by the same vote. The other resolutions, which had been unanimously reported by the committee, were also unanimously adopted by the meeting.

The committee which reported the original resolutions consisted of Richard J. Bowie, William V. Bowie, Samuel Biggs, of R., Zachariah Waters, Robert Sellman, Howard Griffith, and Benjamin C. Gott.

On the 3d of January a lofty pole was raised at Williamsport and decorated with a Union flag bearing the motto, "Constitution and the Union." "Strong and eloquent" Union speeches were made by Hon. Judge Weisel, J. V. L. Findlay, and A. K. Stake, member of the Legislature.

On the 15th, pursuant to a previous call, an immense meeting of the citizens of Washington County assembled at the court-house in Hagerstown "to give expression to their views in relation to the alarming crisis in the country." The call was addressed to the people without distinction of party, and was responded to by large numbers from nearly every portion of the county.

Dr. Charles Macgill and John McKee were made temporary chairmen, with Joseph A. Skinner and Richard Sheekles as vice-presidents, and Charles J. Nesbitt and Lewis P. Fiery, secretaries. On motion of R. H. Alvey, a committee of seven, consisting of R. H. Alvey, L. T. Brien, Dr. William A. Riddlermoser, Elias Davis, David Brumbaugh, David Troup, and William Reynolds, was appointed to report permanent officers, and in accordance with their recommendation the temporary officers were made permanent. Hon. William T. Hamilton, seconded by Dr. William A. Riddlermoser, moved the appointment of a committee of twenty to report resolutions, and the following gentlemen were appointed: R. H. Alvey, L. T. Brien, Dr. Wm. A. Riddlermoser, Elias Davis, David Brumbaugh, David Troup, Williams Reynolds, Hon. William T. Hamilton, Hon. Daniel Weisel, George Freauer, Col. George Schley, William Motler, George Harmon, John W. Breathed, Peter B. Small, Emanuel Tice, Alexander Neill, Joseph Beeler, James Wason, and Isaac Nesbitt.

The committee retired, and upon full consultation reported unanimously a series of resolutions, declaring that in our opinion and judgment the present evils of the country have been produced and precipitated upon us by a persistent and dogmatical course of fanatism in the Northern States of this Union, and that by the legislation and conduct of the people, as well official as unofficial, in said section of the Union, the letter and spirit of the Constitution of the United States, as also the county of the States, have been violated, and the constitutional obligations and rights set at defiance; that the Northern States should repeal the laws violative of the Constitution and arrest all further aggression of their people upon the rights of the South; that while the Southern and slave-holding States of this Union have suffered much at the hands of the people of the Northern States, and are now menaced by their hostile position, and therefore have just cause of complaint, yet we think and hope that by mutual forbearance and wise counsels the difficulties may be adjusted under the Constitution, by proper amendments thereto; and that we earnestly appeal to those in authority to exert themselves to the utmost to accomplish such a result; and that an amendment of said Constitution such as that proposed by Mr. Crittenden would be acceptable as a measure of peace; that, in view of the prospect of a total dissolution of the Union, the true policy of all who are attached to the same and desire to see a reconstruction thereof is to desist from all provocations of hostility between the several States, or between the Federal government and the seceding States; and that a resort to force would be but the certain means of engendering lasting hostility and of alienating the people of the States, and thus render the reconstruction of the Union impossible; that the action of the people of Maryland in this important crisis ought, if possible, to comport with the forms of law and order, and therefore to be more effective in results, as the Governor of Maryland has recently announced that he has no power by proclamation to call upon the people to take their sense upon the propriety of holding a State Convention, nevertheless, as an expression of the views of this meeting, we most respectfully request that he recommend to the people of Maryland to assemble upon a day designated by him at their several places of voting, that their sense may be had upon calling such convention, and that as good citizens we will cheerfully observe and abide by the same.

A minority of the committee reported as supplemental and additional to the foregoing a series of resolutions declaring "that at the time of the adoption of the present Constitution of the United States the several States adopting the same were free and independent republics; and that the Constitution being adopted and the Union of the States formed by the separate assent of the States respectively, as expressed through and by the several Legislatures or Conventions held in the several States for that purpose, such States, whenever they think themselves aggrieved and oppressed, and that the ends and purposes of their Federal association have been defeated, and their rights and liberties endangered, and therefore withdraw from the Union, cannot, consistently with freedom and the nature of the republican institutions guaranteed to each, be forced to remain in and maintain the Union; and that the employment of force by the general government against any seceding State from said Union would be in violation of the true principles of the Union, and of the rights of the States; that it would be a radical and despotical perversion of the principles and objects of the Union, as well as of the rights of the States, that any such resort to force by the general government should be made; that it is right and expedient that the people of the State should consult and determine in regard to the crisis impending over them, and as to the position and welfare of the State, and to that end a convention of the people should be called by the sanction of law." After the committee had made their reports, the meeting adjourned until the 26th of January, when it reassembled in the "County Hall" at Hagerstown. The proceedings, however, were inharmonious, and the Union men withdrew from the hall and proceeded to the public square, where they organized by the appointment of Daniel Startzman, Sr., as chairman, Peter B. Small, of Hagerstown, Lewis P. Fiery, of Clear Spring, and Joseph F. Davis, of Funkstown, as vice-presidents, and J. D. Bennett and B. F. Lushbaugh, of Hagerstown, as secretaries. The resolutions reported to the former meeting, on motion of Joseph A. Skinner, were unanimously laid on the table, and a new committee on resolutions appointed, consisting of Daniel Weisel, chairman, Elias Davis, Frederick Bell, Martin Startzman, B. F. Kendall, David Spigler, Henry Newsomer, Isaac Wilson, John Lesher, Jonathan Toby, John Sprecker, David Smith, and Dr. N. B. Scott. The committee reported resolutions, which were unanimously adopted, declaring "that as much as we deeply regret the election of men to the highest offices of the republic nominated and sustained by a section, yet we do not regard their election as a cause for revolution; that we agree with the President of the United States in his recent annual message that secession is no constitutional mode of redress, but revolution; and that we regard all the States that have by acts of secession declared themselves out of the Union and independent of the general government as in a state of revolt against the authority of the United States; that all good citizens should sustain the government in maintaining its rights and the public property of the nation, and enforcing its authority and laws wherever it can be done without endangering the Union; that all laws passed by any of the States in contravention of the Constitution and laws of the general government, called "personal liberty bills," and such like, should be at once repealed, as alike due to the patriotism and justice of those States and the harmony of the Union; that we are ready to adopt all amendments of the Constitution which will secure now and forever the constitutional rights of the South, and every other section of the Union, and that such amendments should, without delay, be proposed and ratified in the mode pointed out by the Constitution; that the people of Maryland should vigorously oppose all attempts at secession and revolution; that her true position is in the Union, and that for all her grievances the Constitution provides adequate remedies; that the course of Governor Hicks meets with the hearty approval of this meeting; that in any future contingency that may arise out of our present national difficulties Maryland should not consent to be the border State, but her true policy is to look to such a position in any new confederacy as will best comport with her safety, peace, and prosperity; and that in the opinion of this meeting a central confederacy presents the best guarantees for her future destiny, if unhappily the present Union should be dissolved; that among the proposed amendments of the Constitution we earnestly recommend the election of the Electors of President and Vice-President of the United States to be by the district system, instead of by general ticket, as a measure eminently calculated to prevent the election of sectional candidates, as more conformable to our system of representation, and as affording to minorities their just weight in the government." Addresses in favor of the Union were made by Judge Weisel, Joseph A. Skinner, Lewis P. Fiery, of Clear Spring, Capt. Elias Davis, of Boonsboro', S. M. Fiery, of Hagerstown, Capt. Isaac Nesbitt, and others, and a letter from Governor Hicks was read.1

On the 16th of January, in pursuance of a previous call from prominent citizens of the county, a convention was held in Frederick City "of those who eloquent and impressive address of two hours' duration. Partisan to a call, signed by more than five hundred persons, the citizens of Carroll County, without distinction of party, assembled address was delivered by Capt. Elias Davis, of Boonsboro'.

The delegates to this convention were chosen at district meetings held at the usual polling-places on the 12th.

Dr. William Waters' presided, assisted by a large number of vice-presidents and secretaries. A committee on business having been appointed, the chairman, Bradley T. Johnson, reported an address to the people of Maryland, declaring "that the rejection of the Crittenden Compromise by the Republicans of the United States Senate has destroyed all hope from that quarter of a settlement of the existing national troubles, and that in view of the fact that the Northern States are threatening on the incoming of Lincoln's administration to use coercion against Southern seceding States, it becomes the duty of Maryland, attached as she ever has been to the Union under the Constitution as adopted by our fathers, to speak and act as promptly and decidedly as her circumstances will permit for the preservation of peace between the sections and ultimate reconstruction and continuance of the Union."

The committee also reported the following resolutions:

"Resolved, By the people of Frederick County in convention assembled:

"That we are now as ever faithful to the Federal Union under the constitution as adopted by our fathers, and are willing and ready to make every effort and proper sacrifice to restore and perpetuate it.

"Resolved, That any attempt to preserve it by force will be vain and criminal; that coercion means war; that war means disunion, certain, inevitable, irreversible; and that we will stand by our Southern brethren in resisting it.

"Resolved, That we believe we pronounce the nearly unanimous feeling and intention of the people of Maryland that they will hold on to the Union while a hope of restoring it remains, but that when we shall be obliged to make a choice between the Southern Confederacy and the Northern States, we are then determined to go with the South, and stand by the South at all hazards and to the last extremity.

"Resolved, That there ought to be co-operation and consultation among theborder slave States for the purpose of averting war, preserving peace, restoring the Union, if possible, by preserving a recognition of Southern rights, and failing in this,
to take necessary steps to protect themselves.

"Resolved, That there ought to be a convention of the people of Maryland to be selected and meet at an early day for the purpose of convention among the people of the State as to what action might be necessary to protect their rights and honor.

"Resolved, That the president of this convention do appoint fourteen delegates to said convention to represent this county, and that the delegation have full power to fill vacancies.

"Resolved, That the president appoint a committee of twelve on correspondence and organization, who shall have full power to do whatever may be necessary to carry out the object of the address and resolutions adopted by said convention."

The address and resolutions were ably advocated by Mr. Johnson and ex-Governor Lowe, and, on motion of John A. Lynch, were unanimously adopted; where-uppon Capt. Ritchie presented a series of resolutions, accompanied by an address in their favor, for the consideration of the convention. The resolutions were seconded by William Tyler, Jr., and unanimously adopted. They

"disclaimed any wish to foster sectionalism, expressed warm attachment to the Union as established by our fathers on the basis of the Constitution, but that in view of abolition aggressions and the mighty pecuniary interests of Maryland involved in the present controversy, we should be impoverished if appeased to a Northern Confederacy: therefore our interests and sympathies are Southern in contrast to Northern, if the North, by refusing to acknowledge our rights and redress our wrongs, shall destroy the spirit of nationality and drive us to make such a discrimination. . . ."

In pursuance of previous notice the people of Allegany County assembled in mass-meeting at Cumberland on the 17th of January. D. W. McCleary was appointed temporary chairman, and Thomas Deve- mon, Alexander King, and John M. Buchanan were appointed to nominate permanent officers of the meeting. George A. Pauoce was elected president, H. P. Tasker, Richard Fairall, John McLaughlin, H. B. Ellin, Hanson Wilison, John Douglas, A. Chamber- lin, Robert Bruce, George M. Blocher, Jesse Korns, Francis Mattingly, Thomas Whalen, John Cullen, and Moses Rawlings, vice-presidents, and J. J. Mc- Henry and C. Slack, secretaries.

A committee, consisting of J. P. Roman, William Shaw, C. M. Thruston, J. M. Buchanan, William Walsh, John G. Lynn, Joseph Shriver, Nelson Beall, Samuel M. Semmes, and C. Slack, reported resolutions declaring "that while we feel that the Southern States of the Union have just right to complain of the growing hostility of the Northern people to their institutions, and of the enactment by various States of what is known as 'personal liberty laws,' which we believe to be in violation of the Constitution and of the sacred obligations which those States owe to our common country, and although Maryland, bordering on, and separated only by an imaginary line from, one of these States which have thus violated one of her obligations, has more cause than any of her sister States to complain of this unfriendly legislation, yet we believe that the proper remedies for these evils and aggressions is within the Union, and not outside of it." Patriotic addresses were delivered by ex-Governor Francis Thomas, Mr. Roman, and others.

The Legislature of South Carolina, which had been convened for the purpose of choosing Presidential electors, was still in session when the election returns made it certain that Mr. Lincoln had been elected President; and Governor Pickens sent them a message recommending that they should remain in permanent session, and take action to prepare the State for the threatened crisis. In response to this suggestion the Legislature passed an act calling a convention of delegates to assemble at Columbia on the 17th of December, 1860. The convention met at the time appointed, but adjourned on the following day to Charleston, where, on the 20th of December, it passed the ordinance of secession. Although the action of South Carolina created the most intense excitement in all parts of the country, efforts were still made in various quarters to prevent the impending conflict.

On the 10th of January, in accordance with an invitation from prominent citizens of Baltimore, a number of gentlemen of all shades and classes of opinion, representing all parts of the State, met in the Law Buildings in that city for the purpose of conferring relative to the threatening condition of public affairs." This "Conference Convention" adopted resolutions expressing devotion to the Union, approving the Crit- tenden Compromise, and appointing Hon. R. B. Car- michael, Hon. William T. Goldsborough, and Messrs. Allen Bowie Davis, of Montgomery, John Conte, A. B. Hagner, and Ross Winans, to request the Gover- nor to issue his proclamation calling on the people to vote on the last Monday in January for or against the calling of a convention.2

1 On Jan. 21, 1861, the Union men of Frederick raised a splendid pole at the west end of Fourth Street, surmounted with a national flag, the streamer bearing the name of Gov- ernor Hicks. Col. Maulsby, F. J. Nelson, and J. S. Cooper made stirring speeches to an enthusiastic crowd.

2 Among those invited to attend this conference from Was- hington County were James Wason, Andrew K. Syster, Joseph O'Neal, James Dixon Roman, Elias Davis, Jacob H. Grove,
The delegates present at this convention from Frederick County were Outerbridge Horsey and Benedict Boone; from Montgomery County, A. Bowie Davis and Col. Benjamin Shreeves; from Washington County, James Wason; from Allegany, John M. Buchanan and Horace Resley; from Carroll, George W. Manro, Micajah Rogers, and Somerset R. Waters.

On the 18th of February another State Conference Convention assembled in Baltimore, at which all the counties in Maryland were represented by gentlemen reflecting all shades of political opinion. This convention was held in pursuance of the recommendation of the Frederick County Convention of the 16th of January. The delegates were selected at informal meetings throughout the State on the 12th of February.

Col. James M. Schley, of Allegany County, was made secretary pro tem. of the convention, and Andrew Rench, of Washington County, elected one of the vice-presidents. After a session of two days the convention unanimously adopted an address "To the people of Maryland" and a set of resolutions, and adjourned to meet in Baltimore on the 12th of March following. On the day appointed the convention reassembled in Baltimore, and appointed Messrs. Walter Mitchell, E. F. Chambers, William Henry Norris, E. L. Lowe, of Frederick, Isaac D. Jones, and J. Hanson Thomas to wait upon the Virginia Convention and urge that body to recommend a conference of the Border States.

The suspense in which the country had been kept was finally dissipated by the terrible certainty that the crisis had at last come. The attack upon Fort Sumter on the 12th of April indicated the determined resolution of the people of the seceded States to maintain the position they had assumed, and the departure southward of the armament which sailed from New York proved the purpose of the administration to coerce the Gulf States into obedience. Thus began the war between the government of the United States and the people of the Confederate States.

The proclamation of President Lincoln on the 15th of April, calling for an army of seventy-five thousand men, created the most intense excitement in Maryland, as it showed that it was determined to make instant and desperate war upon the South, and the announcement of the Northern press that Maryland was to be held by the North only served to increase it. This excitement was greatly heightened by the riot in Baltimore on the 19th of April, and serious apprehensions were felt in all parts of the State that Baltimore would be attacked in revenge by the Federal troops that were gathering on the borders of Pennsylvania. The authorities of the city made hasty preparations for defense, and sent dispatches to various sections of Maryland asking for assistance. The aid of Southern sympathizers in Western Maryland was invoked, and on the 20th of April, the day after the riot, the following hand-bill was widely circulated throughout Frederick and other counties:

"LATEST NEWS!"

"MARYLANDERS AROSE!"

"FREDERICK, Saturday, seven o'clock A.M., 1861."

"At twelve o'clock last night I received the following dispatch from Marshal Kane, of Baltimore, by telegraph to the Junction and express to Frederick:"

"Thank you for your offer. Bring your men by the first train, and we will arrange with the railroad authorities. Streets red with Maryland blood! Send express over the mountains and valleys of Maryland and Virginia for their riflemen to come without delay. Fresh horses will be down upon us to-morrow (the 20th). We will fight them, or whip them, or die."

"Geo. P. Kane."
"All men who go with me will report themselves as soon as possible, providing themselves with such accoutrements and equipments as they can; double-barreled shot-guns and buckshot are efficient. They will assemble, after reporting themselves, at ten and a half o'clock, so as to go down in the eleven and a half train.

"BRADLEY T. JOHNSON." 1

On the 23d of April, Governor Hicks, in compliance with the will of a majority of the people of the State, convened the Legislature, to meet in special session at Annapolis on the 26th, "to deliberate and consider of the condition of the State, and take such measures as in their wisdom they may deem fit to maintain peace, order, and security within our limits." The capital of the State being occupied by Federal troops, the Governor, on the 24th, selected Frederick City for the deliberations of the Assembly, which accordingly met at that place on the day appointed. Upon the opening of this session intense interest was felt as to the course which would be pursued in relation to secession. On the 27th, the second day of the session, the Senate settled this question in an "Address to the people of Maryland," in which it said, "We cannot but know that a large proportion of the citizens of Maryland have been induced to believe that there is a probability that our deliberations may result in the passage of some measure committing this State to secession. It is, therefore, our duty to declare that all such fears are without just foundation. We know that we have no constitutional authority to take such action. You need not fear that there is a possibility that we will do so." This address was unanimously adopted. The House of Delegates two days afterwards, on the 29th, by a ballot of fifty-three to twelve, declared that they did not possess the power to pass an ordinance of secession. On the 10th of May the Committee on Federal Relations in the House of Delegates, consisting of Messrs. S. Teackle Wallis, chairman; J. H. Gordon, S. W. Goldsborough, James T. Briscoe, and Barnes Compton, presented a report and set of resolutions, "in regard to the calling of a sovereign convention," which met the hearty approval of an overwhelming majority of the members of that body. In the House the vote stood, ayes 43, nays 12; and in the Senate, ayes 11, nays 3. On the 13th both Houses adopted a resolution providing for a committee of eight members (four from each House) to visit the President of the United States and the President of the Southern Confederacy. The committee to visit Jefferson Davis were instructed to convey the assurance that Maryland sympathized with the Confederate States, and that the people of Maryland were enlisted with their whole hearts on the side of reconciliation and peace. 2

On the 2d of May, at the evening session of the Senate, Coleman Yellott, of Baltimore, reported the following bill to provide for the safety and peace of the people of Maryland:

"Whereas, The present extraordinary state of the country and the disturbed condition of the people demand that prompt and efficient measures should be adopted by the General Assembly of Maryland to secure the safety and peace of the people, and to avoid the evils and horrors of civil war; therefore

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, That Eочек F. Chambers, of Kent County; John V. L. McMahon and Thomas Winans, of Baltimore City; Thomas G. Pratt, of Anne Arundel County; Enoch Louis Lowe, of Frederick County; and Walter Mitchell, of Charles County, together with the Governor of the State of Maryland for the time being, or whoever

1 On Dec. 29, 1860, a new military company was organized in Frederick, under the title of Frederick Mounted Dragoons. It numbered over fifty-five, and was officered as follows: Captain, Bradley T. Johnson; First Lieutenant, J. Oliver Meyers; Second Lieutenant, William Smith, Jr.; Third Lieutenant, Alfred Hoening; Cornet, Daniel McGrawville; First Orderly Sergeant, B. Henry Schley; Second Orderly Sergeant, William T. Preston; Third Orderly Sergeant, George Gallion; Fourth Sergeant, John C. Fleming; First Corporal, E. Marion Getzendanner; Second Corporal, John H. Sin; Third Corporal, Robert Q. Lewis; Fourth Corporal, Charles Miller.

Jau, 10, 1861, the United Guards of Frederick elected the following officers: Captain, Gabriel Beckley; First Lieutenant, Frederick Keefer (promoted); Second Lieutenant, Philip Bad- dey; Third Lieutenant, Henry J. Norris; Ensign, William Brad- shaw; First Sergeant, Michael Blumemener (promoted); Second Sergeant, N. J. Wilson; Third Sergeant, J. Milton McDaniel (promoted); Fourth Sergeant, Joshua T. Duyhoff (promoted); Fifth Color Sergeant, Rebeckah Bailey; First Corporal, Charles E. Albaugh (promoted); Second Corporal, Charles H. Abbot (promoted); Third Corporal, Thomas A. McDaniel (promoted); Fourth Corporal, Charles Bishop (promoted); Fifth Corporal, John H. Haller; Secretary, Edward Y. Goldsborough; Treasurer, Henry J. Norris.

2 On the 4th of May an election was held in Washington County for a member of the House of Delegates. There was but one candidate in the field, Mr. Fiery, the nominee of the Union party. The vote in the several election districts was as follows:

The bill was strenuously opposed by Messrs. Smith and Kimmell, but was ordered to a second reading by a vote of ayes 14, nays 8, as follows: Ayes, Messrs. Brooke, Blackiston, Duval, Franklin, Dashiel, Graham, Gardner, Hackart, Lynch, McKaig, Townsend, Watkins, Whitaker, Yellott; nays, Messrs. Bradley, Goldsborough, of Talbot, Goldsborough, of Dorchester, Miles, Nuttle, Smith, Stone, Kimmell. On the 4th, on motion of Senator Yellott, the bill was referred back to the Committee on Federal Relations. In the mean time many public meetings were held in Western Maryland and in other sections of the State protesting against the adoption of a measure which was regarded as simply a substitute for an ordinance of secession. On the 3d of May the citizens of District No. 7, of Washington County, assembled at Smithsburg, and adopted a memorial to the Legislature protesting against Senator Yellott's bill as unnecessary and unconstitutional. William Adams presided, J. W. Barkdoll was appointed secretary, and the resolutions of remonstrance were drafted by Dr. E. Bishop, William B. McAtee, A. C. Hildebrand, Dr. T. E. Bishop, and J. L. Vogel. A committee of ten, consisting of George Pearson, Philip Oswald, Adam Vogel, John Fessler, W. H. Eackel, Samuel House, Jeremiah Besore, John W. Barkdoll, John N. Shank, and Samuel Welty, were appointed to obtain signatures to the memorial. On the same evening a meeting of similar character was held at Clear Spring, at which Jonathan Nesbitt presided, with Dr. H. F. Berry as vice-president, and Dr. J. Rufus Smith as secretary, and resolutions were adopted declaring "that the Legislature of Maryland has been convened contrary to law; that we ignore the present assembly at Frederick as the Legislature of Maryland; that we regard it as illegally convened, illegally constituted, and engaged in revolutionary and despotic measures without a parallel in the annals of American legislation; that as true and loyal citizens of the State of Maryland we are not bound to obey the decisions of a body who have no legal constitutional existence, but that we are subserving the best interests of the State and constitution in resisting their pretensions; that the Committee of Public Safety about to be established by the so-called Legislature is an arbitrary and despotic power, not warranted by the condition of the country, but a usurpation of authority extremely dangerous to our liberties, if not to our lives and fortunes, bidding us beware of these despotic officials as the Robespierres, Marats, and Dantons of another kindred revolution." On the 6th an immense meeting was held at Cumberland to protest against the creation of the "Board of Public Safety," and Col. Charles M. Thurston was chosen president, with John Gephart, Benjamin Kegg, A. M. L. Bush, John B. Widener, Joseph Shriver, John Everett, Alpheus Beall, William Armbruster, S. M. Semmes, James J. McHenry, Lewis Smith, Samuel Luman, John Kolb, Jonathan W. Magruder, Andrew Gouder, John B. H. Campbell, William Evans, Robert Bruce, J. H. Young, John B. Hays, Alexander King, Richard D. Johnson, and Joseph Hughes as vice-presidents, and John H. Shaw, George White, Samuel Shipley, and George Deetz as secretaries. Resolutions were adopted "solemnly protesting against the lawless and desperate attempt now making in the Legislature of this State to inaugurate a military despotism by the enactment of the bill to create a committee of public safety." The Conditional Union men also held a public meeting in Cumberland, and resolved that if the general government failed to grant the Southern States certain guarantees it would become the bounden duty of Maryland to quit the Federal Union. A resolution offered by Daniel Blocher to postpone such proceedings until the conclusion of the Peace Congress then in session was followed by lengthy and violent speeches, and the meeting adjourned in the wildest disorder and confusion. All manner of opinions were entertained by the people, and nearly every shade of thought found a representative in the city, but from the very first a majority of its citizens were for the preservation of the Union under any circumstances and at all hazards.

On the 4th of May a meeting was held by the citizens of Lonacoming, and resolutions adopted condemning the action of the Legislature "in attempting to create a (so-called) committee of safety in defiance of all constitutional law." John Douglass presided, and the committee on resolutions consisted of John S. Coombs, G. E. Porter, A. Chamberlin, Alexander Shaw, Henry Hennekauf, John Bell, Andrew Speir, and Robert Cowen. A petition circulated at the meeting protesting against the passage of the bill received three hundred and fifty signatures. Great excitement was created in Frederick City by the proposed measure, and some of its opponents went so far as to threaten personal violence to Senator Yellott, and to call upon the "freetmen" to "arouse and strike for their liberties." Aweled perhaps by these popular demonstrations, the friends of the bill deemed it best not to press it further.1

On the 14th of May the Legislature adjourned until the 4th of June. When it reassembled the two committees appointed to visit the President of the United States and the President of the Confederate States made their reports. Messrs. John B. Brooke, G. W. Goldsborough, George H. Morgato, and Barnes Compton, the committee appointed to visit President Lincoln, and "secure, if possible, through the instrumentality of Maryland, peace to our distracted country, and, if failing in that, then a cessation of hostilities on the part of the armies of the Federal and Confederate troops until Congress should express its opinion on the subject which now agitates the people," submitted a report, in which they said, "These purposes being defeated in the movement of the Federal troops on Virginia, and an active commencement of hostilities, we have considered our mission as ended, and therefore have not felt authorized, on the part of the sovereign State of Maryland, to present a request which has in advance been repudiated." At the same time Messrs. Thomas J. McKaig, Coleman Yellott, and Charles A. Harding, the commissioners appointed to visit Jefferson Davis at Montgomery, Ala., presented their report, accompanied by a letter from Mr. Davis, dated May 25th, expressing his gratification at hearing that the State of Maryland was enlisted on the side of peace and reconciliation, and avowing that the Confederate government would readily entertain any proposition from the government of the United States looking to a peaceful settlement of the existing difficulties. On the 25th of June the Legislature adjourned until the 30th of July.

Previous to its adjournment, however, on the 22d of June, the Legislature passed a resolution requesting the Governor "to return to the armories of the State the arms which have been removed by his order from said armories and deposited in Fort McHenry, or placed in the hands of ununiformed companies or associations of individuals, and that he return to all regularly organized and uniformed volunteer companies of the State the arms reclaimed from them, or either of them, by his order." This resolution was immediately denounced by the friends of the Union as an attempt to disarm legal citizens and strengthen the enemies of the government, and many of the military organizations at which it was supposed to be aimed promptly expressed their determination to resist its enforcement.

On the 24th of June, two days after the passage of the resolution, the "Home Guards" of Frederick assembled at their armory and adopted the following resolutions:

1 On the 7th of May the Home Guard of Frederick City were presented with a national flag by the ladies of that place. Hon. Beverly Johnson delivered a patriotic address, to which earnest responses were made by Col. William P. Maulsby, on behalf of the Brungle Guards, and ex-Senator Cooper.
honest zeal and careful efforts in protecting the town from the villanous designs of incendiaries and unprincipled scoundrels who have been found prowling our streets at night; and

"Whereas, The present Legislature, by its high-handed legslation, unparalleled in the history of any civilized nation, have legalized riot, robbery, and bloodshed in the city of Baltimore by passing a certain law, presented by a citizen of Baltimore, one T. Parkin Scott, now unjustly and shamefully holding a seat in the Legislature of this State, and thereby taught us a lesson which must be looked upon with indignation and horror by all good citizens; and

"Whereas, We, the members of the Home Guard of Fred-errick, have organized the company for the purpose of protecting life and property from mobs and rioters, and have obtained our arms legally from the proper military authorities of the State;

"Therefore, be it unanimously Resolved, by the Home Guard of Frederick, That we will resist the enforcement of said order or requisition, if made on us, at all hazards and to the death.

"Resolved, That all the companies of Home Guards in this county be requested to concur in the above determination.

"Resolved, That the foregoing preamble and resolutions be signed by the officers of this meeting, and published in all the newspapers of the county favorable to the UNION AND TRIUMPH OF THE STARS AND STRIPES.

"LIEUT. WM. D. REESE, Chairman.

"J. A. STEINER, Secretary."

The Home Guards of Middletown, through their commanding officers, expressed their determination not to submit in the following emphatic language:

"Whereas, The secession majority of the Maryland Legislature, in their attempts to usurp the military power of the State and divest the Governor of his constitutional authority, have passed an act to disarm the Home Guards, organized and encrolled under the militia laws of the State,

"Therefore, the undersigned, captains of the Middletown Home Guards, in the name and on behalf of the companies under their respective commands, solemnly protest against this legislative usurpation and invasion of their rights as citizens, and pledge themselves, by all that freemen hold dear, to oppose to the death any and every attempt to take away their arms, under the pretended authority of the act referred to.

"And if any person or persons, under the pretended authority of the legislative usurpers, feel disposed to carry their illegal act into effect, we invite them to commence operations on the Middletown Home Guards.

"JACOB REED, Captain of Company A.

"STEPHEN R. BOWLES, Captain of Company B.

"Horatio Zittle, Captain of Company C.

"HANSON T. REED, Captain of Company D."

On the 28th of June the Home Guards of Williamsport adopted a resolution declaring that "they stood ready to co-operate with the Home Guards of Frederick and Middletown, and all other loyal citizens of our good State of Maryland, in resisting to the death any and all attempts which may be made to enforce the illegal and despotic act of the late traitoros Legislature, organized and sitting unconstitutionally at Frederick City, designed to disarm the loyal citizens of the State, and hand them over, helpless and unprotected, like our suffering neighbors of Virginia, to a ferocious military despotism, under the treason-able plea of the execrably false doctrine of State's Rights, justifying secession and rebellion." The reso}lution was signed by William B. Kennedy, captain;
S. Holenberger, first lieutenant; J. B. Masters, second lieutenant; and D. Anderson, third lieutenant. In response to these resolutions, Col. Ward H. Lamon addressed a letter to Capt. Kennedy and the officers of the Home Guards, "pledging his influence to sus-tain the loyal citizens of Maryland in their resolution to support the Federal government against all treason-able attempts to deprive them of their rights," and "assuring the loyal citizens of Maryland that the whole power of the Federal government will be exerted to sustain them in their rights."

On the 30th of July the Legislature reassembled and continued in session until the 7th of August, when it adjourned until the 17th of September.

In the mean time the State had passed into the control of the Federal government, and orders had been issued for the arrest of the secession members of the General Assembly. When the 17th of September arrived it found but few members of the Lower House in Frederick, and at one o'clock, the hour for assembling, there were but three senators in the city, Messrs. Bradley, Nuttle, and Kimmel, all of whom were Union men. Determined to prevent a session of the Legislature, they refused to enter the Senate chamber, and met for consultation at the reading-room opposite to the hall in which the General Assembly was to assemble. They had previously notified the clerk of the Senate that they proposed to consult as to their course, and would communicate their joint determination in half an hour. At the expiration of that time notice was conveyed to the clerk that there would be no meeting of the Senate, when they were informed that he had called the roll in the empty chamber, and gone through the formality of announcing that, "there being no quorum present, the Senate stands adjourned until one o'clock on Wednesday."

The Union members of the House of Delegates had also come to a similar determination to do all in their power to prevent the meeting of that body, but the opposition members who were in the city moving towards the hall, they went also, and at ten o'clock Thomas H. Moore, the reading clerk, went through the formality of calling the House to order, and proceeded to call the roll. The members present were Messrs. Salmon, Kessler, Gordon, Maccumbin, Jones, of Talbot, Strouglah, Durant, McL件tre, Long, Keene, and Mills, being seven of the Opposition to four Union members. Messrs. Naill and Fiery were in the city, but declined to go to the hall. There were but four responses, and Mr. Long immediately moved that the House adjourn until noon on Wednesday.

The refusal of the Senate to convene, it was argued, had virtually annulled any legal assemblage of the Legislature, though the clerks declared their intention to continue to call the roll daily until a quorum should appear, denying the right of less than a quorum to adjourn the body.

A few minutes after the formality of opening the Legislature had thus been gone through with by the clerks, and they had dispersed, small squads of the Wisconsin regiment, each under charge of an officer, were observed moving through the city, all taking different directions towards the outskirts. Thus in about a half-hour a cordon of armed pickets circles the entire town, with instructions to allow no one to pass out without a written permit from a member of Gen. Banks’ staff, who had been appointed provost-marshal. This had scarcely been accomplished before a squad of police-officers from Baltimore, consisting of Lieut. Carmichael, Sergt. Wallis, Sergt. Watt, and Officer West, accompanied by a military escort of the Third Wisconsin Regiment, Col. T. H. Ruger, which had been encamped for some days near the railroad depot, commenced to search the city for parties they were ordered to arrest. In the course of the 17th and 18th the following arrests were made:

Thomas H. Moore, reading clerk of House.
William Kilgour, clerk of Senate.
S. P. Cormack, assistant clerk of Senate.
John N. Brewer, reading clerk of Senate.
William E. Salmon, of Frederick, House of Delegates.

Thomas J. Claggett, of Frederick, House of Delegates.
Andrew Kessler, of Frederick, House of Delegates.
Josiah H. Gordon, of Allegany, House of Delegates.

Richard C. Maceubbin, of Anne Arundel, House of Delegates.

D. Bernard Mills, of Carroll County, House of Delegates.
William R. Miller, of Cecil, House of Delegates.
Clark J. Durant, St. Mary’s, House of Delegates.
J. Lawrence Jones, Talbot, House of Delegates.

The following citizens were also arrested: John W. Elkins and John Hagan, with E. A. Hanson, William Mason, William Hanson, and his two sons.

E. Riley, editor of the Annapolis Republican and printer of the House, was also arrested.

The sudden embargo on egress from the city, without previous notice, soon occasioned considerable excitement. The pickets were stationed on every road and across every field, and no one could leave without a pass. One gentleman who lived about ten steps beyond the picket-guard was compelled to return to town, and all manner of vehicles soon commenced to move towards the headquarters of Col. Ruger. Among others, Col. Maulsbys’s carriage was turned back for a pass. The passes were given freely to those who could prove their loyalty, and in order to facilitate operations Gen. Shriver attended at head-quarters, at the request of citizens, to identify the applicants.

The prisoners were all taken to the barracks as fast as arrested, and when Dr. Jones, of Talbot, was arrested on Wednesday morning, the guards around the town were withdrawn, and the ancient city of Frederick again fell back into the control of the civil authorities.

There were various rumors in circulation as to the purposes of the majority of the Legislature, had that body been permitted to assemble. “It is, however, known,” says a contemporary account, “that letters have been intercepted by the First Maryland Regiment, Col. Kenly, looking to a collusion between the Legislature and Gen. Johnston, as to his crossing the Potomac with a Confederate army and occupying Frederick, and the simultaneous passage of a secession ordinance under the protection of Confederate bayonets. It is also asserted that when one of the Frederick delegates was arrested a similar letter from Virginia was found in his possession.” On Tuesday evening (the 17th), immediately after the arrest of the officers of the Legislature, nearly thirty thousand copies of the report of Mr. Wallis on Federal Relations were seized by order of the provost-marshal and taken to the camp of the Wisconsin regiment, where they furnished the materials for a grand conflagration. At the preceding session of the Legislature fifty thousand copies of this document were ordered to be printed, and when seized were in readiness for mailing.

At noon (Wednesday, the 18th) the train brought up Messrs. Miller, of Cecil, McCoy, of Harford, Bayless, of Harford, and Lawson, of Somerset, and immediately on its arrival Mr. Miller was arrested and conveyed to the guard-house. The others being loyal men, were welcomed by their Union friends, and returned in the afternoon with their colleagues to Baltimore on their way home. Mr. Steake, of Washington County, also arrived Wednesday morning, and approved of the action of his Union colleagues.

The afternoon train, which usually left Frederick at one o’clock, was detained until three to bring down the prisoners, the delay being permitted for the purpose of giving the officers of the Legislature an opportunity to obtain their discharge by taking the oath of allegiance, which was administered to E. Riley, Milton Y. Kidd, Thomas H. Moore, William Kilgour, and S. P. Cormack, who were then released. John N. Brewer, reading clerk of the Senate, refused to take the oath, and was sent off on the train with the members of the House, who were not allowed to take it.

Mr. Marshall, postmaster of the House, was arrested just as the cars were about to start, and marched back to headquarters to take the oath. At three o'clock on Wednesday, the 18th, the prisoners were brought from the barracks and marched under guard of a company of Wisconsin military to the cars, and an armed guard seated with each of them, the remainder of the car being filled with soldiers. The arrested parties were at first confined in Fort McHenry, and were finally sent to Fort Lafayette with those arrested in Baltimore.

The following correspondence, with the endorsements, captured in Frederick in 1862 by Gen. "Stone-wall" Jackson from Gen. N. P. Banks, contains the secret history of this memorable transaction:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, Sept. 11, 1861.

"GENERAL,—The passage of an act of secession by the Legislature of Maryland must be prevented. If necessary, all or any part of the members must be arrested. Exercise your own judgment as to the time and manner, but do the work effectively.

"Very respectfully your obedient servant,

"Simon Cameron, Secretary of War.

"HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,

"WASHINGTON, Sept. 12, 1861.

"CONFIDENTIAL—MAJ.-GEN. N. P. BANKS, U.S.A.:

"GENERAL,—After full consultation with the President, Secretaries of State, War, etc., it has been decided to effect the operation proposed for the 17th. Arrangements have been made to have a government steamer at Annapolis to receive the prisoners and carry them to their destination. Some four or five of the chief men in the affair are to be arrested to-day. When they meet on the 17th, you will have pleasure prepared to arrest the whole party, and be sure that none escape. It is understood that you arranged with Gen. Dix and Governor Seward the words operandi. It has been intimated to me that the meeting might take place on the 14th; please be prepared. I shall be glad to have you advise me frequently of your arrangements in regard to this very important matter. If it is successfully carried out it will go far towards breaking the backbone of the Rebellion. It would probably be well to have a special train quietly prepared to take the prisoners to Annapolis. This will exceedingly important affair to your tact and discretion, and have but one thing to impress upon you—the absolute necessity of secrecy and success.

"With the highest regard, I am, my dear general, your sincere friend,

"Geo. B. McClellan, Maj.-Gen. U.S.A."

Copeland's report, Legislature, September 16th.

"FREDERICK, Sept. 16, 1861.

"DEAR SIR,—I find that there is some probability of no quorum,—this is particularly Gen. S. S.'s opinion. He thinks the whole thing is crushed by the arrest. But there is reason to believe he is mistaken. Noakes is here, and says there are at least twenty-five in town; that they have spread the rumor that there will be no quorum in order to fail attention, but that there will be enough to meet and adjourn to a place outside of the town. He saw to-night four carriages and a party of men come in one of the back roads and go to a drinking-saloon, where they were loud and deep in threats and imprecations; they left the tavern and came into the town and separated, where he could not tell, as he was on foot. He has got no evidence of any messenger from Virginia,—thinks no one is here. But there is one bad thing: Gen. Dix has sent his son here, and a major, and the youngest marshal of V,—and party of police to make arrests. I have tried to get them sent back early in the first train to-morrow, accompanied at least as far as Monocacy by Mr. Dix. He does not like to get up and go at that time. It is a mistake. Gen. S. has no particular information and wants to shield some personal friends,—would like, for the future, to make it easy for some men. I think that I shall get a plan arranged to take a number at any rate. The arrests in B. have terrified them very much, and all profess obedience there. None of the members from the Eastern Shore have come up yet, which inclines me to wait for day after to-morrow. I regret your letters to Col. R. did not put the matter more under my especial control, as he is rather disinclined to be as careful and patient as is desirable, and I do not feel authorized to direct. If anything occurs to you send by messenger to me, care of Col. R. I am at the U. S. Hotel.

"In haste, very respectfully,

"R. M. Copeland.

"Young Dix tells me his errand was to meet you, and give you a list of names of men to be arrested,—nothing more. He will give me the paper to-morrow and await orders. You will get this at six,—a messenger can return in three hours.

Copy of letter of instructions concerning Legislature.

"HEADQUARTERS, CAMP NEAR DARNESTOWN,

"16th September.

"LT.-COL. RUGER, Commanding Third Wisconsin Reg't.

"On special service at Frederick:

"Sir,—The Legislature of Maryland is appointed to meet in special session to-morrow, Tuesday, September 17th. It is not impossible that the members or a portion of them may be deterred from meeting there, on account of certain arrests recently made in Baltimore. It is also quite possible that on the first day of meeting the attendance of members may be small. Of the facts as to this matter, I shall see that you are well informed as they transpire. It becomes necessary that any meeting of this Legislature, at any place or time, shall be prevented. You will hold yourself and your command in readiness to arrest the members of both Houses. A list of such as you are to detain will be inclosed to you herewith; among them are to be especially included the presiding officers of the two Houses, secretaries, clerks, and all subordinate officers. Let the arrests be certain, and allow no chance of failure. The arrests should be made while they are in session, I think. You will, upon receipt of this, quietly examine the premises, I am informed that escape will be impossible if the entrance to the building be held by you; of that you will judge upon examination. If no session is held, you will arrest such members as can be found in Frederick. The process of arrest should be to enter both houses at the same time, announcing that they were arrested by orders of the Government; command them to remain, as they are subject to your orders. Any resistance will be forcibly suppressed, whatever the consequences. Upon the arrests being affected, the members that are to be detained will be placed on board a special train for Annapolis, where a steamer will await them. Everything in the execution of these orders is confined to your secrecy, discretion, and promptness."

Copeland’s report, Maryland Legislature, September 17th.

"FREDERICK, Md., Sept. 17, 1861.

"Dear Sir,—The arrests in Baltimore have entirely broken down and disorganized the secession element in the Legislature, and much less than a quorum have assembled. Of the memers present the larger number are Union men, who, encourgaged by our presence, are here to face the enemy. I have had pleckets set since noon in all the roads leading to this place, with orders to let no one go out unless down to Frederick Junction, with a trusty man to see who should come up and make arrangements for them,—only seven came. We find that there are only about six bad specimens here, but that there is a chance that more may arrive. We have spotted the house where these men board, and shall arrest them to-night. I have let the train go to B—— with a sergeant, who will come up on the train, and will report on the small road leading to a car-tage. As yet the Legislature has not convened; when it does I shall have the trap sprung on them. Your letter has just arrived. I will attend to it as you wish. You have by this time learned of the arrests in Baltimore yesterday, which has alarmed all.
I sent Mr. Dix and the policemen away on the train and went my-self, as we were surrounded by a crowd in which were ten of the worst men. They now think we are all gone, and two of the policemen returned afoot. Noakes is on the watch to find out where every man lives, and I do not think we can fail to get some; but the worst men are too wary to come here. I shall send this to you just as soon as I can find a messenger, and shall telegraph when the arrest is completed. Gen. S, and all his friends believe that nothing can be effected, as those whom we shall take are the least conspicuous. I shall arrest the clerks of the two Houses, who are mentioned as particularly venomous. Nothing more occurs to me now. I will add whatever happens later.

"Truly, your obedient servant,

"R. Morris Copeland."

"To Maj.-Gen. N. P. Banks:

"It is now 5 p.m. We have arrested twelve of the worst men, and are progressing very well. We shall get the whole eighteen I think, and if any come in on the train to-night we will bag them too. Gen. S. is invaluable. We have been besieged for passes,—every avenue being blocked. It has taken three men all the time to write and inquire into the merits of the case. No news from Virginia: all seems quiet as far as we can learn. The House met to-day; was called to order by the clerk; four members present, and adjourned until to-morrow at noon."

"Respectfully,

"R. M. C."

Copeland’s report of arrest of members of the Maryland Legislature, September 18th.

"FREDERICK, Md., Sept. 18, 1861.

"Sir,—I have just telegraphed to Gen. Dix that we have seized seven members of the House of a very bitter character,
Headquarters, Camp near Darnestown.

Sept. 20, 1861.

Mal. Gen. McCook, Commanding Army of Potomac:

Boy. W. H. Stewart, Secretary of State:

Sim.—I have the honor to report, in obedience to the orders of the Secretary of War and the general commanding the Army of the Potomac, transmitted to me by letter of the 12th instant, that all the members of the Maryland Legislature assembled at Frederick City on the 17th instant known or suspected to be disloyal in their relations to the government have been arrested. The opening of the session was attended chiefly by Union men, and after rigid examination but nine secession members were found in the city. These were arrested, with the clerk of the Senate, and sent to Annapolis, according to my orders, on the 18th instant, under guard, and safely lodged on board a government steamer in waiting for them. Of their destination thence I had no direction. The names of the parties thus arrested and disposed of were as follows, viz.: B. F. Salmon, Frederick; William B. Miller, Cecil County; J. H. Gordon, Allegany County; Lawrence Jones, Talbot County; Bernard Mills, Carroll County; R. C. McCubbins, Annapolis; Thomas Claggott, Frederick; Clark J. Durant, St. Mary's County; Andrew Kesler, Jr., Frederick; J. N. Brewer, chief clerk of the Senate. No meeting of the Senate occurred. But three senators were in town, and these were Union men. Three subordinate officers of the Senate, the chief clerk and printer of the House, and one or two citizens were also arrested, but released after the departure of the members for Annapolis upon taking the oath of allegiance. Milton Kidd, clerk of the House, is, in the last stages of consumption, beyond the power of doing harm, and was released upon taking the oath and making a solemn declaration to act no further with the Legislature under any circumstances whatever. This course was adopted upon the urgent solicitation of the Union members of the Legislature present. The same parties desired the release of C. G. McCubbin, of Annapolis, upon the same conditions. I telegraphed to the commander of the steamer that he might be left at Annapolis under sufficient guard until the orders of the government could be ascertained. Col. Ruger, Third Wisconsin Regiment, my aide-de-camp, and a detachment of police rendered efficient aid. Sufficient information was obtained as to preparation for board, etc., to lead to the belief that the attendance of members would have been large had not the arrests of some of the leaders been made at Baltimore on Saturday and Monday before the day of meeting. I regret the attempt at Frederick was not more successful.

Classification of the Members of the Legislature. A classification of the members of the Legislature is given, in which the numbers from one to four attached to their names indicates the intensity of secession principles. Among these we find the following bad cases: R. M. Denison, 4; J. W. Dennis, 4; John Brown, 4; G. W. Goldsborough, 4; Barnes Compton, 3; H. M. Warfield, 3; T. Parkin Scott, 3; S. Teackle Wallis, 3; W. H. Legg, 3; G. Kilborn, 3. In the Senate: Franklin Whittaker, 4; Coleman Yellett, 4; Thomas J. McKaig, 3; Teagle Townsend, 3.

Suggestions of Arrest—Altered Composition of the Legislature. I suggest the arrest of the following members. J. A. D.: Senate: Anne Arundel, Thomas Franklin; Cecil, John J. Heckart; Charles, John F. Gardiner; Dorchester, Charles F. Goldsborough; Harford, Franklin Whittaker; Howard, John S. Watkins; Kent, David C. Blackston; Prince George's, John B. Brooke; St. Mary's, Oscar Miles. McKaig, of Alleghany, and Lynch of Baltimore City, is in Richmond, Teagle Townsend, of Worcester, should not be arrested—great rascal. House: Allegany, Josiah H. Gordon and William B. Bernard; Anne Arundel, B. Allen Welch, McCubbin E. H. Kilborn; Calvert, James T. Biscoe and Benjamin Parma; Caroline, G. W. Goldsborough; Carroll, Bernard Milly, Cecil, James M. Maxwell and W. Miller; Charles, Barnes Compton; Frederick, Andrew Kesler, Jr., Thomas J. Claggott, N. E. Salmon and John A. Johnson; Howard, John R. Brown; Kent, Philip P. Raising; Prince George's, E. Pliny Bryan, Richard Wooten, Ethan A. Jones; Montgomery, Howard Griffith; Queen Anne, William H. Legg, William L. Sharkey; St. Mary's, Clark J. Durant, George H. Morgan; Somerset, James W. Dennis; Talbot, Alexander Chaplin, J. Lawrence Jones; Washington, Martin Eakle, John C. Brining; Worcester, George W. Landing, Wallis, Pitt, Scott, Sangton, Morit, Williams, Thomas, Harrison, and Warfield, of Baltimore City, and Denison and Quinlan, of Baltimore County, are in custody.

The list I marked with you has been carefully revised and corrected by the Legislative journals, so that the propriety of the foregoing selection is unquestionable.

The following correspondence relating to the State election of November, 1861, also captured from Gen. N. P. Banks by Gen. T. J. Jackson at the same time, will be found of interest in this connection:

Custom-house, Collector's Office.

Baltimore, Oct. 17, 1861.

Dear Genl.—Your note in reply to my request was received this morning. I owe you many thanks for the prompt order given to Major Gauld and the trouble you have taken to furnish me with so speedy an acknowledgment.

So far as we are able to perceive there will be no regular or serious opposition to the Union State ticket.

The peace men will struggle to maintain their supremacy in one branch of the Legislature (Senate), and to prevent which it will be necessary for us to carry the doubtful and hard-to-contest counties of Queen Anne's, Calvert, and Prince George. To this end and purpose we shall devote all our energies until the day of election.

The bold and vigorous policy inaugurated by yourself whilst in command here has been productive of the most salutary results. We no longer hear the mutterings of secession upon the corners of the streets. As one decided step has followed another, the mutterings have grown fainter each day, until secession, if it has not become extinct, has at least been subdued and thoroughly humiliated.

I have no fears that the result of the election in November will not be a complete vindication of the loyalty and patriotic devotion of Maryland to the Union and Constitution as made by our Fathers.

Once again accept my thanks for your kindness, and sincerely your friend.

Henry W. Hoffman

Gov. Hicks in relation to election. Received November 1st, answered at once by telegraph.

"STATE [State] MARYLAND.

"EXECUTIVE CHAMBERS,

"Annapolis, Oct. 26, 1861.

"Maj.-Gen. N. P. Banks, U.S.A.:

"My Dear sir,—I should have written at an earlier day, but delayed for return of Gen. W. Howard, who had been sent down the Potomac by Maj.-Gen. McClellan, and soon after his (H.'s) return the papers represented you to have gone with your forces into Virginia. Indeed I dislike to occupy a moment of your closely occupied time, and write now only because I feel it due from me in view of your uniform courtesy and kindness to me, of which I shall always entertain most grateful recollections. You will excuse me, I am sure, for suggesting the importance of looking closely to Maryland until our election is over, 6th November.

"The Confederates will endeavor to effect something by which to operate on our elections. You may suppose, my dear sir, that I am anxious to have a killing majority rolled up against secessionism. Not only am I and is Maryland deeply interested, but the Government is greatly concerned. Will it be possible to have Col. Kenly's regiment placed near Baltimore temporarily so as to save their vote? I hope so. I have the honor to be with very great respect,

"Yours ob't serv't,

"Tho. H. Hicks."

"Maj.-Gen. N. P. Banks, Commanding, etc.:

"General,—Pursuant to directions from the Secretary of War of the 28th instant, of which I inclose a copy, the major-general commanding directs that such soldiers of the First, Second, and Third Regiments of Maryland Volunteers as may be within the limits of your command receive furloughs for such a length of time as will enable them to reach the place wherein they may be entitled to vote by the 6th of November. Wherever it may be necessary, in order to facilitate the presence of these men at their place of voting, to furnish them transportation, it may be furnished. It is desired that the most liberal and prompt circulation may be given to these instructions in order to secure with certainty the carrying into effect the design proposed. Sufficient time is to be allowed the soldiers thus furloughed to enable them to return after voting, without exceeding the term fixed for their furlough; but a prompt return is desired.

"Whenever it may be necessary, the absent soldiers should be replaced for the time by other troops.

"The general commanding desires that the receipt of this communication be acknowledged at once.

Instructions from R. B. Marcy, Chief of Staff, concerning Maryland elections.

"HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,

"Washington, Oct. 29, 1861.

"General.—There is an apprehension among Union citizens in many parts of Maryland of an attempt at interference with their rights of suffrage by disunionists on the occasion of the election to take place on the 6th of November next. In order to prevent this, the major-general commanding directs that you send detachments of a sufficient number of men to the different points in your vicinity where the elections are to be held to protect the Union voters, and to see that no disunionists are allowed to intimidate them, or in any way to interfere with their rights.

"He also desires you to arrest and hold in confinement till after the election all disunionists who are known to have returned from Virginia recently and who show themselves at the polls, and to guard effectually against any invasion of the peace and order of the elections. For the purpose of carrying out these instructions you are authorized to suspend the 'habeas corpus.' Gen. Stone has received similar instructions to these. You will please confer with him as to the particular points that each shall take the control of.

"I am, sir, very respectfully,

"Your ob't serv't,

"To Maj.-Gen. N. P. Banks,

"Commanding division, Muddy Branch, Md."

Gen. Shriver, Frederick, on election districts in Frederick County. No answer.

"FREDERICK, Nov. 1, 1861.

"Gen. N. P. Banks:

"My Dear Sir,—On my return home to-night your favor of the 30th ult. was handed me by Capt. Stone. In one county there are two or three districts in which our friends apprehend interference by disloyal men on election-day. I have consulted with some of our most reliable friends, and we all concur in the opinion that a body of men thrown into Frederick on Monday and Tuesday next, and then divided into squads and placed in the different districts of the county on the day of election, will not only prevent disloyal men from interfering with and overwhelming our friends, but will have the additional effect of keeping such men from the polls. Cavalry would answer better than infantry, as our county is divided into seventeen districts, and some of them twenty and twenty-five miles off in a mountainous country. I would also suggest that whatever force is sent here be placed under command of Capt. Stone, who seems fully to understand the duty to be performed. In the First Maryland Regiment, commanded by Col. Kenly, there are at least fifty men entitled to their votes in our county,—they are principally to be found in the company commanded by Capt. H. H. Schley,—we should be gratified to have these men sent home to the election.

"With great respect, I am very truly yours,

against them. On the evening of my departure a number of the enemy were seen half-way up the mountain opposite Point of Rocks. I had one of the guns taken down, and fired several shells among them, which put them to flight without an answering shot.

"I have reliable authority from Leesburg that many of the troops at that point have been called off in the direction of Loudounville, at or near which place it is the intention of the rebels to give battle to our troops. The same authority informs me that a large number of troops have been withdrawn from Manassas and sent to Charleston, under the personal command of Beauregard. I have information that there is but one regiment at Leesburg. If it is desirable to take the place, this would be a favorable opportunity to do so.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"Jno. W. Geary,

"Col. Twenty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, commanding post."

CHAPTER XI.

THE FIRST YEAR OF THE CIVIL WAR.

Organizing Maryland Troops in Defense of the Union—Picket Firing on the Potomac—Evacuation of Harper's Ferry—Invasion of Virginia—Battle of Leesburg—The Federal Defeat at Manassas—Jackson's Brilliant Campaign in the Valley—Marylanders in the Union Army—Devotion of the People to the Union—Enrolling Officers.

While these events in the civil and political history of the State were in progress, war between the sections had been recognized as inevitable, and military preparations actively commenced on both sides. Owing to the unsettled condition of affairs in Maryland, Governor Hicks did not comply with President Lincoln's first call for troops until the 14th of May, when he issued a proclamation "calling for four regiments of volunteers for three months, to serve within the limits of Maryland or for the defense of the capital of the United States, and not to serve beyond the limits aforesaid." In consequence of the delay and the short time they were to serve, the government did not accept any of the three months' men offered by the State, but on the 3d of May the President called for forty-two thousand and thirty-four volunteers, to serve for three years, and a large number who had enlisted under the first call immediately joined companies that were enlisting under the second.1

1 Immediately after the President's call was issued, John R. Kenly, then a prominent member of the Baltimore bar, and a number of other citizens of the State, proceeded to organize military companies for the support of the Federal government. By the 14th of May two full regiments were organized and placed under the command of Brig.-Gen. Kenly (Maryland Militia). In consequence of the short term for which they were called upon to serve they were declared by the government, and on the 16th of May, 1861, they were disbanded by Gen. Kenly, with his thanks for "taking up arms for the maintenance of the Union."
Under this call Hon. James Cooper, of Frederick City, was appointed by the War Department a brigadier-general, and assigned to the duty of raising and organizing the volunteers of the State. Recruiting offices were immediately opened in Baltimore and elsewhere, and vigorous measures instituted for the enlistment of men. In a short time the First Maryland Regiment was organized, and Col. John R. Kenly, a gallant soldier of the Mexican war, was appointed its commander, and at once proceeded to put it into condition for active service. Company H of this regiment, commanded by Capt. Benjamin H. Schley, was formed by the consolidation of two detachments of about equal strength,—one raised by Capt. Schley at Frederick, and the other by Capt. William H. Taylor at Baltimore. On Sunday evening, July 7th, the First took its departure from Baltimore, under com-Cooper, and proceeded by rail to Frederick City.
A march of eight miles over the Western turnpike on the afternoon of the 8th brought the regiment to its first bivouac, near Middletown. The next night, after a march of sixteen miles, it bivonacked on Antietam Creek, beyond Boonsboro', and on the 10th marched to Downsville, Washington Co., where it encamped.
Col. Kenly resumed command of the regiment at this place on the 16th of July, and on the 23d the First moved its camp to Williamsport, three miles distant. About this time several of the companies were detached and stationed at different points along the Potomac, from Williamsport to the mouth of the Antietam, to guard the fords and ferries of the river; and although some of these posts were several times attacked, especially that opposite Shepherdstown, Va., they were maintained, and no successful crossing by the Confederates was effected while the First Maryland remained at these points.

In the mean time other regiments and "home guards" were organized in various sections of the State, and were soon in active service.

The Southern sympathizers were not idle; finding that they could not succeed in securing the secession of the State, they determined that Maryland should not be wholly unrepresented in the Confederate armies.
Large numbers of volunteers flocked to the Southern colors, and were enrolled in the Confederate service, among whom were Capt. Bradley T. Johnson, of Frederick, who, on the 8th of May, 1861, joined the Confederate forces at Harper's Ferry with a company which he had raised in his native county.¹

On the 23d of May a sharp skirmish occurred at McCoy's Ferry, on the Potomac, about a mile and a half above the Four Locks. The Virginia side of the river was guarded by the Virginians from Camp Allen, opposite Williamsport, under Col. Allen, and the Maryland side by the home guard of Clear Spring. The Virginians were anxious to capture the ferry-boat, carry it to the opposite side of the river, and thus secure possession of the ferry. On the 22d of May, Col. Allen commanded some of his men to take the ferry-boat that night at any risk, and the attempt was made about two o'clock Thursday morning. The Clear Spring Guards had retired to a house in the vicinity, but had been there only a few minutes when one of them thought he heard the sound of ears or of setting poles.
He ran out, and saw a half-dozen men in the ferryboat making for the Virginia shore. He gave the alarm, and the guards sprang to their arms and rushed out to the bank. They hailed the Confederates three times but received no answer, when the command was given to fire. The Confederate troops in the boat returned the fire. Again the guards fired, and again it was returned, when the Confederates, thinking it was getting a little too hot, jumped into a skiff which they had with them and made for Virginia, leaving the ferry-boat to float down the river.

The morning fog was rising on the river, and the guards could not see how much damage was done;
but it is supposed that one of the Confederate soldiers was killed and another wounded, as one of their number seemed to be missing, and when they left the skiff one was heard to say to a comrade, "Jim, can you got out without help?" Not one of the guards was injured. The boat was recaptured and taken to a place of safety on the Maryland side of the Potomac.
Another skirmish occurred at Lemon's Ferry on the 1st of June. Camp Allen was broken up on the last day of May, but two companies of Confederates were left to guard the ferry. These retired on the same night, and on Saturday morning a company of Confederate cavalry and a company of riflemen were sent with orders to sink the ferry-boat.

The cavalry left about nine o'clock, and the rifle company (Capt. Patrick's) proceeded to sink the boat. They had accomplished their design before it was discovered on the opposite shore. As soon as it

¹ On the following day a body of thirty-seven men under Capt. Henry Wellmore, another of nineteen under Capt. Price, and another of about eighty under Capt. C. C. Edelin, passed through Frederick on their way to join the Southern forces at Harper's Ferry. On the 13th, about one o'clock at night, a train of two or three cars, filled with Federal troops from the Relay House, arrived in Frederick. The officer in charge, in company with several citizens of Frederick, visited the barracks and remonstrated the position, but returned soon after to the Relay House with his command, which did not leave the cars.
was discovered that they had sunk the boat, an officer of the Williamsport Guards stepped to the shore and commanded the Virginians to leave the boat in twenty minutes, or he would fire upon them. The twenty minutes passed; the fire was opened and returned. Capt. Patrick sent a dispatch for aid. A brisk fire was kept up, the balls whistling over the men's heads, till some seventy shots were exchanged. A few splinters were knocked from the bridge and trees, but no one was injured. The Union men saw that they were wasting ammunition, of which they had but little, and the firing ceased. Soon the Virginia cavalry were seen coming back down the turnpike at full speed. It was known that the Confederates had artillery and thousands of soldiers at no great distance. Soon after dinner the Virginia soldiers were seen to enter the ferry-boat and lighten her; soon she floated again. Some soldiers were put on board, and also three of the ferryman's sons, and they began to make their way down the river. It was evident that they intended to take her around to Falling Waters. The presence of the ferryman's three boys in the boat, who had been pressed into the service, prevented the Federals from firing into her; they were unwilling to kill them, so the boat passed on. She had proceeded about a quarter of a mile, when a squad of the guards started in pursuit. The Virginia soldiers ran the boat against the Virginia bank and fled to the woods near by. Under a flag of truce (in the form of a man stripped to the skin and swimming the river), a message was sent to them that they could take the boat no farther except at their peril. Reinforcements were then sent down to the Virginia soldiers with axes to cut the boat in pieces, when they were again informed that the first man who entered the boat with an axe in his hand would be shot dead on the spot. Under these circumstances the Confederate captain deemed it advisable to take the boat back to the ferry and sink her there.1

On the 24th of May the first forward movement of the Federal forces from Washington took place under the command of Gen. J. K. F. Mansfield. The entire force, consisting of thirteen thousand men, proceeded to cross the Potomac, and took possession of Alexandria and all the heights which commanded Washington on the Virginia side of the river. The Confederates having occupied Harper's Ferry in large force, under command of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, the Federals commenced operations to recapture it. With this view a large force was collected at Chambersburg, Pa., under Maj.-Gen. W. H. Keim. On the 2d of June, Maj.-Gen. Robert Patterson took command of this force, and soon after, with an army of ten or twelve thousand men, made a forward movement by way of Hagerstown towards Harper's Ferry, while another force moved up the north bank of the Potomac from the District of Columbia. Gen. Patterson's command reached Hagerstown on Saturday, the 15th of June, the First Pennsylvania Regiment, under Col. Yohe, forming the advance, and being followed by the Second Pennsylvania, under Col. Stambaugh, the Seventh Regiment, Col. Irwin, the Eighth Regiment, Col. Emley, accompanied by Gen. Williams and staff, the Tenth Regiment, Col. Meredith, and the Scott Legion, Col. Gray. At the same time a large force, under Gen. Cadwallader, passed down the Green castle turnpike to Williamsport. Col. Yohe's, with the Third and Twenty-fourth Pennsylvania Regiments, encamped on the lands of Mr. Hunter, a short distance below Funkstown; the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Pennsylvania Regiments, Col. Starkweather's Wisconsin Regiment, the Eleventh Pennsylvania, and the Fourth Connecticut encamped in a field on the Baltimore turnpike belonging to Jonathan Hager, about a mile and a half from Hagerstown; while another portion of the army encamped near the College of St. James, where it remained only one night, moving the next day to Williamsport for the purpose of crossing the Potomac. Near the Franklin Railroad, just beyond the suburbs of Hagerstown, Capt. Dobblesday and his men of Fort Sumter renown encamped, and attracted quite a large share of public attention. Maj.-Gen. Patterson and staff occupied the Hagerstown Female Seminary as the headquarters of the army. The court hall at Hagerstown was occupied as a guardhouse, and the market-house and town hall were used for the storage of munitions and provisions. The Hagers town Academy and the county hall were subsequently converted into hospitals. The large field belonging to the estate of Michael Hammond, on the southwestern suburbs of Hagerstown, was used as a sort of wagonyard by the government. Speaking of these first stirring scenes of the war, a contemporaneous account says, "Our town and surrounding neighborhood resemble a vast military camp. Soldiers are seen in every street, and guards on almost every corner. Companies are constantly parading, and strains of music are wafted to the ear on every breeze. On the Sabbath long lines of bristling bayonets glittered in our streets, and the peals of church-bells blended with the stirring notes of the drum and fife, presenting a striking

1 On the 5th of June, — Rench, a young man about twenty-three years of age, visited Williamsport on business, and becoming involved in an altercation with some members of the Horse Guard, fired upon them, when they returned his fire, killing him instantly.
During the latter part of June the first division of Gen. Patterson's army, with the exception of Col. Burnside's Rhode Island regiment and battery, and the Second and Third United States Infantry, which had been sent to Washington, was quartered on the banks of the Potomac, at Williamsport and its vicinity. Of the second division, which had encamped near Funkstown and Hagerstown, Col. Yoke's regiment was at Frederick, and Col. Owens', Col. Johnson's, and Col. Oakford's, regiments, commanded by Brig.-Gen. Negley, were at Sharpsburg, where they had been sent to occupy the Maryland Heights opposite the Ferry. Company F, Fourth United States Artillery, with six batteries, commanded by Capt. Perkins, was encamped on the Agricultural Fairgrounds, near Hagerstown. On the 20th of June, Maj. Doubleday, who had also been encamped near Hagerstown, marched to Williamsport, where he placed his batteries in position to command the opposite side of the river.

On the 21st of June the following special order, No. 42, was issued by Col. Burnside from Camp Sprague, the headquarters of the First Regiment of Rhode Island Volunteers:

"The colonel commanding the First Regiment Rhode Island Volunteers would hereby acknowledge the kindness and generosity of the citizens of Greensastle, Pa., Williamsport, Hagerstown, Boonsboro', and Middletown, Md., as shown by the very cordial reception given to the command. Particular thanks are due to the citizens of Frederick City, Md., for the hearty welcome which they extended, and the lavish hospitality which they dispensed, to the regiment. Their good will is fully reciprocated, and their kindness will long be gratefully remembered."

his company of some seventy-five men in line of battle, and awaited the approach of the enemy.

A reconnoitring party was sent out to carefully feel the enemy, and ascertain his force and whereabouts. The supposed Confederates were to be seen on the hill beyond Col. J. G. Lynn's residence manoeuvring: still they came no closer. The reconnoitring party came back and reported that the supposed Confederates were about fifty German Catholic priests (who were then located at Sta. Peter and Paul's Church) taking their daily exercises. The harmless priests thereafter selected quite another direction for their recreation and innocent manoeuvring.—Lowndesville.

On the 19th of June, Hon. Richard H. Alvey, of Hagerstown, and now one of the associate judges of the Maryland Court of Appeals, was arrested by order of Gen. Patterson; on the 12th of July, John W. Baughman, of Frederick, was arrested by the Federal authorities; on the 25th of August, Senator Thomas J. McKaig, of Allegany, and other prominent citizens of the county, were arrested.

On the 2d of July, Silas Hines, a citizen of Rohrersville, Washington Co., was shot and killed by a Federal picket near Keedysville. Mr. Hines was challenged by the sentinel, but either did not hear the summons or did not understand it, and, falling to halt, was fired upon and killed.

contrast with the order and quietude which usually mark the holy day in our midst." The troops were hospitably entertained by the citizens of Hagerstown, and many substantial attentions were shown both officers and privates.

As Gen. Patterson's forces approached Harper's Ferry the Confederates evacuated the Maryland Heights, which they had for some time occupied, and where they had some artillery mounted, and fell back to their main body on the Virginia side of the river. On the 15th of June, Gen. Johnston, after deciding that Harper's Ferry was untenable, evacuated it and retreated towards Winchester. Before leaving the place he destroyed the fine bridge over the Potomac, the government buildings, and forty-six locomotives and over three hundred cars, valued at five hundred thousand dollars, belonging to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. The railroad bridge at Martinsburg was also destroyed.

Col. Wallace with the Eleventh Indiana Regiment was stationed at Cumberland, and on the 15th of June intelligence was received that a force of from three to five thousand Confederate troops were in Romney, and were about to march upon Cumberland. Intense excitement was created by the news, the Continentals and Union Home Guards were called to arms, dispatches were sent to the various military organizations of the county for aid, and every preparation was made for defense. A military company from Frostburg, under Maj. F. A. Mason, another under Col. Petrie, from Wellersburg, Pa., and others from Grantsville, Centreville, and Bedford, responded promptly to the call, but the report proved to be false, and there was no necessity for their services.

1 A. H. Hager, of Hagerstown, equipped his colored servant, Dan Fox, eighteen years of age, and made a present of his services to Col. W. H. Irwin, of the Seventh Pennsylvania Regiment, for an indefinite period, or as long as the war should last.

2 On the arrival of the Rhode Island regiment in Frederick City, in June, 1861, an attempt was made to mob the office of the Herald, which was supposed to sympathize with the South. The prompt intervention of Col. Burnside and other officers saved the office from destruction.

3 Cumberland was very much exposed to the dashes of the enterprising Confederate commands that operated in the counties south of it. Many were the panics produced by movements of Imboden, Jenkins, Neil, and others, to say nothing of those of Stonewall Jackson still farther south. For some reason or other the military authorities never considered the city of sufficient importance to be held at much hazard, but to be evacuated whenever anything like danger impended.

4 On the 20th of August, 1861, the bells of the city commenced ringing in lively note. Soon the old cry of "The Confederates are coming!" was heard. At the intersection of Baltimore and George Street, in the northern part of the city, Capt. H. Clay Hagen, of the Third West Virginia Regiment (Federal), formed
On the 2d of July, Maj.-Gen. Patterson's division was put in motion with a view of proceeding to Martinsburg. Early in the morning the advance column, consisting of Capt. McMullen's Rangers, the Philadelphia City Troop, Col. Thomas' United States Cavalry, Maj. Perkins' battery, and the First Wisconsin and Eleventh Pennsylvania Regiments, commanded byCols. Starkweather and Jarrett, the whole accompanied by Maj.-Gen. Patterson and staff, crossed the Potomac at Williamsport, and moved in the direction of Martinsburg, leaving the main body to follow by easy stages. About four and a half miles from the river an engagement occurred between the Federal advance and a body of Confederates, which continued for about half an hour, the latter finally abandoning the field.

On the following day the Federal forces entered and occupied Martinsburg.

In the mean time the army in front of Washington was organized, and preparations were made for an advance against the Confederate forces collected at Manassas. Accordingly, on the 16th of July a forward movement was begun, and the "Grand Army" in four divisions, under the command of Maj.-Gen. Irwin McDowell, took up its line of march for Fairfax and Manassas. McDowell's force consisted of about sixty thousand men. On the 21st of July the opposing forces met, and fought the celebrated battle of Bull Run, or Manassas. The result of this engagement naturally produced the greatest consternation among the friends of the Union in Western Maryland, and as soon as the first feeling of alarm had subsided active measures were taken to provide for the general defense. Immediately after the battle Maj.-Gen. George B. McClellan, who had been operating in Western Virginia, was assigned to the command of the Federal forces in and around Washington and Northern Virginia. Upon taking command of the army Gen. McClellan at once proceeded to strengthen the defenses of Washington, and the small remnant of Patterson's army was removed to the Maryland side of the Potomac, and reinforced from time to time by new troops. Maj.-Gen. N. P. Banks was assigned to this division of the army, which was posted in the vicinity of Poolesville, with picket-lines extending along the banks of the Potomac from Harper's Ferry to Georgetown. The Federal forces also occupied the Maryland shore of the Potomac below Washington, the lines being gradually extended towards the mouth of the river. In front of this line the Confederates were posted in strong force, constantly threatening an attack, and making movements which required vigilant watching and counter-movements on the part of the Federal forces. Frequent skirmishes occurred between the pickets and reconnoitering and foraging parties of the two armies, with various success and more or less loss.

On the 19th of July, Hon. Francis Thomas was authorized to provide for the organization of four regiments of the loyal citizens, resident on both sides of the Potomac River from the Monocacy to the western boundary of Maryland, for the protection of the canal, and of the property and persons of loyal citizens of the neighborhood, "to be stationed in the vicinity whilst in the service." A few days later, on the 26th of July, the government accepted Mr. Thomas' offer of four companies of cavalry, one to be attached to each of the four regiments of infantry. This force was designated as the Potomac Home Brigade, and was rapidly organized after the battle of Manassas.

In August the President appointed Wm. P. Maulsby colonel, Chas. E. Trail lieutenant-colonel, and Lewis P. Fiery, of Washington County, major of the First Regiment of the Potomac Home Brigade, seven companies of which were mustered into service and encamped in August near the turnpike, about a mile and a half north of Frederick.

The organization of the brigade proceeded with equal spirit and energy in other parts of Western Maryland, and by the 17th of August eight companies had been raised in Allegany, and others were being rapidly formed. Although the Home Brigade was not intended to be employed outside of the State, it did not insist upon its exemption from foreign duty, and frequently rendered good service outside of the sphere assigned it. An opportunity of proving their mettle was soon presented, and the result showed that the Home Brigade was composed of no mere holiday soldiers. On the 23d of August, Capt. James D. Roberts, with forty men of Company B of the Second Infantry, marched from Oldtown, Md., to Springfield, Va., where a sharp skirmish took place with some fifty or sixty of the enemy, in which the company behaved with great gallantry and steadiness, three of the command being slightly wounded. These were the first Marylanders to shed their blood for the Union. Three days later another detachment of the same company was sent over the river to prevent the destruction of the property of a loyal citizen named Croagan, and attacked and pursued the enemy to Blue’s House, where they made their escape.

1 On the 23d of August, Mr. Thomas arrived in Cumberland, and addressed a meeting of the citizens on the subject of the formation of a regiment for the Potomac Home Brigade. In the course of his address he was interrupted by a Southern sympathizer, who was attacked and beaten by the crowd, which then proceeded to wreck the office of the Alleganian, the editor of which had interposed in behalf of the person assaulted. The crowd also visited the residence of Senator McKaig, breaking the windows, etc. On the following morning an attempt was made about seven miles west of Cumberland to wreck the train on which Mr. Thomas was traveling, and shots were fired into it, but fortunately without effect.

On the 20th of September a skirmish occurred between the Confederates at Shepherdstown and the Federal forces on the Maryland side of the river, under Capt. David Sanders. Capt. Sanders planted two pieces of artillery opposite Shepherdstown and fired several shots into the place. His fire was answered on the following morning by the Confederates, but the citizens fearing the Federal forces would be reinforced and the town destroyed, requested a cessation of the firing. Capt. Wilson, of the First Maryland, crossed the river and had an interview with the mayor of the town, when it was agreed that no more firing should take place at that point by either party.

No engagement of any magnitude took place in the fall of 1861 until the battle of Ball’s Bluff, or Leesburg, which occurred on the 21st of October. In this affair one-half of the Federal forces which crossed the Potomac under the command of Col. Baker to attack the Confederates never returned. Many were shot while in the water, many were drowned, many surrendered, and others succeeded in swimming to Harrison’s Island. In this battle no Maryland troops were engaged; but on the 22d of October the First Maryland Regiment, which was then stationed at Darnestown, Montgomery Co., received orders to reinforce the command of Brig.-Gen. C. P. Stone at Edward’s Ferry. Upon their arrival they were directed to man the boats and rescue the brigade of Gen. Gorman, which had been sent over the Potomac to act in conjunction with Col. Baker’s command, and which was in momentary danger of being cut to pieces or captured. Notwithstanding the river was very high, the current strong, and the wind blowing a gale, these brave men almost alone, with coal-boats worked with poles, brought out of the jaws of danger and death a whole brigade. All night long they worked diligently to bring off those whom folly had sent to the Virginia side of the river, and this too when troops from other States refused to perform so dangerous a service. Col. Kenly in his official report of the affair concludes with the remark: “I feel it to be a duty to say that the soldiers of the First Maryland Regiment of Infantry saved numbers of our army from destruction or capture. I am very proud of that night’s work.” The First Maryland Regiment remained in the vicinity of Edward’s Ferry until the 26th of October, when it returned to Darnestown.

During the night of October 25th the Second Maryland Infantry, under Col. Thomas Johns, with Capt. Fiery’s company of cavalry, were concentrated at North Branch bridge on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and early the following morning marched in the direction of Romney, Va., to co-operate with a force from New Creek (now Keyser) under Gen. Kelley in an attack on the Confederates at Romney. Passing through Frankfort, the column arrived at a point one and a half miles from Springfield, where it had a slight skirmish with the enemy, losing two men severely wounded. After a short delay the march was continued through Springfield, distant twenty miles from Cumberland, to the Chain bridge over the South Branch of the Potomac, seven miles below Romney. Here the enemy was discovered strongly intrenched on a wooded eminence immediately fronting the bridge on the opposite side of the river. A brisk fire at once commenced. After skirmishing across the river about half an hour, Col. Johns determined to force the passage of the bridge. Capt. Alexander Shaw, of Company A, who had the advance, was, with his company, directed to lead the way at a double-quick step, supported by the remainder of the regiment. The company moved promptly, and when about half-way across the bridge discovered the flooring torn up and its further progress stopped. The enemy on seeing the movement opened fire by volley, killing one man (Private Andrew Hewes) and wounding six, and causing the company to seek shelter be-hill the pillars and abutments of the bridge. After some further skirmishing, and not hearing the firing of Gen. Kelley's column for an hour, Col. Johns concluded Romney had been taken and the object of his movement—create a diversion in Gen. Kelley's favor—accomplished. He therefore withdrew his command to Old Town, twenty-five miles distant. The next day it returned to Cumberland.

In this affair Company B, Potomac Home Brigade Cavalry, commanded by Capt. Fiery, rendered very efficient service by drawing the fire of the enemy from the infantry at the bridge.

On the 11th of November the regiment marched from Cumberland to Old Town, whence the several companies were distributed along the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad at Green Spring, Little Cacapon, Great Cacapon, Springfield, and Paw Paw. Headquarters were established at Green Spring. Capt. Fiery's company was placed at Green Spring and Springfield.

The Third Brigade of Gen. Banks' army, Gen. Williams commanding, arrived in Frederick Dec. 9, 1861, and encamped near the hamlet of Fairview, three miles out on the Hagerstown turnpike. The brigade, regimental supply, and baggage-trains followed immediately in the rear of the regiments. The First and Second Brigades, commanded by Gen. Abercrombie and Hamilton, arrived respectively on Tuesday (December 3d) and Wednesday (December 4th). The former encamped on the Monocacy and Baltimore turnpike, and the latter on the Monocacy, near Ijamsville, both from four to five miles from Frederick. Two cavalry companies and the artillery battalion under Capt. Best, of the Fourth United States, arrived about the same time.

Gen. Banks' headquarters were in the spacious mansion of Bradley T. Johnson, then absent in the Confederate army. It had been unoccupied, except by his servants, since his departure. The only troops that were located in the city were Gen. Banks' bodyguard, composed of the Zouaves of the 5th Army Corps and Company A, Capt. Fitzsimmons, and Company K of the Allen Cavalry.

The First Maryland Regiment, under Col. Kenly, went into winter quarters about four miles west of Frederick City, but on the night of December 18th, Col. Kenly was directed to proceed with his command towards Sharpsburg or Williamsport, as he might deem advisable, to repel a threatened advance of the Confederates into Maryland. The regiment started from its camp at midnight, and after a very rapid march reached Williamsport at ten A.M. Believing the enemy were moving farther up the river, the colonel pushed on with his regiment, and established his headquarters at the Four Locks, a point midway between Williamsport and Hancock.

The several companies were now again distributed along the Potomac for the protection of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, and to guard the fords and ferries of the river. They were posted as follows: Companies B, C, D, E, and G, at the Four Locks; Company F, at Dam No. 5; Company A, at Cherry Run; Company H, at old Fort Frederick; and Companies I and K, near Fogel’s Ferry, opposite Little George Town, Va. This assignment (with the exception of Company F, transferred from Dam No. 5 to No. 4) remained unchanged until the night of Jan. 7, 1862, when, in obedience to orders from Gen. Lander, commanding the United States forces at Hancock, Col. Kenly started with Companies A, B, C, E, G, and I, and marched to Hancock, where he arrived in time to render valuable assistance to the besieged garrison, and, with the other reinforcements that had been sent, prevented the surrender of the town, which had been demanded by Gen. "Stonewall" Jackson. This march over the North Mountain was made on one of the coldest nights of midwinter, through a severe storm of sleet and snow, and Col. Kenly received the commendation and warm thanks of Gen. Lander for the succor afforded his command by the timely arrival of the battle of the First Maryland.

After the retreat of the Confederates from before Hancock, the headquarters of the regiment were established at Millstone Point, five miles east of the former town, and the following distribution of the companies was made, viz.: A, B, E, and G, at Millstone Point; D, at old Fort Frederick; F, at Four Locks; H, at Cherry Run; I, at Bevan's Hill; K, at Licking Creek bridge; and C, at Baer's schoolhouse. During the whole of the winter of 1861 and 1862 frequent attempts were made by the Confederates to drive the companies and detachments of the regiment from their posts on the river, and several spirited engagements took place between them, especially at old Fort Frederick, Cherry Run, and Dam No. 5, but in every instance the Confederates failed to accomplish their purpose.

Companies A, C, and D, Potomac Home Brigade, spent the fall in camp at Frederick, perfecting themselves in cavalry tactics. In December they moved to Williamsport, and were employed in doing picket duty along the Maryland side of the Potomac, and watching the Confederate pickets under Ashby on the opposite bank.

1 Kirkley's "Historical Record of the First Regiment."
During the same month the Confederates, under Gen. T. J. (Stonewall) Jackson, moved from Winchester into Jefferson and Berkeley Counties, Va., tore up and removed the rails of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad between Harper’s Ferry and North Mountain, and made several attempts to render the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal useless by breaking the dams from which it is fed. These attempts brought on some heavy skirmishing along the river.

On the 6th of December, Capt. G. P. Robinson’s company of Lamon’s regiment, which afterwards became Company C of the Third Maryland, exchanged compliments with small parties of the Confederates at Dam No. 5 and Back Creek.

Next day a larger Confederate force, infantry and artillery, made its appearance at the dam, and commenced throwing shell and shot at the work as well as the houses on the Maryland shore.

Capt. Robinson’s company answered with musketry, and the firing continued until dusk. A small detachment of this company, under Lieut. Day, was on picket at Faulkwell’s Ferry, where an incessant firing was kept up all day and throughout the night.

At the dam musketry firing recommenced about 9 P.M. on the part of the Confederates, the object of which was to cover a party endeavoring to destroy the cribs of the structure. Capt. Robinson’s men responded, and the firing was continued until past midnight.

At dawn of the 8th the Confederates resumed the throwing of shot and shell across the dam, and also opened artillery at Faulkwell’s Ferry. At the dam the Confederates succeeded in setting fire to and destroying a barn owned by John Sterling. Mr. Stanhope’s dwelling-house, near by, had been burned to the ground the previous day.

Firing at both places was kept up all day, with but little intermission on either side. The force at the dam had been strengthened during the night of the 7th by a company of the Thirteenth Massachusetts from Williamsport.

Before daylight of the 9th the Confederates withdrew without accomplishing their designs on the canal.

Later in the month, Jackson made a stronger demonstration against Dam No. 5, which he covered by a feint movement of a portion of his troops towards Williamsport and Falling Waters. Sharp skirmishing with considerable cannonading occurred at the dam on the 17th, 18th, and 19th of December, in which Capt. Robinson’s and Capt. Kennedy’s companies of Maryland Volunteers participated.

It was these operations of the Confederates that caused the movement of the First Maryland from Frederick, as already mentioned.

On this occasion no serious impression was made upon the dam. It was so slightly injured that the damages were repaired within two days.

At night of the 19th a volunteer party from Capt. W. B. Kennedy’s company (afterwards Company A of the Third Maryland) crossed the river in a skiff and burnt Colston’s mill, which had afforded a good shelter to the Confederate riflemen.

At the close of the year the various commands, whether organized or in process of organization, were stationed as follows:

First Cavalry, at Camp Carroll, Baltimore (organizing).
Company A, Potomac Home Brigade Cavalry, near Williamsport.
Company C, Potomac Home Brigade Cavalry, at Williamsport.
Company D, Potomac Home Brigade Cavalry, at Hagerstown.
Battery B, Light Artillery, near Drummondstown, Va.
First Infantry, on the Upper Potomac.
Second Infantry, at Camp Carroll, Baltimore.
Third Infantry, at Camp Belger, Baltimore (organizing).
Fourth Infantry (German Rifles), at Camp Carroll, Baltimore (organizing).
Fifth Infantry, at Camp Hoffman, Baltimore.
First Infantry, Potomac Home Brigade, at Frederick.
Second Infantry, Potomac Home Brigade, on line of Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, in Western Virginia. First Infantry (Eastern Shore), at Salisbury, etc., Eastern Shore, Md.

Purnell Legion, Infantry, at Eastville, Hengas Creek, Cape Charles, Franktown, and near Chuystown.
Company A, Purnell Cavalry, at Pikesville Arsenal.
Company B, Purnell Cavalry, at Pikesville Arsenal.
Patapsco Guards, at Ellicott’s Mills.

The position of the Federal troops in Maryland at the beginning of the year 1862 was as follows: Gen. Dix commanded in Baltimore; Gen. Hooker, in Charles County and south of Washington; Gen. McClellan, southwest of Washington; Gen. Keys and Casey, in and around Washington; Gen. Stone, at and near Poolesville, and Banks near Darnestown, with detachments on the Potomac to Williamsport. Cumberland was the headquarters of Gen. Kelley.

The Federal government had determined to respond to the call of the people of the North for the vigorous prosecution of the war, and the accession of Mr. Stanton to the War Department was followed by a more active and energetic conduct of military affairs. A general plan of operations was adopted, and on Jan. 22, 1862, all the land and naval forces of the United States were ordered to move on the 22d of February following "against the insurgent forces."

New Year's day of 1862 found Gen. Banks' division, consisting of Abercrombie's, Hamilton's, and Williams' brigades, Maulsby's First Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, First Michigan Cavalry, and two batteries of artillery, in winter quarters near Frederick City, where Gen. Banks had established his headquarters. Four regiments of his command, the Twenty-eighth Pennsylvania, Col. Geary, the Twelfth Indiana, Col. Link, the Thirteenth Massachusetts, Col. Leonard, the First Maryland, Col. Kenly, and Cole's and Horner's companies of Maryland cavalry, held positions on the Maryland side of the Potomac, guarding the river-line from the mouth of the Monocacy to near Hancock. Geary's headquarters were at Point of Rocks, Link's at Sharpsburg, Leonard's at Williamsport, and Kenly's at Four Locks.

The companies of the First Maryland were stationed as follows: A, at Cherry Run; B, C, D, E, and G, at Four Locks; F, at Dam No. 5; H, at old Fort Frederick; and I and K, at Faulkwell's Ferry, opposite Little Georgetown.

Gen. Kelley, commanding the district of Romney, had troops at Romney, Bath, and Springfield, with detachments along the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, from a point opposite Hancock to Cumberland. In this district the Second Maryland Potomac Home Brigade Infantry and Firey's, Sahi's, and Russell's companies of Maryland cavalry were serving.

On January 1st, the Confederate Gen. Jackson started from Winchester, with a considerable force of volunteers and militia, and moved towards Bath. The place was held by eight companies of the Thirty-ninth Illinois, Col. Osborn, and a section of Best's regular battery, under Lieut. Muhlenberg.

Gen. Jackson's plan, it would seem, was to capture the small force at Bath, push across the Potomac at Hancock, six miles distant, then move by the National turnpike to Cumberland, and cut off the Federal forces occupying Romney and adjacent country.

Reaching the neighborhood of Bath on the afternoon of January 3d, Jackson's advance encountered three companies of the Thirty-ninth Illinois, sent out on the Winchester road to feel and reconnoitre his column. After a spirited skirmish the scouting party retired in good order and unmolested to Bath.

During the night the garrison was reinforced from Hancock by the Eighty-fourth Pennsylvania and Patterson's company of Maryland cavalry. Col. Murray, of the Eighty-fourth, assumed command of the entire force, and at four o'clock the next morning advanced to an eminence beyond the town and deployed in line of battle. Muhlenberg's guns, already in position, commanding the numerous roads centering in Bath, opened a lively fire as soon as the enemy came in view, advancing by the Winchester and Martinsburg roads. The Federal commander, however, soon learned that a well-appointed force of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, greatly superior to his own, was in his front. At eight o'clock Gen. Jackson began to press upon him, driving in his skirmishers. But by skillful manœuvring, presenting a bold front, the enemy was kept at bay until near nightfall, when the command fell back by the Sir John's road towards Hancock. On the way thither it was joined by the Thirteenth Indiana and Russell's cavalry company from Green Spring Run. At Alpine Depot, just opposite Hancock, a brisk fight took place, but the Federal troops finally succeeded in crossing to the Maryland shore.

Two companies of the Twenty-ninth Illinois, and Company F, Second Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, Capt. L. F. Dyche, stationed at Great Caapon bridge, were also attacked, and for several hours maintained their position. A heavy force was approaching, and these companies not being able to ford the Potomac, retreated up the railroad to Green Spring Run.

Capt. Sahi's cavalry company, while reconnoitring from Springfield, fell into an ambuscade near Stone's Cross-Roads. The captain and one man (Peter Martin) were mortally wounded. The troops at Bath sustained no serious loss except in the matter of camp and garrison equipage. At Alpine Depot some army supplies also fell into the hands of the Confederates.

That night Gen. F. W. Lander arrived at Hancock, on route to Cumberland, to relieve Gen. Kelley, who was disabled by the wound he had received at Philippi. He immediately assumed command of the post, and Gen. Jackson, who had taken position on the bluffs opposite Hancock, and was vigorously shelling the town, sent Col. Turner Ashby, on the morning of the 5th, with a flag of truce to demand its immediate surrender. Gen. Lander defiantly refused, and, having been reinforced by Hampton's Pennsylvania battery and a section of Matthews' Pennsylvania battery, under Lieut. Rickert, a spirited cannonade ensued, which was kept up during the entire day following. The Confederate bombardment was vigorously conducted, and several houses in the town were struck by shells, while the inhabitants, men, women, and children, ran wildly through the streets, seeking an escape from the fire. Lander's guns, however, returned the fire with such fatal accuracy as to drive the Confederate batteries from the bluff. Foiled in his efforts perhaps to force a passage of the river and capture Hancock, Jackson withdrew on the morning of the 7th, and put his army in motion towards Romney. As soon as this was discovered, Gen. Lander resumed his journey to Cumberland, being followed on the 10th by the Eighty-fourth and One Hundred and Tenth Pennsylvania, Thirty ninth Illinois, and two guns of Best's Battery.

The force in Hancock during the bombardment consisted of the Thirty-ninth Illinois, Eighty-fourth and One Hundred and Tenth Pennsylvania, four companies Thirteenth Massachusetts, Cole's, Patterson's, and Horner's companies Maryland cavalry, and eight Parrott guns from Best's, Hampton's, and Matthews' batteries.

Williams' brigade arrived from Frederick on the 8th, after the enemy had withdrawn. Gen. Lander having already left for Cumberland, Gen. A. S. Williams assumed command of the post.

Col. Kenly, with Companies A, B, C, E, G, and I of the First Maryland, marched from Four Locks to Hancock on the night of the 7th. The regiment was soon after distributed as follows: Companies A, B, E, and G, with headquarters at Millstone Point, five miles east of Hancock; D, at old Fort Frederick; F, at Four Locks; H, at Cherry Run; I, at Bevan's Hill; K, at Licking Creek Bridge; and C, at Baer's schoolhouse.

The day before Jackson retired from Hancock, Gen. Kelley ordered Col. Dunning, Fifth Ohio, commanding at Romney, to attack a force of the Confederates that had been left to hold Blue's Gap, a strong position, twelve miles from Romney, on the road to Winchester.

On the night of January 6th, Col. Dunning moved from Romney with a column of two thousand men, and on the morning of the 7th surprised the Confederates completely, driving them from their intrenchments, capturing stores, equipage, prisoners, two pieces of artillery, and entirely dispersing the whole force.

Gen. Jackson, who at this time had begun his retirement from Hancock, moved on Romney. Gen. Lander in person reached that place on the night of the 8th, and on the 10th he withdrew the command, via Springfield and Frankford, to the mouth of Patterson's Creek, leaving to the Confederate general the barren occupancy of Romney, which, in addition to his losses of men and material in battle, cost him many men disabled from cold and exposure. Besides, he was soon obliged to abandon the place, retiring into winter quarters at Winchester.

After passing Springfield, the rear of Lander's column was covered by Companies D, G, I, and K, Second Maryland Potomac Home Brigade, under Col. Robert Bruce, and Fiery's and Sahl's companies of cavalry, with other troops.

For several days after Jackson's departure the garrison of Hancock was kept in constant readiness to go to the support of Gen. Lander should he be attacked. Alarms were frequent, and reconnoitering parties were thrown forward almost daily in the direction of Bath. In this duty the Maryland cavalry rendered efficient service.

On one of these scouting expeditions Cole's cavalry penetrated to within a few miles of Winchester, and ascertained that Jackson had gone into winter quarters there. Russell's, Fiery's, and Redpath's (formerly Sahl's) companies also performed similar service with Gen. Lander's command in Virginia.

At the end of January the companies of the Second Potomac Home Brigade were posted as follows: A, at Little Orleans; B, at Little Cacapon; C, D, E, H, I, and K, with headquarters at Old Town; F, at South Branch; and G, at Cumberland.

On the 14th of February Russell's and Fiery's cavalry companies participated in a brisk fight at Bloomery Gap, in which the Confederate commander, with his staff and part of his command, were captured.

The time was now approaching when an active spring and summer campaign in the Shenandoah Valley was to be inaugurated. As a part of the grand plan for the advance of McClellan's army, the commands of Banks and Lander were to enter the valley, cover the reconstruction of the section of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad lying between Harper's Ferry and Hancock, and at the same time draw the attention of the Confederates to their left flank, held by Jackson, which was threatened by the movement.

Gen. Lander having cleared his district of the forces of the enemy, movement was then commenced, lower down the river by a portion of Gen. Banks' division. On the 25th of February the Twenty-eighth Pennsylvania, Col. Geary, crossed the Potomac from Sandy Hook, took possession of Harper's Ferry, and drove the enemy's scouts from Bolivar Heights. This was the first step towards seizing and holding the valley.
On the 27th, Abercrombie's and Hamilton's brigades, with Col. Maulsby's regiment, moved from Frederick to Harper's Ferry, and thence on March 1st to Charlestown, meeting with no opposition from the enemy. In this advance Col. Maulsby's regiment led the van. Col. Garey, with his own regiment, Knapp's battery, and a battalion of the First Michigan Cavalry, crossed the Shenandoah on February 28th, drove the enemy from London Heights, advanced through Lovettsville and Waterford, and on the 8th of March occupied Leesburg.

The operations of crossing the Potomac and the occupation of Charlestown were superintended by Gen. McClellan in person.

To strengthen the advance into the valley two brigades of Sedgwick's division, under Genns. Gorman and Burns, were brought from Poolesville, reaching Harper's Ferry on the 2d of March, and proceeding thence to Charlestown on the 7th.

These brigades remained with Gen. Banks until Jackson had evacuated Winchester, but did not advance beyond Berryville. They then rejoined their corps, and embarked with McClellan's main army for the Peninsula. Upon the retirement of these troops Charlestown was garrisoned by Col. Maulsby's regiment.

Meantime Gen. Williams' brigade, which included Gen. Kenly's First Maryland and Cole's cavalry battalion, marched from Hancock on the 28th of February, occupying Martinsburg on the 2d of March. In this movement Cole's battalion led the van, and were the first to enter the town, after a slight skirmish.

Advancing cautiously, Hamilton's and Williams' brigades were united at Bunker Hill on the 10th, and marched to Stephenson's Depot on the 11th. At the last named place the advance-guard encountered and repulsed Ashby's cavalry. On the 12th the two brigades marched upon and occupied Winchester, Jackson's force having retired the previous night. Cole's cavalry was the first to enter the town, dash through and capturing a few prisoners. At this time Abercrombie's brigade and a portion of Sedgwick's division were at Berryville.

Moving with Gen. Williams' column on the direct road from Martinsburg, Cole's battalion had several spirited encounters with Ashby's cavalry. In one of these affairs three men of Company A were wounded, one mortally. Capt. Cole had his horse killed under him, but sustained no injury himself. The gallantry of the command on this occasion was acknowledged by the brigade commander as follows:

1 Private Dennis E. Stull.
who held the outpost at that place, had sent to Gen. Banks for reinforcements of cavalry. The general replied that he had none available, but subsequently, without notifying Col. Maulsby, sent a detachment of the First Michigan Cavalry to his support. By mistake the cavalry took a circuitous route and approached the village from the direction whence the enemy was expected. Col. Maulsby immediately formed his men in line and fired a volley on the supposed enemy, with the result above mentioned. The sad mistake was soon discovered, and the firing stopped before further harm was done.

The line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad being now clear of the Confederates, its employees repaired the great bridge at Harper's Ferry, and others which had been burnt or broken down, and relaid the rails where they had been torn up, and on the 30th of March, all the repairs being completed, a resumption of business took place between Baltimore and Wheeling. The first through passenger-train for Wheeling which had gone over the road since May, 1861, left Baltimore on April 1, 1862.

After the battle of Kernstown, Ferry's company of cavalry was ordered back to the Romney district. Under command of Col. Downey, of the Third Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, it was actively employed in scouting after guerrillas. On the 23d of April it had a severe skirmish at Grass Lick, near Romney, in which the opposing force was defeated, with the loss of their leader (John Uumbaugh) and others killed, besides a number wounded and twenty captured. The company lost two men killed, Robert Elms and John H. Rockwell. At the beginning of Gen. Banks' movement from Strasburg, ten companies of Cole's cavalry battalion were posted in Jefferson County, Va., Company A (Cole's) was at Charlestown, C (Horner's) at Kearneysville, and D (Curl's) at Wadesville. As the Confederates under Jackson advanced in pursuit of Banks, after the battle of Front Royal and Winchester, these companies were actively employed in scouting, skirmishing, and picket duty.

Gen. Jackson had halted his infantry a short distance from Winchester, but his cavalry had followed Banks' retreating column to Martinsburg, where the pursuit ended.

On the 28th of May the Confederate advance moved upon Harper's Ferry by way of Summit Point and Charlestown, followed the next day by the whole army, which encamped in the vicinity of Halltown. At this time Harper's Ferry was held by troops hastily gathered together, and consisting of two brigades of infantry, commanded by Gens. James Cooper and John P. Slough, with some light artillery and cavalry, the whole under Gen. Rufus Saxton. On Maryland Heights there was a battery of heavy guns, called the "naval battery," which commanded the town and all its approaches.

The most of these troops were new levies and militia regiments turned out for the emergency. The following-named Maryland organizations constituted a part of the garrison: Cole's cavalry; Companies D, F, H, K, and L of the First Cavalry, under Maj. Deems; the First Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, Col. Maulsby; the Third Infantry, Col. De Witt; and the Purnell Legion, Col. Leonard.

The two latter and the battalion of the First Cavalry had been hurriedly forwarded from Baltimore to assist in checking Jackson's threatened invasion of Maryland.

Col. Maulsby's regiment had been posted along the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad from Harper's Ferry as far east as Marriottsville, with headquarters at Monocacy Junction, but upon the first intimation of the enemy's approach it was concentrated at Harper's Ferry. On the night of the 27th, Gen. Saxton sent Companies I (Capt. Saunders) and F (Capt. Whittier) of this regiment, under Maj. John A. Steiner, to make a reconnaissance of Loudon Heights, where the enemy was reported in position. While cautiously ascending the mountain about eleven o'clock, and when near a spring not far from the top, the detachment was suddenly fired upon by dismounted Confederate cavalry concealed in the bushes on the east side of the narrow road. Sergt. Conrad Mehrling, of Company I, was killed and several others wounded. After returning the fire with considerable effect, as was afterwards learned, the command fell back to Harper's Ferry. Next morning Loudon Heights were briskly shelled from the naval battery on Maryland Heights, and in the afternoon Maj. Steiner was again ordered up the mountain with two companies (A, Cook, and D, Baugher) to observe the effects of the firing and engage the enemy should he still be there. The detachment proceeded to a point near the summit of the mountain, as far as Nieswaner's house, but found no enemy. It then returned to camp. In the forenoon a reconnaissance in force was also made towards Charlestown by the One Hundred and Eleventh Pennsylvania, the Second Battalion First Maryland (Maj. Deems), and Cole's cavalry, with one section of artillery. When within two miles of the town the enemy's skirmishers were met and driven through and beyond it. Having developed the fact that the enemy was in force in front and advancing, the command returned to Harper's Ferry. The First Maryland Cavalry had three men wounded, and one officer (Capt. Vincent Von Koerber) and eight men captured. Upon the return of this reconnoitring column, Gen. Saxton formed his troops in line of battle, extending along the crest of Bolivar Heights, or "Smallwood's Hill," across the peninsula from the Potomac to the Shenandoah. Small bodies of the enemy appeared in the neighborhood during that and the forepart of the ensuing day, as if with the object of alluring the Federal forces from their strong defensive position to one where they would be more easily attacked and overpowered. By the afternoon of the 29th the whole of Jackson's army was before Harper's Ferry, and Gen. Saxton's pickets being driven in, his forces were again formed in order of battle on Bolivar Heights, Gen. Cooper's brigade to the right and Gen. Slough's brigade to the left of the road leading to Charleston.

Learning in the course of the evening that the enemy had sent a force across the Shenandoah at Key's Ferry to occupy London Heights, and that another strong detachment had moved towards Shepherdstown, with a view of crossing the Potomac and thus turning his position, Gen. Saxton determined to withdraw his troops from Bolivar Heights and take up a second line of defense on the height known as Camp Hill, immediately above the town of Harper's Ferry. With the force rendered by this contraction of his front available for other purposes, he deemed it prudent to occupy the crest of Maryland Heights above the naval battery, to frustrate any attempt of the enemy to take that position in the rear and turn his batteries against him. Accordingly, about midnight, Gen. Cooper's brigade, including the Third Maryland, was set in motion, and by daylight had succeeded in crossing the river and occupying the heights on the Maryland side. Gen. Slough's brigade at the same time fell back to the new position on Camp Hill. To this brigade the Pernell Legion was attached.

About dark on the 30th the enemy advanced beyond Bolivar Heights to storm the works on Camp Hill. The light batteries on Camp Hill and the heavy guns on Maryland Heights opened upon him. The scene at this time was very impressive. The night was intensely dark; the hills around were alive with the signal-lights of the enemy; the rain descended in torrents; vivid flashes of lightning illumined at intervals the grand and magnificent scenery, while the crash of thunder echoing among the mountains drowned into comparative insignificance the roar of the artillery. After an action of about an hour's duration the enemy retired. He made another unsuccessful attack at midnight, and after a short engagement disappeared. During the operations of the 29th and 30th the Pernell Legion had three men wounded. A reconnoissance next day ascertained that the rear of the Confederate army had passed through Charlestown in the direction of Winchester about an hour before the arrival of the reconnoitring force. Gen. Jackson was now moving rapidly to the rear. Gen. Fremont from the west and Gen. McDowell from the east were on the march to intercept him.

The narration of the pursuit by Shields and Fremont, and the battles of Cross Keys and Port Republic, does not come within the province of this work, as no Federal troops from Western Maryland or any other section of the State participated therein. Suffice it to say that early in June the First Cavalry, Third Infantry, and Pernell Legion advanced with Gen. Banks' command, now known as the Second Corps, Army of Virginia, to Winchester and Cedar Creek, whence they subsequently moved into Eastern Virginia.

Col. Maulsby's regiment was again distributed along the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and Cole's cavalry operated in the lower valley, while the remnant of the First Infantry proceeded to Baltimore to reorganize and recruit. The enlisted portion of the regiment captured at Front Royal was held in confinement at Lynchburg and Belle Isle, Va., and the captive officers at Salisbury, N. C., until September, 1862. On account of the severity of his wounds, Col. Kenly was paroled at Winchester, and returned to Baltimore City.

Great excitement was created in Hagerstown by the defeat of Banks and the approach of the Confederates. "The town," says a correspondent, under date of May 28, 1862, "is filled with refugees and escaped soldiers, who give a most horrible account of the sufferings of the Union men. A regular Union force destroyed the rebel newspaper office in which the Hagerstown Mail was published. The presses, type, and other material were demolished, together with the building. The building being the property of a Union man, that party at once raised funds and compensated the owner fully for his loss. The proprietor fled for his life." A large crowd assembled in front of the residence of Col. McKaig, at Cumberland, when it is said a pistol was fired from a window of the house. The crowd then commenced throwing stones at the windows, which they completely demolished, and Mr. McKaig's stable was set on fire and destroyed.1

1 The Union Military Hospital in Frederick was situated on the outskirts of the town, and had an area of about four acres, inclosed by a board fence. The hospital consisted of one stone
On the 17th of June, 1862, "another outbreak," according to the Hagerstown Herald and Torch, "occurred in this town, during which Rhodes' restaurant was attacked and demolished, and the proprietor and his son driven off. On the same night the silver-smith-shop of George Gruber was also destroyed. Comment upon these scenes at the present time is neither advisable nor necessary. Those who sympathize with this hellish rebellion, inaugurated for the overthrow of government, law, and order, are beginning to see and feel its consequences."

On the 5th of August a large and enthusiastic meeting of the friends of the Union was held at Hagerstown "to take into consideration the means best calculated to promote the object of the call of the President of the United States for more troops." On motion of Judge Weisel, Col. John Miller was called upon to preside. Messrs. Jonathan Toby and John J. Thomas were appointed vice-presidents, and Edward G. W. Stake and Isaac Nesbitt were selected as secretaries. A committee of thirteen, consisting of Lewis P. Fiery, Samuel Rohrer, Raphael E. Taney, Joseph F. Davis, James D. Bennett, Peter Negley, Levin Benton, E. G. W. Stake, James M. Leiter, Lewis B. Nyman, Henry W. Dellingler, William Rulett, and Thomas Hassett, reported resolutions, which were adopted, declaring "that our allegiance and patriotic duty to our whole country exacting demand of us to suppress this causeless and gigantic rebellion by every available means in our power; that one of the most efficient means of doing so is to remove all secession incumbents from office, and to express everywhere and at all times our abhorrence of the crime of resistance to our national government; that we conceive that the speedy, effectual suppression of this rebellion can be accomplished only by the most rigorous punishment of all acts of disloyalty, and expressions of disaffection to our government; that the clemency hitherto extended to civic traitors, though we commend the motive that prompted it, has emboldened and encouraged them in our midst to the embarrassment of the government and great injury to its loyal citizens; that it is the duty of all loyal citizens to contribute to the necessary support of the families of such soldiers as may enter the service of the government, and that we recommend the appointment of committees in the various districts of the county for that purpose." In accordance with these resolutions the following committees were appointed for the patriotic service suggested: Sharpsburg, Levin Benton, Dr. A. A. Biggs, Benjamin F. Cronise; Williamsport, John A. Esminger, Ed. G. W. Stake, Lewis Ripple; Hagerstown, F. Dorsey Herbert, Peter B. Snell, Isaac Nesbitt; Clear Spring, H. W. Dellingger, Samuel M. Reitzell, George Cook; Hancock, Richmond Gregory, Raphael E. Taney, Dewalt Stottlemyer; Boonsboro, Elias Davis, Lewis B. Nyman, Lewis Watson; Cavetown, A. C. Hildebrand, John P. Shank, Jeremiah S. Besore; Pleasant Valley, Jonathan Toby, Samuel Rohrer, David G. Potter; Leitersburg, George W. Lantz, Fred. K. Zeigler, James M. Leiter; Funkstown, Joseph F. Davis, Samuel Baker, Henry Landis; Sandy Hook, Jacob A. Miller, Michael Barboulo, Joseph Lewis; Tilton man, John Miller, A. J. P. Tabler, John Reichard; Cunningham's Cross-Roads, Daniel Gearss, Joseph O. Fiery, John Tice; Ringgold, Isaac H. Durborow, Isaac Garver, George Fulton; Indian Spring, Denton Jacques, J. Thomas Mason, Hugh McKenna.

On the 9th of August a war-meeting was held at Westminster, Carroll Co., which was largely attended. Augustus Shriver acted as president; Thos. S. Brown and Joseph Schaeffer, as vice-presidents; R. Bernie and J. W. Boring, as secretaries.

A committee on business, consisting of one person from each district, was appointed by the chair, as follows: Joseph M. Parke, Henry Shriver, Granville S. Haines, William Tagg, J. F. Gardner, R. F. Jenkins, James Kelly, A. F. Myers, Col. J. C. Gist, S. W. Angel, S. S. Ecker.

Resolutions were adopted declaring "that we heartily approve of the measures taken by the government for the prompt increase of the Federal army, believing that the only means to preserve the lawful authority of the government and the unity of our great country against the wanton assaults of unprincipled traitors is to meet force with still greater force, and to prosecute the war in the most vigorous manner; that Carroll County will do her whole duty in raising her portion of the four regiments of volun-

bears and other troops called for from Maryland, and for this purpose we will do all that we can to urge the brave and gallant men of our country to join, as volunteers, the standard of our country, raised in our midst by patriotic sons of Carroll. That we respectfully recommend that the commissioners for Carroll County advance, on the faith of the county, to each person who volunteers in the county the sum of fifty dollars, to be applied to the use of said volunteers, in common with the funds raised in Baltimore and elsewhere, so as to secure to each volunteer of the four regiments the sum of one hundred dollars, in addition to the bounty offered by the government; that a committee of three persons be appointed by the president to wait on the county commissioners, and lay before them the proposition of this meeting in regard to the pecuniary aid expected from them.

Under the last resolution, Messrs. John Smith, Grove, Shipley, and Andrew K. Shriver were appointed the committee. Addresses were delivered by Hon. John E. Smith, Lieut. William A. McKellip, John Smith, J. H. Christ, and R. Birnie.

On the 19th of August a large public meeting was held at Hagerstown, at which resolutions were adopted directing the Board of County Commissioners to borrow sixty thousand dollars, "to be expended and paid in bounties to volunteers already enlisted, and who may hereafter enlist from this county in the military service of the United States, under the recent calls of the President for more troops, one hundred dollars to each volunteer." The county commissioners being present at the meeting, at once convened and passed a formal order calling for a loan of sixty thousand dollars for the purpose indicated. The first loan of ten thousand dollars was obtained from the Hagerstown Bank to pay the bounty to Capt. Mobley’s company, the commissioners themselves, as individuals, with some other patriotic gentlemen, leading off on the indorsement of the bond upon which the money was raised.

A contemporary writer, speaking of the patriotism and devotion of the people of Washington County at this time, says, under date of Sept. 3, 1862,—

"Washington County has led the State in furnishing troops. Indeed, there are few counties in the free States that have proportionately furnished more troops than she has. Out of a voting population of fifty-five hundred, she has already furnished fourteen companies of one hundred men each, and will, doubtless, have another, if not two, in the field by the 15th, making over one-fourth of her voting population. She has four companies that held the right in as many regiments; she has five companies in the First Regiment Potomac Home Brigade; she has one father and seven sons in one company, and yesterday one of our old citizens, D. L. Smith, who has four sons all in the service, left with Lieut. Ratcliffe to offer his services as a drummer to the Seventh Maryland Regiment. She was the first county in the State to pay her volunteers a cash bounty of one hundred dollars; she was the first to organize Union Relief Associations, and to-day that association is at work gathering lint, material for bandages, etc. Notwithstanding her unyielding attachment and determined energy, she has never had but one officer in the service above a captain (Maj. Kennelly, who was wounded and captured at Cedar Mountain)."

Another correspondent from Clear Spring, under date of Aug. 19, 1862, says,—

"In your issue of to-day I noticed a puff from Chestertown, Md., giving the amount of sixty-two soldiers volunteered for the war out of less than two hundred voters, and they think it hard to beat. In justice to our patriotic sons who have volunteered from our village of Clear Spring, Washington Co., Md., they should be heard from. You will please give this a notice in your valuable paper. I have taken pains by actual count to know positively our full vote of the village proper, and, all told, is but one hundred and twenty-four votes, and we have sent seventy-three volunteers to the war out of the village. We can further boast of sending seven out of one family,—the father and six sons. George W. Chase has that honor of six sons in the service, and a few more boys left home with the mother. We have also another family which has sent four sons, and still another three. Can Chestertown beat that, or any other town or city in the Union? If so, we will knock under."

On the 13th of August a large "war mass-meeting" was held at Cumberland, for the purpose of adopting measures for raising troops in response to the recent call of the President. Gen. C. M. Thruston was called to the chair, Lloyd Lowndes and F. A. Mason made vice-presidents, and William R. McCully and William Hlobitzell secretaries. Messrs. Charles H. Ohr, S. P. Smith, M. Sherry, G. E. Porter, and Hopewell Hobbs submitted resolutions, which were adopted, declaring it to be the duty of the people to maintain the government, and requesting the county commissioners to appropriate fifty thousand dollars, to be applied to the payment of bounties to volunteers.

Apprehending a raid from the Confederate forces in West Virginia, the city authorities of Cumberland organized a city guard, consisting of three volunteer companies, which were officered as follows:

First District: Captain, Caspar Kassen; First Lieutenant, Joshua Stein; Second Lieutenant, James A. Buckey; Orderly Sergeant, D. B. Myers. Second District: Captain, Jacob Wickard; First Lieutenant, William R. McCully; Second Lieutenant, J. M. Koerner; Orderly Sergeant, Charles A. Sey. Third District: Captain, Horace Redley; First Lieutenant, J. J. McHenry; Second Lieutenant, J. F. Troxell; Orderly Sergeant, George M. Read. Horace Redley was subsequently elected Lieutenant-colonel, to command the city guard. Allegany’s quota was 874, but by October, 1862, she had furnished 1463 volunteers, and there was no necessity for the enforcement of the draft within the county limits.

All the militia in the State having been ordered to be enrolled, Charles Gilpin was appointed commissioner of enrollment for Allegany County, and completed his work early in September, the whole number enrolled being 4714.1

On the 21st of August a committee, consisting of Messrs. William Updegraff, Joseph P. Mong, Thomas A. Boult, Henry Gantz, Benjamin Harris, F. A. Heard, D. C. Anghinbaugh, and Charles F. Gelwicks, in behalf of the citizens of Washington County, proceeded to Baltimore, paid the members the one hundred dollars bounty which Washington County had appropriated for the benefit of its volunteers, and presented to the officers of the company three elegantly finished swords, which had been purchased from a fund raised in Hagerston for the purpose.

The following were the officers of enrollment appointed under the President's call for troops in 1862:

CHAPTER XII.

THE MARYLAND CAMPAIGN OF 1862.

How the Confederates were Received—Lee's Invasion of Maryland—Occupation of Frederick—Battles of Crampton's Gap and South Mountain—Battle of Sharpsburg, or Antietam—Capture of Harper's Ferry—Movements of Maryland Troops—Stuart's Cavalry Raid into Maryland and Pennsylvania.

On the 28th of August a company of Confederate cavalry made a dash into Smithfield, Jefferson Co., Va., where a picket-guard of Capt. Cull's cavalry of the Potomac Home Brigade were stationed, and captured Andrew J. Boyd, Christian Newcomer, Duncan McConnell, John Seifert, Thomas Eltonhead, James C. Orr, Sergt. Stephen Bryan, Corp. J. J. Goff, Corp. Wm. H. Bowman, R. C. Welsh, John H. Ely, Samuel B. Sigler, Jeremiah Leutzer, Charles E. Ball, George E. Steele, James Grubs, and Wm. H. Gregg. and largely superior force brought against it. But by one last desperate effort, in which both officers and men showed the best of mettle, it succeeded in charging through the enemy's lines, and escaped back to Harper's Ferry, losing in killed, wounded, and missing over seventy men. Sergt. Hall and Corp. Apple, of Company A, were cut off and surrounded by the enemy, and, refusing to surrender, perished, fighting gallantly to the last, fairly riddled with bullets and hacked with sabre-cuts. Many of the command who escaped also bore the marks of the fray in the shape of sabre-strokes and pistol-wounds. After the second battle of Manassas the Confederate army, on the 31st of August, 1862, was moved towards Little River turnpike for the purpose of turning Gen. Pope's right. Anticipating this movement of the Confederates, Pope prepared to resist it, and on the evening of the following day a battle occurred at Chantilly, in which Gen. Kearney and Gen. Stevens, of the Federal forces, were killed. The immediate design of the Confederates was frustrated, but Pope's army was compelled to seek shelter in the fortifications around Washington. Pope now resigned his command, and was succeeded by Gen. McClellan.

As soon as the Union forces had reached the fortifications of Washington from the hard-fought fields of Manassas, Gen. Lee put his army in motion towards Leesburg, and on the 4th of September his advance division, under Gen. D. H. Hill, crossed the Potomac near the mouth of the Monocacy. The passage of the river was stoutly resisted for several hours by a detachment of Company E, First Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, consisting of only thirty-one men, under Lieut. Jerome B. Burk, stationed at the Monocacy aqueduct. After dark the lieutenant conducted his command along the east bank of the Monocacy to Monocacy Junction, and thence to Frederick City. Here it joined Capt. Faithful's company of the same regiment, and the two proceeded, as hereafter described, to Sandy Hook, where the remainder of the regiment was posted. In the skirmish at the aqueduct Lieut. Burk had one man wounded. After crossing, the enemy made an unsuccessful attempt to blow up the aqueduct.

Another detachment of Company E, under Lieut. Alonzo Carroll, on duty at Edward's Ferry, fell back to the vicinity of Poolesville, where, on the 5th, it had a skirmish with the enemy's advance, losing one man wounded. Being cut off from the regiment it repaired, via Washington, to Baltimore, and reporting to Gen. Wool, was sent thence to Frederick City.

"Lee’s object in invading Maryland," says John Esten Cooke in his life of the Confederate commander, "has been the subject of much discussion, one party holding the view that his sole aim was to surround and capture a force of nine or ten thousand Federal troops stationed at Harper’s Ferry, and another party maintaining that he proposed an invasion of Pennsylvania as far as the Susquehanna, intending to fight a decisive battle there, and advance thereafter upon Philadelphia, Baltimore, or Washington. The course pursued by an army commander is largely shaped by the progress of events. It can only be said that Gen. Lee doubtless left the future to decide his ultimate movements; meanwhile, he had a distinct and clearly-defined aim, which he states in plain words. His object was to draw the Federal forces out of Virginia first. The movement culminating in the victory over the enemy at Manassas had produced the effect of paralyzing them in every quarter.

"On the coast of North Carolina, in Western Virginia, and in the Shenandoah Valley had been heard the echo of the great events in Middle and Northern Virginia. Gen. Burnside’s force had been brought up from the South, leaving affairs at a standstill in that direction; and, contemporaneously with the retreat of Gen. Pope, the Federal forces at Washington and beyond had fallen back to the Potomac. This left the way open, and Lee’s further advance, it was obvious, would now completely clear Virginia of her invaders. The situation of affairs and the expected results are clearly stated by Gen. Lee. ‘The war was thus transferred,’ he says, ‘from the interior to the frontier, and the supplies of rich and productive districts made accessible to our army. To prolong a state of affairs in every way desirable, and not to permit the season for active operations to pass without endeavoring to inflict other injury upon the enemy, the best course appeared to be the transfer of the army into Maryland.’... Such were the first designs of Lee; his ultimate aim seems as clear. By advancing into Maryland and threatening Baltimore and Washington, he knew he would force the enemy to withdraw all their troops from the south bank of the Potomac, where they menaced the Confederate communications with Richmond; when this was accomplished, as it clearly would be, his design was to cross the Maryland extension of the Blue Ridge, called there the South Mountain, advance by way of Hagerstown into the Cumberland Valley, and, by thus forcing the enemy to follow him, draw them to a distance from their base of supplies, while his own commu-communications would remain open by way of the Shenandoah Valley. This was essentially the same plan pursued in the campaign of 1863, which terminated in the battle of Gettysburg. Gen. Lee’s movements now indicated similar intentions. He doubtless wished, in the first place, to compel the enemy to pursue him, then to lead them as far as was prudent, and, if circumstances were favorable, bring them to decisive battle, success in which promised to open for him the gates of Washington or Baltimore, and end the war. It will now be seen how the delay caused by the movement of Jackson against Harper’s Ferry, and the discovery by Gen. McClellan of the entire arrangement devised by Lee for that purpose, caused the failure of this whole anterior design."

Gen. Lee, after the retreat of Pope, moved the main body of his army to Leesburg. Thence he moved to the Potomac, near Point of Rocks, and on the same day, the 5th of September, that Gen. Bragg, on a similar duty, entered Kentucky, Lee crossed at White’s Ford, five miles below, and at a ford three miles above. His force consisted of the divisions of Gens. Jackson, Ewell, A. P. Hill, D. H. Hill, and Longstreet. When it became known that the army was destined for Maryland enthusiasm ran wild. Old and young along the route of march thronged the roadsides with banners and waving handkerchiefs. Upon entering Leesburg the bands played, colors waved, men shouted, women wept, and all was a scene of dust, confusion, and noise. ‘Maryland, my Maryland,’ ‘Dixie,’ the ‘Bonnie Blue Flag,’ and the ‘Marseillaise’ of the various regimental bands were drowned in the tumult of voices, rumble of wagons, jingling of artillery, and the heavy tramp of infantry.

Jackson’s division crossed near the Point of Rocks, tore up the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad tracks, and cut off all telegraphic and other connection from Harper’s Ferry to Washington. The crossing of the Potomac was a holiday for the Marylanders in the Confederate army. All of them were filled with joy and many wept with gladness when they touched the ‘sacred soil of old Maryland.’ Old and young tossed their hats in the air with delight, others kissed the sod, and the bands constantly played ‘Maryland, my Maryland,’ until the sound was oppressive. The troops were wretchedly clothed and shod, and greatly in want of all necessaries. ‘Thousands of the troops,’ says Lee, ‘were destitute of shoes.’ ‘Never,’ says Gen. Jones, who commanded Jackson’s old brigade, ‘had the army been so dirty, ragged, and ill-provided for as on this march.’ The wagons were empty, except extra ammunition; and as soon as the troops had crossed, their first meal on Maryland soil was green corn cut from the stalk growing in the cornfields. Soon, however, the quartermasters and commissaries brought in from the surrounding country supplies of provisions, which had been unknown to Lee's army for many months. No violence, no invincibility was shown by the Confederate agents, and all transactions were satisfactorily arranged. Of the citizens of Western Maryland, a large majority favored the Union cause, many were indifferent, and a few warm secessionists. A Confederate newspaper correspondent traveling with the army says, "The few inhabitants we met betrayed evident pleasure at our arrival, but were extremely cautious and circumspect in showing it. They would look on and smile as we passed, but seemed much constrained in manner, as if feeling certain that Union men were in their midst quietly taking note of all actions or expressions, and ready to divulge names at fitting opportunities. Some few young men openly avowed their Southern feeling and joined us, but the greater number stood as if thinking, 'I should much like to assist you if I dare, but how long will they remain? I am between two fires; I must sacrifice principle and secrete my home.'"

The advance of the Confederate forces reached a point but three or four miles from Frederick on the night of the 5th. Their approach was already announced, and created great commotion, which spread rapidly through the surrounding country, and to other towns and cities in Maryland, and on the borders of Pennsylvania. On the 6th the army entered Frederick City, and was placed under the strictest orders to respect personal rights and private property. A brigade took possession of the hospital buildings for the sick and wounded Confederates, while a large portion of the army marched through Frederick and camped on the other side of the city at Norman's mill. The main body encamped about Monocacy Junction, near the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad bridge, on the side towards Baltimore.

The reception of the Confederate troops by the inhabitants of Frederick was decidedly cool. Not the slightest manifestation of joy or enthusiasm was exhibited. With all places of business closed, and the streets deserted by the people, the old town wore a gloomy appearance, in striking contrast to the resplendence it displayed upon the entry of the Union army one week later. On the approach of the Confederate army many of the citizens fled towards Pennsylvania and Baltimore. The military force in the city consisted of but one company,—C, First Potomac Home Brigade Infantry,—commanded by Capt. William T. Faithful, which could make no opposition. Capt. Faithful, who was provost-marshal of the town, removed all the military stores possible, and, leaving a sufficient supply for the hospitals, containing about six hundred patients, burned the remainder. Lieut. George T. Castle, of the First Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, had charge of the commissary depot.

The following report made by Capt. Faithful contains an interesting description of the scenes and occurrences in Frederick and the vicinity on the approach of the Confederates:

"Having been made aware that the rebel army was crossing the Potomac River at, and in vicinity of, Point of Rocks and the mouth of Monocacy, I immediately mounted my horse and reconnoitered the different roads leading from Frederick in the direction of the Potomac; returning to Frederick, I immediately detailed a sufficient number of my company to establish a line of telegraph pickets extending five miles from Frederick, in the road leading to the Point of Rocks. Having done this, I at once repaired to the telegraph office, accompanied by Assistant Surgeon Weir, in charge of general hospital at Frederick, and Lieut. G. Castle, acting assistant quartermaster, when I desired that they should remain with me during the night and notice how things were going on. At eleven o'clock p.m. I was made aware our small force had been driven from Point of Rocks, and that the rebels were in possession; but in a short time, reinforcements arriving, I received the intelligence that our forces had regained possession of Point of Rocks, and held it at daylight. By this time people had begun to leave their homes and rush to Frederick, circulating rumors of all kinds. This created great excitement among the citizens of Frederick, which I endeavored to allay as much as possible. On the morning of the 5th some twenty canal boatmen, with their mules, arrived in Frederick at seven o'clock, stating that the rebel army was within six miles of Frederick. Just at this moment a gentleman from Buckeystown (about six miles out on the Point of Rocks road) arrived ex usto Pennsylvania, informing me that the rebel Gen. Jackson and staff were eating supper at his house. I at once telegraphed to Col. D. S. Miles, commanding at Harper's Ferry, informing him of the news I had received, and the excitement of the place, when I received the following dispatch, to wit: 'that I should run off all horses that I had to a place of safety in Pennsylvania; to destroy all quartermaster and commissary stores, and start with my company, and all others that belonged to the regiment, for Knoxville, and report to Col. W. P. Maulsby. I immediately called the attention of Assistant Surgeon Weir, in charge of general hospital, and Post Quartermaster Castle, to my orders, and advised the saving of all property possible, instead of destroying it; and ordered all the horses in pasture to Pennsylvania. I then called upon Mr. Quinn, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad agent at Frederick, and secured every car possible. With a small engine, the only one which could be had, I had all the quartermaster and commissary stores loaded into the cars, to their utmost capacity, under direction of Lieut. Castle; and with the energy displayed by Assistant Surgeon Weir, we succeeded in getting off all the most valuable hospital stores in wagons and ambulances, together with about three hundred convalescents from the hospital, to a place of safety in Pennsylvania. After having sent off all the most valuable stores by all available means at hand, we set about destroying by fire the remains of some old and worthless stores, which were of no great value to the government, but might have been made useful to the rebels. Everything of value having been sent off, and the flames consuming the balance, by the aid of Assistant Surgeon Weir and Lieut. Castle, I then ordered Mr. Kelly, the telegraph operator, to detach his instrument and secure a conveyance and start for Pennsylvania, that he might get to Baltimore and report to the general superintendent of the line.

"This having been accomplished, I ordered in my pickets, formed my company, and started for my regiment at Knoxville by the Sharpssburg road, expecting to come in contact with some of the rebel pickets (cavalry) as I passed in the neighborhood of Petersville and Jefferson, but by a rapid march I succeeded in passing this point but a short time before they became occupied by their pickets.

"The time consumed in the saving of the government property in Frederick, which amounted to several hundred thousands, was about five hours."

In Frederick martial law was proclaimed by the Confederates, and Col. Bradley T. Johnson, a native of the place, was appointed provost-marshal, with a strong guard of soldiers to patrol the streets and preserve order. Immediately on assuming command he issued the following proclamation:

"To the People of Maryland:

"After sixteen months of oppression more gallant than the Austrian tyranny, the victorious army of the South brings freedom to your doors. Its standard now waves from the Potomac to Mason and Dixon's line. The men of Maryland, who during the last long months have been crushed under the heel of this terrible despotism, now have the opportunity for working out their own redemption, for which they have so long waited and suffered and hoped.

"The government of the Confederate States is pledged by the unanimous vote of its Congress, by the distinct declaration of its President, the soldier and statesman, Davis, never to cease this war until Maryland has the opportunity to decide for herself her own fate, untrammeled and free from Federal bayonets.

"The people of the South, with unanimity unparalleled, have given their hearts to our native State, and hundreds of thousands of her sons have sworn with arms in their hands that they shall be free.

"You must now do your part. We have the arms here for you. I am authorized immediately to muster in for the war companies and regiments; the companies of one hundred men each, the regiments of ten companies. Come all who wish to strike for their liberties and homes. Let each man provide himself with a stout pair of shoes, a good blanket, and a tin cup. Jackson's men have no baggage.

"Officers are in Frederick to receive recruits, and all companies formed will be armed as soon as mustered in. Rise at once!

"Remember the cells of Fort McHenry! Remember the dungeons of Fort Lafayette and Fort Warren! the insults to your wives and daughters, the arrests, the midnight searches of your houses!

"Remember these, your wrongs, and rise at once in arms and strike for liberty and right!

"Bradley T. Johnson, Col. C. S. A.

"Sept. 8, 1862."

"Personne," the correspondent of the Charleston Mercury, who was an eye-witness to all the stirring scenes of Lee's campaign in Maryland, in a letter dated at Frederick, September 7th, the day after the Confederates arrived, says—

"Thus far we have everywhere met with cordial hospitality. Among the road the farmers have welcomed the presence of our men with a sincerity that cannot be misunderstood, opened their houses, and spread their boards with the fat of the land. One Marylander whom I met has fed, in twenty-four hours, six hundred hungry men, free of charge. Others have been proportionately liberal. Our reception, up to this point, has been all that we could desire. With a few the enthusiasm has been highly demonstrative, but the majority content themselves with quiet manifestations of the warm sympathy they feel. Nearly all the houses along the route of march were open, and invitations were freely extended to the officers to spend the day and night. A slight indication of the grateful outbursts of the people was in the presentation of a magnificent horse to Gen. Jackson, by the farmers, within an hour after he touched Maryland soil. In the sentiment of the people we are not much disappointed. It is apparently about equally divided, and there is yet little expressed enthusiasm. As Jackson's army marched through their houses were mostly closed, and from between the window-blinds the citizens could be seen anxiously peering, as if they expected to see a crowd of hugga-boos, intent upon nothing but rapine and slaughter. A few of the residences were open, however, and in those ladies and gentlemen were waviing their handkerchiefs and displaying the Confederate flag."

On Sunday the churches were opened as usual, and were filled with Confederate officers and soldiers. Gen. Jackson attended the Presbyterian and German Reformed churches. On Monday, September 8th, "Personne" writes,—

"Frederick to-day presents a busy scene, more like that of a Fourth of July festival than a gathering of armed invaders; a majority of the stores are closed to general admission, because of the crowds eager to press and buy, but a little diploamy secures an entrance at the back door, or post the sentinel wisely stationed to protect the proprietor from the rush of anxious customers. Prices are going up rapidly. Everything is so cheap that our men frequently lay down a five-dollar bill to pay for a three-dollar article, and rush out without waiting for the change. The good people here don't understand it. Bitter complaints are uttered against those who refuse Confederate money, and it is understood that the authorities will insist upon its general circulation.

"The people are beginning to recover from their surprise at our sudden appearance, and to realize the magnitude of our preparations to advance through and relieve Maryland from her thraldom. Some are still moody, and evidently hate us heartily, but we are more than compensated by the warm welcome once of others, who now begin to greet us from every quarter. Only a few moments ago I met a lady who confessed that although she had Confederate flags ready to expose in her windows as we passed, she was afraid to wear them lest, being discovered by her Union neighbors, she should be reported to the Federals in case of our retreat, and be therefore subject to insult, if not imprisonment, at their hands. To assure me how true were her sentiments, she introduced me to a large room in her house, where there were fourteen ladies, young and old, busy as bees making shirts, drawers, and other clothing for the soldiers. She also distributed money and tobacco to the soldiers."
"Though thousands of soldiers are now roaming through the town, there has not been a solitary instance of misdemeanor. I have heard no shouting, no clamor of any kind, and seen but a single case of intoxication,—a one-legged Yankee prisoner. All who visit the city are required to have passes, and the only persons arrested are those who are here without leave. This quiet behavior of our men contrasts so strongly with that of the Federals when here as to excite the favorable comment of the Unionists.

"None of the latter have to my knowledge been interfered with, and, as far as I can learn, it is not the policy of our commander to retaliate. We shall, on the contrary, pursue a conciliatory course, and by kindness endeavor to show those misguided people that our home should be their home, and our God their God.

"One of these men frankly confessed to me that he feared his own neighbors more than he did our troops, and he should regret to see us depart. We pay for everything as we go, the farmers being compensated for all damage by the burning of rails, use of forage, or destruction of crops before we break up camp.

"Recruiting here goes on rapidly. Within two days ago five companies have been formed, and it is stated that from the surrounding country over seven hundred entered our ranks while in route. Pennsylvania, the border line of which is only some twenty-five or twenty-eight miles distant, has sent us nearly a hundred recruits, who prefer service in the Confederate army to being drafted into that of the North.

"Altogether, our movements have been thus far marked by the most gratifying success. Every detail has been successively carried out, the troops are in good health and full of enthusiasm, the commissariat is improving, and we wait for nothing more anxiously than the order to resume our march onward."

On the same day Gen. Lee issued the following address to the people of Maryland, setting forth the object of his invasion:

"HEADQUARTERS ARMY N. V., NEAR FREDERICK TOWN, Sept. 8, 1862,
TO THE PEOPLE OF MARYLAND:

"It is right that you should know the purpose that has brought the army under my command within the limits of your State, so far as that purpose concerns yourselves.

"The people of the Confederate States have long watched with the deepest sympathy the wrongs and outrages that have been inflicted upon the citizens of a Commonwealth allied to the States of the South by the strongest social, political, and commercial ties.

"They have seen with profound indignation their sister State deprived of every right, and reduced to the condition of a conquered province.

"Under the pretense of supporting the Constitution, but in violation of its most valuable provisions, your citizens have been arrested and imprisoned upon no charge, and contrary to all forms of law; the faithful and manly protest against this outrage, made by the venerable and illustrious Marylander to whom in better days no citizen appealed for right in vain, was treated with scorn and contempt. The government of your city has been usurped by armed strangers; your Legislature has been dissolved by the unlawful arrest of its members; freedom of the press and speech has been suppressed; words have been declared offenses by an arbitrary decree of the Federal Executive, and citizens ordered to be tried by a military commission for what they may dare to speak. Believing that the people of Maryland possessed a spirit too lofty to submit to such a government, the people of the South have long wished to aid you in throwing off this foreign yoke, to enable you to again enjoy the inalienable rights of freemen, and restore independence and sovereignty to your State.

"In obedience to this wish our army has come among you, and is prepared to assist you with the power of its arms in regainin the rights of which you have been deprived.

"This, citizens of Maryland, is our mission, so far as yourselves are concerned.

"No restraint upon your free will is intended; no intimidation will be allowed.

"Within the limits of this army at least Marylanders shall once more enjoy their ancient freedom of thought and speech.

"We know no enemies among you, and will protect all of every opinion.

"It is for you to decide your destiny, freely and without constraint.

"This army will respect your choice whatever it will be, and while the Southern people will rejoice to welcome you to your natural position among them, they will only welcome you when you some of your own free will."

"R. E. Lee, General Commanding."

It was hoped by the South that Johnson's proclamation and Lee's stirring appeal would arouse the people of the State, but few responded to the call. The section occupied by the Confederate army was inhabited by people who had, for the most part, very different views and feelings from those of the more southern counties. In the latter and in Baltimore thousands would have flocked to the standard of Lee had they not been restrained by the Federal occupation. Moreover, the wretched appearance of the Confederate troops had a discouraging effect, and damped the martial ardor of many who visited the camp with intent to enter the service. The cavalry and artillery were nearly all barefooted, and many of the infantry in the same condition, some having their feet tied up with rags, pieces of carpet, or covered with raw-hides, while the more fortunate had some battered remnants of shoes, through which the toes protruded. It was no unusual sight to see tracks of blood on the turnpike left by a marching regiment. While the Confederates occupied Frederick, their cavalry scouted the entire country for forage, provisions, recruits, etc. They established pickets on the Baltimore turnpike, at New Market, Liberty, Middletown, Union Bridge, Pikesville, Poplar Springs, and other places. Col. Piper, with about three hundred and fifty of Stuart's cavalry and one piece of artillery, occupied Westminster, where they arrested Dr. Billingslea, the provost-marshal, but afterwards released him on parole. All the books and papers relating to the enrollment were seized and destroyed. They also seized the post-office and carried off the postage-stamps. In their intercourse with the citizens they professed the greatest friendship for the peace of the State, and desired to be received as friends. No one was interfered with, or questioned with regard to their sentiments. They had plenty of money (such as it was), and spent it freely, purchasing what they wanted from the stores.

Recruiting-offices were opened in Frederick, and citizens invited to enlist. Very few volunteers, however, were obtained, not enough to compensate for the loss the army sustained by desertion.

Scouting parties were thrown out in various directions for considerable distances. Middletown was occupied by a small force on the 9th. In anticipation of such an event, many of the residents had already left their homes and sought refuge elsewhere. A body of cavalry moved as far east as Uniontown, while another party penetrated to within four miles of Ellicott's Mills.

The excitement in Pennsylvania was quite as great as in Maryland. An invasion of the North had been loudly proclaimed by the Confederates, and threats of devastation and retaliation were freely uttered. The advance to Frederick was directly towards Pennsylvania, and the invasion of that State seemed imminent. While the infantry were at Frederick the Confederate cavalry had entered Pennsylvania, and their numbers had been greatly exaggerated by rumor. In the excited state of the people it was believed the whole army was advancing towards Harrisburg, with the purpose of moving thence upon Philadelphia. Gov. Curtin summoned the people, and they hastened in great numbers to Harrisburg, while from other States new levies and volunteers were hurried forward to the defense of the capital. Jackson's division was encamped on Norman's, near the suburbs, to the north of Frederick, except the brigade of Gen. J. R. Jones (Col. Bradley T. Johnson commanding), which was encamped in the barracks inclosure in the city as provost-guard. Ewell's and Hill's divisions occupied positions near the railroad bridge over the Monocacy, guarding the approaches to Washington. On the occupation of Frederick, Gen. Lee supposed the Federals would evacuate Harper's Ferry, and thus open his line of communication through the Valley of Virginia to Richmond. As this did not occur, it became necessary, if possible, to dislodge the Federals from this position before concentrating the army west of the mountains. With this object in view, Gen. Lee directed Jackson to proceed with his command to Martinsburg, and after driving the Federals under Gen. White from that place, to move down the south side of the Potomac on Harper's Ferry. Gen. McLaw, with his own and R. H. Anderson's divisions, was ordered to seize Maryland Heights, on the north side of the Potomac, opposite Harper's Ferry, and Brig.-Gen. Walker to take possession of Loudon Heights, on the east side of the Shenandoah at its junction with the Potomac. These several commands, after reducing Harper's Ferry and clearing the valley, were ordered to join the rest of the army at Boonsboro' or Hagerstown. These troops, in pursuance of their orders, on the morning of the 10th of September broke up camp at Monocacy Junction, and passing rapidly through Middletown, Boonsboro', and Williamsport, recrossed the Potomac at Light's Ford on the 11th. Gen. A. P. Hill moved with his division on the turnpike direct from Williamsport to Martinsburg. The divisions of Jackson and Ewell proceeded towards the North Mountain depot, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, about seven miles northwest of Martinsburg, to prevent the escape of Gen. White's troops. Maj. Myers, commanding the cavalry, sent part of his force as far south as the Berkeley and Hampshire turnpike. Gen. White, learning of these movements, evacuated Martinsburg on the 11th, and retreated to Harper's Ferry. On the following day Jackson's command took possession of Martinsburg, and on the morning of the 13th they arrived before the Federals drawn up in force upon Bolivar Heights. Before beginning the attack, Gen. Jackson proceeded to put himself in communication with the co-operating forces of McLaw and Walker. The latter took possession of London Heights on the 13th, and on next day was in readiness to open fire upon Harper's Ferry.

The former entered Pleasant Valley on the 11th, and on the following day Gen. Kershaw, with his own and Barksdale's brigade, proceeded to ascend the ridge whose southern extremity is known as Maryland Heights and attack Col. Thomas H. Ford, who occupied that position with infantry and artillery, protected by intrenchments. He disposed of the rest of his force to hold the roads leading from Harper's Ferry eastward through Weaverton, and northward from Sandy Hook, guarding the pass in his rear, through which he had entered Pleasant Valley, with the brigades of Semmes and Mahone.

In the meanwhile events occurred in Maryland which threatened to interfere with the reduction of Harper's Ferry. On the 10th of September Gen. Longstreet moved from Frederick for Hagerstown, and reached there with part of his command on the 11th. Gen. D. H. Hill with his division constituted the rear-guard, and had charge of the immense wagon-train moving in the direction of Hagerstown. On the 13th he was ordered by Gen. Lee to dispose of his troops so as to prevent the escape of the Federal garrison from Harper's Ferry, then besieged, and also to guard the pass in the Blue Ridge near Boonsboro'.
When Gen. McClellan arrived in Washington, about the middle of August, he was in the department of Gen. Pope, which included the District of Columbia. On the 2d of September, Maj.-Gen. Halleck relieved Gen. Pope, and placed Maj.-Gen. McClellan in “command of the fortifications of Washington, and of all the troops for the defense of the capital.” On the 4th he assumed command of the forces under Gen. Pope, together with some new levies which had arrived at Washington under the call of the President. On the invasion of Maryland he received orders to pursue Gen. Lee with all the troops which were not required for the defense of Washington, and on the next day most of his army was in motion and rapidly advanced into Maryland. Gen. Banks was placed in command of the defenses at Washington, and Gen. Heintzelman in charge of the forces on the Virginia side. The command of Fitz John Porter’s corps was given to Gen. Hooker, and that of Gen. McDowell was assigned to Gen. Reno, late of the North Carolina Department.

“Having assumed command of the army, I pushed forward,” says Gen. McClellan, “the First and Ninth Corps under Genes. Reno and Hooker, forming the right wing, under Gen. Burnside, to Leesburg on the 5th inst.; thence the First Corps, by Brookeville, Cocksville, and Ridgeville, to Frederick; and the Ninth Corps, by Damascus, on New Market and Frederick. The Second and Eleventh Corps, under Gen. Sumner and Williams, on the 6th were moved from Tenallytown to Rockville; thence, by Middlebury and Urbana, on Frederick, the Eleventh Corps moving by a lateral road between Urbana and New Market, thus maintaining the communication between the center and right wing, as well as covering the direct route from Frederick to Washington. The Sixth Corps, under Gen. Franklin, was moved to Darnestown on the 6th inst.; thence, by Dawsonville and Barnsville, on Buckeystown, covering the road from the mouth of the Monocacy to Rockville, and being in a position to connect with and support the center, should it have been necessary (as was supposed) to force the line of the Monocacy. Couch’s division (composed of the brigades of Genes. Howe, Devens, and Cushman) was thrown forward to Offut’s Cross-Roads and Poolsville by the river road, thus covering that approach, watching the fords of the Potomac, and ultimately following and supporting the Sixth Corps. The object of these movements was to feel the enemy, to compel him to develop his intentions, at the same time that the troops were in position readily to cover Baltimore or Washington, to attack him should he hold the line of the Monocacy, or to follow him into Pennsylvania, if necessary.”

Attached to the Army of the Potomac at this time were the following Maryland organizations: The Second Infantry with the Ninth Corps, the Third and Purnell Legion with the Twelfth Corps, and Batteries A and B, Light Artillery, with the Sixth Corps. The Fifth Infantry was brought from Fort Monroe via Washington, and joined the Second Corps en route to Antietam.

Gen. McClellan started in pursuit of the enemy with his right and centre spread out towards the north to guard against any attempt of Lee to sweep around and capture Baltimore. Franklin’s command was kept on the left along the river line to prevent a coup de main in the direction of Washington.

Burnside’s column, moving via Leesboro’, Brookville, Damascus, and New Market, arrived at the bridge over the Monocacy on the Baltimore pike during the afternoon of the 12th. The bridge, held by a small force of the enemy, was carried after a slight resistance. An hour or two later a charge was made by Cox’s division of the Ninth Corps upon Frederick, the enemy’s rear-guard driven out and the city occupied. Pleasonton’s cavalry entered the town by the road from Georgetown simultaneously with Reno’s corps. The entrance of the latter into Frederick was a most brilliant scene. It was greeted with a cordial and enthusiastic welcome. An eye-witness says,—

“The entire corps advanced in a long, splendid line, Harland’s brigade emerging through the hospital barracks just in time to see the last of the rebel cavalry dash out of the streets pursued by our own. Women blessed God and the soldiers, and rushed out to kiss the old flag; gray-haired men hobbed forth with radiant faces, and the young shouted their welcome, while children capered in holiday glee. If Dame Barbara Frietchie alone had dared,

“When Lee marched over the mountain wall,” to set the starry flag defiantly in her attie window, thousands had kept the loved emblem, and the line had not been five minutes in the street before national banners, large and little, were flung from the windows, and draped with inspiring grace almost every threshold.”

Another wrote,—

“Gen. Burnside’s reception was especially enthusiastic. The people crowded around him, covered his horse and himself with flowers, saluted him with cheers and shouts of welcome, and manifested their joy in every method of demonstration. Gen. McClellan’s reception, at a later hour, was equally martial and demonstrative. The citizens of Frederick felt as though they had been delivered from a great affliction, and the Army of the Potomac had the opportunity of enjoying a new sensation.”

Of Gen. McClellan’s reception, another says,—

“When Burnside rode through the acclamations were universal, but nothing to the reception given McClellan when he entered some time after. Bouquets were thrown; men, women, and children rushed to him, bowing and speaking to all; girls embracing his horse’s neck and kissing the animal, only because they could not reach the general.”

A participant thus describes the passage of the Second and Twelfth Corps through the city:

On the 14th Sumner's column passed through Frederick, and was greeted by the loyal citizens of the place with a reception as handsome as it was unexpected. Flags that had been concealed while the enemy held possession now decorated the dwellings, and were waving along with the emblem that made Barbara Fritchie historical; and on the streets by which the army entered the people pressed forward to greet the soldiers with expressions of warmest sympathy.

"These patriotic manifestations were not confined to the town of Frederick, but frequently along the line of march through this portion of Maryland the inhabitants gave the strongest evidence of attachment to the Union cause. Ladies of all ages and stations in life stood by the roadside, in front of their dwellings, with pails of milk, or, if the supply had been exhausted, a cup of cold water and a word of cheer." 1

To these extracts from contemporary histories we may add that the Union element in the section of Maryland traversed by the two armies was very strong. The secession element was chiefly limited to Baltimore City and the tier of counties lying between the Chesapeake Bay and the Potomac River, and on the Eastern Shore. By the 13th of September the whole of McClellan's army had crossed the Monocacy, the larger portion being concentrated around Frederick.

During the Confederate occupation of Frederick, Capt. Russell, with Companies H and I, First Mary-

Gap and the road leading to Harper's Ferry. To check the advance of the enemy, and to prevent the relief of Harper's Ferry, Hill was directed to guard Crampton's Gap, and Longstreet was ordered from Hagerstown to his support.1

On the morning of September 14th, the Federal column under Gen. Franklin, then near Jefferson, was put in motion towards Harper's Ferry, with orders to secure and hold Crampton's Gap, "cut off, destroy, or capture McLaw's command, and relieve Col. Miles."

Gen. Franklin pushed his corps rapidly forward to the vicinity of Burkettsville, immediately in the rear of which he found the Confederate infantry posted in force on both sides of the road leading through the pass, with artillery in strong positions to defend the approaches thereto. Slocum's division was formed upon the right of the road, and Smith's upon the left. As the line advanced the Confederates were forced back into the gap, where they made a most determined stand, but after a spirited action of three hours the crest was gained by Gen. Franklin's troops, the Confederates hastily retreating down the western slope of the mountain.

During the engagement Battery A of the Federal Maryland Light Artillery was stationed on the left and to the right of Burkettsville, and maintained a steady fire on the positions of the Confederates until they were assailed and carried by the infantry.

The close of the action found Gen. Franklin's advance in Pleasant Valley, within three and a half miles of the point on Maryland Heights where he might, on the same night or the following morning, have formed a junction with the garrison at Harper's Ferry had not the force on the heights been previously withdrawn.

But Col. Miles surrendered at an early hour on the morning of the 15th, and it was now too late to accomplish the principal object of Gen. Franklin's movement. He was therefore directed to watch the enemy in his front and protect the left and rear of the main body of the army. This he did until the night of the 16th, when he was ordered to unite with the other corps confronting the enemy on the Antietam.

While the events just described were transpiring at Harper's Ferry and Crampton's Gap, the right of the Federal army was engaged in a contest for the possession of Turner's Gap, through which runs the main road from Frederick to Hagerstown.

On the morning of the 13th, Gen. Pleasonton moved with a portion of his cavalry in the direction of Middletown. After some sharp skirmishing he reached the town, out of which he drove the Confederate rear, and held it during the night. The enemy was found occupying Turner's Gap in strong force, and apparently determined to dispute the passage of the mountain. Cox's division of Reno's corps was advanced in the afternoon as a support to the cavalry, followed before night by the other divisions of the corps.

On the morning of the 14th the several corps constituting the right wing and centre, which had been united at Frederick, were posted as follows: The First (Hooker's) on the Monocacy, the Second (Sumner's), the Fifth (Sykes' division), and the Twelfth (Williams') at or near Frederick.

The advance division (Cox's) of the Ninth Corps (Reno's) was at Middletown, with the other three divisions (Wilcox's, Rodman's, and Sturgis') within easy supporting distance.

At an early hour Hooker began the march towards Middletown, followed at intervals by the other corps.

Gen. Burnside, commanding the right wing, had orders to carry Turner's Gap.

The combat of the day really commenced about 6 A.M. at the bridge over Catoctin Creek, half a mile west of Middletown, where the enemy had concentrated his artillery to resist the passage. D. H. Hill's division of Longstreet's corps held the crest of the mountain from three miles north of the gap to two miles south. This included Fox's Gap, at the point where a country road leading to Sharpsburg crosses the mountain, south of the main pike, and the "old Hagerstown road" on the northerly side.

About 9 A.M., the passage over the Catoctin having been forced, Cox's division moved up the acclivity towards Fox's Gap, and after a severe contest carried the crest. Cox's division was supported in the course of the day by the divisions of Wilcox, Rodman, and Sturgis.

While moving forward with the latter division, the Second Maryland was detached and placed in position near the turnpike, where it was held in reserve and lay under a galling artillery fire, but did not become actively engaged.

After very hard fighting the Ninth Corps repulsed several attacks of the enemy, and held full possession

1 Longstreet's corps was to remain at Hagerstown until the fall of Harper's Ferry. D. H. Hill's division, with Stuart's cavalry, constituted the rear guard of this corps. Longstreet's advance entered Hagerstown on the morning of the 11th. The sheriff and other officials left the place as soon as the enemy entered, carrying with them the public records and other valuables in their different offices. Numbers of private citizens also left the town. On the 6th and 7th the banks, anticipating the enemy's approach, had removed their deposits to Harrisburg and other places east for safety. The government stores there were also removed.
of the summit at Fox's Gap. Gen. Reno, its gallant commander, was killed just before sunset, and Gen. Cox assumed the command. About the middle of the afternoon Gen. Hooker, with Meade's and Hatcher's divisions, attacked the heights on the right of Turner's Gap, and after a desperate resistance carried the crest about dark and held it. Just before dark Gibbon's brigade of Hatcher's division advanced up the main road against the enemy in the gap, and after an obstinate conflict gained the entrance to the pass. At night the entire army except Franklin's column was massed in the vicinity of the field of battle.

The battle raged during the day with fearful effect against Hill's small force until the afternoon, when Longstreet, who had made a forced march from Hagerstown, arrived to his assistance about half-past three o'clock. Longstreet hurried his troops to Hill's assistance as rapidly as their exhausted condition would admit of, and they succeeded for some time in repulsing the repeated and powerful attacks of the Federal army, and prevented the passage of the Federal forces till night put an end to the conflict. The superiority of numbers enabled McClellan to extend his army beyond both flanks of the Confederate line. By this means he succeeded in reaching the summit of the mountain beyond the Confederate left, and pressing heavily upon them from that direction, gradually forced Gen. Rhodes back, till darkness prevented a further advance of the Federals.

Having accomplished all that was required,—the delay of the Federal army until Harper's Ferry could not be relieved,—the Confederates during the night retreated to Sharpsburg, covered by the cavalry brigade of Gen. Fitzhugh Lee. Gen. Hill, in summing up the results of this battle, says, "Should the truth ever be known, the battle of South Mountain, as far as my division was concerned, will be regarded as one of the most remarkable and creditable of the war. The division had marched all the way from Richmond, and the straggling had been enormous, in consequence of heavy marches, deficient commissariat, want of shoes, and inefficient officers. Owing to these combined causes, the division numbered less than five thousand men on the morning of the 14th of September, and had five roads to guard, extending over a space of as many miles. This small force successfully resisted without support for eight hours the whole Federal army, and when its supports were beaten still held the roads, so that our retreat was effected without the loss of a gun, a wagon, or an ambulance."

In the battle of South Mountain the Confederates lost in killed the following prominent officers: Gen. Garland, Col. B. B. Gayle, of the Twelfth Alabama; Col. J. B. Strange, of the Nineteenth Virginia. The Federals lost Gen. Reno and several minor officers.1 While these events were in progress, Gen. Jackson had been vigorously engaged in the attack upon Harper's Ferry.

The Federal Maryland troops at Harper's Ferry and immediate neighborhood were Companies H and I, First Cavalry, A, C, and D, Cole's cavalry battalion, and the First and Third Potomac Home Brigade Infantry.

Gen. Jackson, as has been said, left Frederick on

1 Gen. Reno was born in the State of Virginia, and was appointed as a West Point cadet from Pennsylvania in 1842. He graduated in 1846, in the same class with Maj.-Gen. McClellan, was brevetted second lieutenant of ordnance; went to Mexico, and participated in every engagement from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico. He was brevetted first lieutenant on the 18th of April, 1847, for gallantry at Cerro Gordo. In this battle, as at Chapultepec, he commanded a battery, and in the latter action he was wounded. For gallantry at Chapultepec he was brevetted captain, Sept. 12, 1847.

After the close of the war he was for six months Assistant Professor of Mathematics at West Point, and for eighteen months afterwards secretary to the Artillery Board, during which he was engaged in testing heavy ordnance and compiling tactics for heavy artillery. Various employments succeeded, in all of which he brought to bear judgment, good scientific attainments, and industry. He was for a time on the coast survey, then on topographical duty in the West: for a year engaged in building a military road from Big Sioux River to St. Paul, Minn. From 1854 to 1857 he was stationed at Frankford Arsenal, near Philadelphia. He was afterwards chief ordnance officer to Gen. Johnston in the Utah expedition, and remained there till 1859, when he was detached and sent to the Mount Vernon Arsenal, Alabama. He was afterwards stationed at Leavenworth, Kansas, where he was when the Rebellion broke out.

He was one of the officers selected by Gen. Burnside himself to accompany him in his expedition, and approved by his unvarying gallantry and conduct the choice of his superior general. He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers Nov. 12, 1861, distinguished himself at Roanoke and Newbern, and was considered one of the bravest and most promising officers in the service. When Burnside's army was brought up from North Carolina, Reno was put in command of a division, and in the battles before Washington so distinguished himself that his name is among the foremost of those honorably mentioned in reports. Gen. Reno's remains were conveyed to Baltimore, where they were embalmed by John H. Weaver. On the 16th they were placed in a patent air-tight coffin and removed to the President Street depot, to be conveyed by the one o'clock train of the Philadelphia Railroad to Boston, Mass., where his family resided. During the morning a large number of persons, including ladies, visited the establishment of Mr. Weaver to view the body, which was exposed to view. He was dressed in his full uniform, and had quite a natural appearance. The following members of his staff accompanied the remains from Frederick to Baltimore, and thence to Boston: Capt. E. M. Neale, assistant adjutant-general, Capt. B. F. Reno, aide-de-camp to the general (his brother), and Lieuts. John A. Morris, Thos. A. Marsh, and Charles Hutton, aides-de-camp.
the 10th, and marching rapidly via Williamsport, occupied Martinsburg on the 12th, the Federal garrison having fallen back east of Sandy Hook, and was now approaching Loudon Heights; and McLaw's having gained the summit of Maryland Heights by way of Solomon's Gap, confronted Col. Ford's command, posted there for the defense of Harper's Ferry on the north. During the afternoon portions of the Thirty-second Ohio and One Hundred and Twenty-sixth New York were deployed along the mountain near to the Gap. Skirmishing commenced at about half-past three, continuing until sundown. Owing to the thick underbrush, the skirmish was of a bushwhacking character, as, indeed, was all the fighting on the heights. After dark a strong picket-line was established from one side to the other of the mountain, and a renewal of the conflict awaited with sleepless anxiety.

At daybreak on the 13th a line of battle was formed some three hundred yards in front of a barricade constructed four hundred yards in advance of what was known as the "lookout." Companies K and B, First Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, held the extreme right, the One Hundred and Twenty-sixth New York next in order, Thirty-second Ohio front and centre, and the Thirty-ninth New York the extreme left. Companies H and I of the First Maryland Cavalry, under Capt. Charles H. Russell, advanced on foot about three hundred yards in front of the line of battle. But the enemy appearing in superior force, firing heavily, these companies fell back after discharging two volleys. The enemy then, about seven o'clock, opened with musketry on the front and right, and made two partial charges, in which he was handsomely repulsed. Fighting now became general along the whole line, continuing one hour. At the end of this time, the Confederates, receiving reenforcements, advanced with great vigor and determination. Under this pressure the whole line fell back to the barricade, fighting as it retired.

On reaching the barricade a stand was made and the position maintained for several hours, Company K, First Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, with its handful of men, preventing a flank movement on the right. But the enemy having succeeded in turning the left compelled the command to again fall back some distance. At this juncture the Third Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, under Lieut.-Col. S. W. Downey, arrived from below, and the line advanced, reoccupying the "lookout."

Again, however, the Confederates succeeded in flanking the defenders of the heights, and they were obliged to fall back, first to the naval battery overlooking Harper's Ferry, and ultimately, about four p.m., down the mountain and across the river into the town. Capt. Russell, of the First Maryland Cavalry, displayed much gallantry. Capt. Charles J. Brown, of Company K, First Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, also exhibited much heroism. Lieut.-Col. Downey, of the Third Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, was complimented by Col. Miles for his courage and skill in handling his troops. Col. Downey, while in command of a small reconnoitering force of cavalry, nineteen men of First Maryland Cavalry, under Capt. Shamburg, from Kearneysville, had been slightly wounded in a skirmish with the enemy's column passing through Boonsboro' on the 10th. Lieut. D. C. Hiteshew, of Company H, First Maryland Cavalry, showed conspicuous bravery, and was mortally wounded while encouraging his men to stand firm under a deadly fire. Sergt. P. L. Hiteshew, of Company I, a brother of the lieutenant, was severely wounded, and it is a singular circumstance that these brothers were the only ones injured in the two companies.

At the close of the day Gens. Jackson and Walker closely invested Harper's Ferry on the west and south, and McLaw's held Maryland Heights, which was the key of the position.

Next morning the remainder of the First Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, under Col. William P. Maulsby, took position near the Virginia end of the pontoon-bridge spanning the Potomac, with orders to destroy it should the enemy attempt to make a crossing. The Third Potomac Home Brigade Infantry occupied a position behind the earthworks on Bolivar Heights. In the forenoon Col. Miles' batteries opened on Loudon and Maryland Heights, and continued shelling them for several hours.

About two p.m. the Confederates began a furious artillery fire simultaneously from Loudon and Maryland Heights and from Sandy Hook. The Federal artillery replied with much spirit, and for a time silenced the Loudon batteries. The enemy also opened other guns from the Shepherdstown and Charlestown roads. Heavy cannonading was thus brought to bear on the doomed garrison from five different points. Notwithstanding this the Union forces held their ground manfully until the firing ceased, towards sunset.

About dusk the Confederates in front opened a musketry fire on the left flank, posted near the Shenandoah, which was promptly returned by Companies A and I (Cook and Samuel), First Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, and five companies of the Eighty-seventh Ohio Regiment. But the Union line was finally forced to contract itself, the enemy having succeeded in turning the flank. After nightfall all became quiet, and the exhausted soldiers slept on their arms.
Two noteworthy incidents in which Marylanders figured prominently occurred during the investment.

On the night of the 13th, after the evacuation of Maryland Heights, Col. Miles directed Capt. Charles H. Russell, of the First Cavalry, to take a few men, pass through the enemy's lines, and report to Gen. McClellan the condition of the beleaguered garrison.

Shortly after dark Capt. Russell, accompanied by five men, started from the Ferry, and moving up the Potomac, on the Virginia side, until he reached the mouth of the Antietam, crossed into Maryland, and surprised and captured some Confederate pickets, whom he bucked and gagged to prevent their giving the alarm. He then pushed his way through the mountains, often in sight of the enemy's camps. Reaching Gen. McClellan's headquarters at Frederick early the next morning, he reported as directed by Col. Miles.

Maj. H. A. Cole, another energetic and daring officer, with one man, also made his way on foot through the investing lines, and carried dispatches to Gen. McClellan representing the desperate situation of Harper's Ferry. The major received orders to return and advise Col. Miles to hold out, as successor was approaching, but before he could get back Col. Miles had been killed and the humiliating surrender consummated.

After the capitulation the Maryland troops were sent to Camp Parole, at Annapolis. Their losses in killed and wounded were as follows:

Companies H and I, First Cavalry, had one officer (Lieut. Hiteshew) mortally, and one enlisted man severely, wounded in the fight on Maryland Heights.

Companies B and K, First Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, lost in the action on Maryland Heights six enlisted men killed and six wounded.

The Third Potomac Home Brigade Infantry had one officer (Capt. Jacob Sarbangh) killed and one officer (Maj. C. L. Graffton) and seven enlisted men wounded in the combat on Bolivar Heights, and one man (William H. Harrison) killed and one man wounded on Maryland Heights.

The number of troops surrendered at Harper's Ferry was eleven thousand five hundred and eighty-three, half of them being from New York, and the remainder from Ohio and Maryland. Among the latter was Col. Maulsby's First Maryland Regiment, Potomac Home Brigade, nine hundred men; Col. Downey's Third Maryland Regiment, of the same brigade, six hundred men.

1 Charles W. Oursler, George Frank, Robert N. Gill, James E. Huggins, William T. Martin, and Charles Mann.
Seventy-three pieces of artillery, thirteen thousand small-arms, two hundred wagons, and a large quantity of tents and camp equipage fell into the hands of the Confederates.

Leaving Gen. A. P. Hill to receive the surrender of the Federal troops and secure the captured property, Gen. Jackson, with Ewell's division (Gen. Lawton commanding) and Jackson's (Gen. Jones commanding), set out at once to join Gen. Lee at Sharpsburg, ordering Gens. McLaws and Walker to follow without delay. By a forced march he arrived at Sharpsburg on the morning of the 16th, where he was joined on the 17th by the remainder of his command. McLaws crossed the Potomac at Harper's Ferry, and destroying the bridge behind him, moved through Martinsburg and Shepherdstown to Sharpsburg.

On the morning of the 15th the whole right wing and centre of the Federal army was pushed forward in pursuit of the commands of Gens. D. H. Hill and Longstreet, who had retreated from South Mountain during the night. The Confederates reached Sharpsburg about daylight on the morning of the 15th of September. Pleasonton's cavalry, followed by the corps of Sumner, Hooker, and Mansfield (the latter having assumed command of the Twelfth), moved by way of the National pike.

The Ninth Corps, under Cox, and Sykes' division of the Fifth, the whole commanded by Gen. Burnside, marched by the old Sharpsburg road. The cavalry advance, supported by Richardson's division of Sumner's corps, had a severe skirmish with the Confederate rear-guard at Boonsboro', and followed the retreating foe to a new position he had taken on the heights behind Antietam Creek, in front of Sharpsburg. Late in the afternoon Gen. McClellan put his army in position on the eastern side of the creek, opposite the enemy's lines.

In the course of the day Gen. Lee, having learned of the capture of Harper's Ferry, ordered Jackson, Walker, and McLaws to join him at Sharpsburg without delay.

At daylight on the 16th the Confederate batteries opened on McClellan's army, and a heavy cannonading on both sides was kept up throughout the day. At two P.M. the advance of Hooker's corps crossed Antietam Creek at the upper bridge and a ford close by, engaged the enemy near the house of Daniel Miller, and drove him from his position.

The firing lasted until after dark, when Hooker's troops rested on the ground won from the enemy. During the night Mansfield's corps (the Twelfth) also crossed the creek, and bivouacked about a mile in the rear of Hooker's position.

Gen. Lee had drawn up his army in front of the town of Sharpsburg, on the high ground west of the Antietam, a narrow and winding stream which flows through fields dotted with homesteads and clumps of fruit and forest-trees to the Potomac. "The Confederate commander," says Swinton, "formed his troops on a line stretched across the angle formed by the Potomac and Antietam; and as the Potomac here makes a sharp curve, Lee was able to rest both flanks on that stream, while his front was covered by the Antietam." Longstreet's corps was posted on the right of the road from Sharpsburg to Boonsboro', his right flank guarded by the waters of the stream, which here bends westward. On the left of the Boonsboro' road D. H. Hill's command was stationed; two brigades under Gen. Hood were drawn up on Hill's left, and when Jackson arrived Lee directed him to post his command on the left of Hood, his right resting on the Hagerstown road, and his left extending backward obliquely towards the Potomac, here making a large bend, where Stuart with his cavalry and horse artillery occupied the ground to the river's bank.1

federate right, a second in front of Hill, in the centre, a third opposite Jackson, by the Dunker church, near which was also a ford, and a fourth beyond the Confederate left flank. The upper bridge was on the Keedysville and Williamsport road, the second on the Keedysville and Sharpsburg pike, and the third on the Rohersville and Sharpsburg road. Between the first and second bridges the distance is about two and a half miles, and from the second to the third about one mile. By the morning of the 16th the whole Confederate force had concentrated at Sharpsburg, with the exception of McLaws' and A. P. Hill's divisions, which had not yet returned from Harper's Ferry.

Confronting the Confederate lines on the left were the corps of Hooker and Mansfield, supported by Sumner's and Franklin's; Burnside was on the extreme right, and Porter in the centre. Porter's corps was posted on the left of the turnpike, opposite bridge No. 2; Burnside's Ninth Corps, on the Rohersville and Sharpsburg turnpike, directly in front of bridge No. 3. McClellan determined to throw his right across the creek by the upper and unguarded bridge, beyond the Confederate left flank, and when this manoeuvre should have shaken the enemy, the centre and left were to carry the bridges in their front. 1

"The turning movement," says Swinton, "was intrusted to Hooker's corps, to be followed by Sumner's two corps. Towards the middle of the afternoon of the 16th Hooker's corps was put in motion, and crossed the stream at the upper bridge and ford, out of range of the hostile fire. Advancing through the woods, Hooker soon struck the left flank of the Confederate line, held by Hood's two brigades," on the extreme left of Longstreet's line, between Antietam Creek and the village of Sharpsburg. "Lee," continues Swinton, "had anticipated a menace on that flank, and had made his dispositions accordingly, Hood's brigade forming a crotchet on the Confederate left. 2

It was towards dusk when the troops of Hooker and Hood met, and after a smart skirmish between the Confederates and the division of Pennsylvania Reserves under Gen. Meade, the opposing forces rested on their arms for the night, both occupying a skirt of woods which form the eastern and northern enclosure of a considerable clearing on both sides of the Hager-town road. This movement across the Antietam on the 16th was of no advantage; it was made too late in the day to accomplish anything, and it served to disclose to Lee his antagonist's purpose. The Confederate commander made no change in his dispositions, save to order Jackson, who lay in reserve in the rear of the left, to substitute a couple of his brigades in the rear of Hood's worn-out command. Gen. McClellan strengthened the turning column by directing Sumner to throw over during the night the Twelfth Corps, under Gen. Mansfield, to the support of Hooker; and he ordered Sumner to hold his own corps (the Second) ready to cross early in the morning.

The strength of the two armies was by no means equal. "Our forces at the battle of Antietam," said Gen. McClellan, in his testimony before the committee of investigation, were, total in action, eighty-seven thousand one hundred and sixty-four." Gen. Lee says in his report, "This great battle was fought by less than forty thousand men on our side." 3

2 "In anticipation of a movement to turn the line of Antietam, Hood's two brigades had been transferred from the right to the left, and posted between D. H. Hill and the Hager-town road." — Lee; "Reports of the Army of Northern Virginia," vol. i. p. 32.
3 Col. Walter H. Taylor, adjutant-general of the Army of Northern Virginia, and a member of Gen. Lee's staff, says,—
"The command of Gen. Jackson embraced the division under Gen. J. R. Jones and that under Gen. Lawton. After Gen. Lawton was wounded, the command of the latter division devolved upon Gen. Early. Gen. J. R. Jones reports the effective strength of his division as follows: Lawton's brigade, eleven hundred and fifty; Hayes' brigade, five hundred and fifty; Walker's brigade, seven hundred; and his own brigade, one thousand; total effective of the division, three thousand four hundred, and the total effective of Jackson's command was therefore five thousand men."
"The command of Gen. Longstreet at that time embraced the six brigades under Gen. D. R. Jones, the two brigades under Gen. Hood, and an unattached brigade under Gen. N. G. Evans. His other three brigades were temporarily detached under Gen. R. H. Anderson.
"Gen. Jones reports his strength to have been two thousand four hundred and thirty effective, the strength of Hood's division at the commencement of the campaign was three thousand eight hundred and fifty-two. Gen. Hood puts the losses of his division in its encounters with the enemy previous to the battle of Sharpsburg at fifteen hundred and twenty; this, making an deduction for straggling, would make his effective in that engagement but two thousand three hundred and thirty-two. Gen. Evans states that his brigade numbered two thousand two hundred and sixty-two effective at the opening of the campaign, and reports his losses in the battles about Manassas at six hundred and thirty; his brigade was also engaged at South Mountain, and could not have exceeded fifteen hundred effective at Sharpsburg. Gen. Longstreet's command therefore numbered six thousand two hundred and sixty-two effective. Gen. D. H. Hill in his report puts his effective at three thousand on the morning of the 17th."
"Gen. R. H. Anderson's division, embracing on this occasion the brigades of Mahone, Wright, Armistead, Wilcox, Pryor, and Featherston, and temporarily assigned to Gen. D. H. Hill, is stated by the latter to have been three or four thousand strong,—call it three thousand five hundred."

Confederate Troops.
At daylight on the 17th the combat was opened by Hooker, who assaulted the Confederate left, now held by Jackson's force. "The ground on which the battle opened," says Swinton, "was the same field on which the action continued to be waged during the day, and it has already been indicated in that opening extending to the east and west of the Hagerstown road, bounded on each side by woods. In the fringe of forest on the eastern side of the road Hooker had the previous evening effected a lodgment, though morning found the Confederate riflemen still clinging to its margin, while the main force of Jackson lay in the low timbered ground on the west side of the road, where the Confederate troops were pretty well protected by the out-cropping ledges of rock. But though it had this tactical advantage for the defense, the position was really untenable, for it was completely commanded and seen in reverse by high ground a little to the right to where Hooker formed his line of battle. This height was the key-point of all that part of the field, and had it been occupied by Union batteries, as it should have been, the low timbered ground around the Dunker church, where Jackson's line lay, could not have been held fifteen minutes. It is a noteworthy fact that neither Gen. Hooker nor Gen. Sumner, who followed him in command upon this part of the field, at all appreciated the supreme importance of this point. The former, beginning the combat, opened a direct attack with the view of carrying the Hagerstown road and the woods on the west side of it; and this continued to be the aim of all the subsequent attacks, which were made very much in detail, and thus lost the effective character they might have had with more comprehensive dispositions."

The attack was ushered in by a heavy fire from the Federal batteries on the ridge on the east side of the Antietam, and by those which had accompanied Hooker and Mansfield across the stream the night before, and was promptly replied to by the Confederate batteries under Pogue, Carpenter, Brockenbrough, Raines, Caskie, and Woolding. Hooker, under a terrific storm of shell, canister, and musketry, advanced his corps of eighteen thousand men, with Doubleday's division on the right, Meade's in the centre, and Ricketts' on the left. Jackson met him with two divisions, Ewell's and Jackson's, commanded respectively by Lawton and Jones, and numbering only four thousand men.

"Just as the light broadened in the east above the crest of mountains rising in rear of the Federal lines, Gen. Hooker made his assault. His aim was plainly to drive the force in his front across the Hagerstown road and back on the Potomac, and in this he seemed about to succeed. Jackson had placed in front Ewell's division of twenty-four hundred men. This force received Gen. Hooker's charge, and a furious struggle followed, in which the division was nearly destroyed. A glance at the casualties will show this. They were remarkable. Gen. Lawton, division commander, was wounded and carried from the field; Col. Douglas, brigade commander, was killed; Col. Walker, also

"Gen. A. P. Hill's command consisted of the brigades of Branch, Gregg, Archer, Pender, and Brockenbrough. He stated the strength of the first three at two thousand, and allowing the average of seven hundred each for the other two, we have for his division a total effective of three thousand four hundred. The other brigade of this division (Thomas') was left at Harper's Ferry.

"The division of Gen. McLaws consisted of the brigades of Kershaw, Barksdale, Semmes, and Cobb. He reports the effective strength of the four brigades to have been two thousand eight hundred and ninety-three."

"There remains but the small division of two brigades under Gen. J. G. Walker. Gen. Ransom states his effective strength at sixteen hundred. Gen. Walker does not give the strength of his brigade, but I have put it at sixteen hundred, on the authority of Gen. Ransom, who says, 'So far as my memory serves me, my brigade was stronger all the time than the other of Walker's division.' With the exception of the single brigade last mentioned, the following recapitulation is established upon indisputable and contemporary authority, being nothing less than the testimony of the commanding officers, as shown by their official reports, made at the time:

Total effective infantry...... 27,255

"I cannot verify the estimate made for the cavalry and artillery, viz., eight thousand, but I am sure it is rather excessive than the reverse."

Swinton, a Northern historian, says, "So greatly had the Confederate army become reduced by its previous losses and by straggling that Lee was unable to count above forty thousand bayonets."
commanding brigade, was disabled. Lawton's brigade lost five hundred and fifty-four killed and wounded out of eleven hundred and fifty, and five out of six regimental commanders. Hayes' brigade lost three hundred and twenty-three out of five hundred and fifty, and all the regimental commanders. Walker's brigade lost two hundred and twenty-eight out of less than seven hundred, and three out of four regimental commanders; and of the staff-officers of the division scarcely one remained." 1

This heavy slaughter had been effected in Ewell's division within an hour after dawn, but in spite of their stubborn resistance they were unable to hold their ground and fell back in disorder from the "lither woods" across the open fields. The Union batteries on the opposite bank of the Antietam had secured an enfilade fire on Jackson's advance and reserved line, and, together with the batteries in front, had contributed largely to the loss sustained by the Confederates. Hooker, perceiving his advantage, at once advanced his centre under Meade to seize the Hagers-town road and the woods beyond, with the design of crushing the whole Confederate left, but was met by Jackson's old division of sixteen hundred men, who had been held in reserve, and by Hood's two small brigades, one numbering about eight hundred and sixty-four men, which Gen. Lee had hastened to the threatened point. With this force Jackson now met Gen. Hooker's advancing column, 2 delivering a heavy fire from the woods upon the Federal forces. In the face of this fire they hesitated, and Hood made a vigorous charge, Gen. Stuart opening at the same time a cross-fire on the enemy with his horse artillery. The combined fire increased their disorganization, and it now turned into disorder. Jackson seized the moment, as always, throwing forward the whole line, and the enemy were first checked and then driven back in confusion, the Confederates pursuing and cheering." 3

"At the same time," says Swinton, "Ricketts' division on the left became hotly engaged with three brigades of Hill's division, which were at this time closed up on the right of Jackson in support; and Hooker's right division, under Doubleday, was held in check by the fire of several batteries of Stuart's horse artillery, posted on commanding ground on his right and front. Hooker had suffered severely by the enemy's fire; but, worse still, had lost nearly half his effective force by struggling. In this state of facts his offensive power was completely gone, and at seven o'clock Mansfield's corps, which had crossed the Antietam during the night and lay in reserve a mile to the rear, was ordered up to support and relieve Hooker's troops. Of this corps the First Division, under Gen. Williams, took position on the right, and the Second, under Gen. Greene, on the left. During the deployment that veteran soldier, Gen. Mansfield, fell mortally wounded. The command of the corps fell to Gen. Williams, and the division of the latter to Gen. Crawford, who, with his own and Jordan's brigade, made an advance across the open field, and succeeded in seizing a point of woods on the west side of the Hagerstown road. At the same time Greene's division on the left was able to clear its front, and crossed into the left of the Dunker church. Yet the tenure of these positions was attended with heavy loss; the troops, reduced to the attempt to hold their own, began to waver and break, and Gen. Hooker was being carried from the field severely wounded, when opportunely, towards nine o'clock, Gen. Sumner, with his own corps, reached the field.

"Of the extraordinary statement respecting this part of the battle made by Gen. Hooker, in his evidence before the Committee on the Conduct of the War, it must be said, at least," continues Mr. Swinton, "that it is not justified by facts. 'At that time' (nine o'clock), said Gen. Hooker, 'my troops were in the finest spirits; they had whipped Jackson and compelled the enemy to fly, throwing away their arms, their banners, and saving themselves as best they could.' Now not only is this contradicted by the facts above recited, and which are derived from the reports of both sides, but Gen. Sumner, who at the time spoken of reached the field, says, 'On going upon the field I found that Gen. Hooker's corps had been dispersed and routed. I passed him some distance in the rear, where he had been carried wounded, but I saw nothing of his corps at all as I was advancing with my command on the field. I sent one of my staff-officers to find where they were, and Gen. Ricketts, the only officer we could find, stated that he could not raise three hundred men of the corps.' 4

The combat up to this time, though attended with murderous loss to both sides, had not resulted in decisive triumph for either. The tide of battle had raged with varying fortune, victory now inclining to the Confederate and now to the Federal forces.

"Hooker, after driving one of Jackson's divisions, was in turn forced back by the other; and Mansfield's corps having caused this to retreat, found itself overwhelmed by the fresh battalions of Hood."
The arrival of Gen. Sumner, however, entirely changed the aspect of affairs, and as his fresh troops advanced, Mansfield’s and Hooker’s corps had an opportunity to reform. This was rapidly effected, and throwing Sedgwick’s divisions on his right across the open field into the woods in which Crawford had been fighting, “he easily drove the shattered Confederate troops before him, and held definitive possession of the woods around the Dunker church.” While this movement was in progress Sumner advanced French’s divisions on what had hitherto been the left, and Richardson’s division still further to the left, to oppose the Confederate centre under D. H. Hill, and they were both soon actively engaged. Gen. Lee had sent to the left the brigades of Colquitt, Ripley, and McRae, and with these, the troops of Hood, and his own shattered division Jackson presented a stubborn front, but his loss was heavy. Gen. Starke, of the old division, was killed; the brigade, regimental, and company officers fell almost without an exception, and the brigades dwindled to mere handfuls.¹

For a time Sumner’s division flanked the Confederates, who retired slowly, fighting every inch. It was a trying time; Sumner saw his advantage and pressed it with vigor. Eight batteries were in full play upon the retreating Confederates, and the din of heavy guns, whistling and bursting of shells, and the roar of musketry were almost deafening.

“This,” says John Esten Cooke, “was undoubtedly the turning-point of the battle of Sharpsburg, and Gen. Lee had witnessed the conflict upon his left with great anxiety. It was impossible, however, to send thither more troops than he had already sent. As will be seen in a moment, both his centre and right were extremely weak. A. P. Hill and Gen. McLaws had not arrived from Harper’s Ferry. Thus the left had been reinforced to the full extent of Lee’s ability, and now that portion of his line seemed about to be crushed.”

Just at this critical moment, when Sedgwick “appeared to grasp victory, and the troops of Jackson and Hood were retiring in disorder,”¹ the divisions of McLaws and Walker, which had just come upon Harper’s Ferry, were hurried to the left, and at once changed the fortunes of the day. The Confederates had fought until their ammunition as well as their strength were almost exhausted. “It was then ten o’clock, and in that one hour the fighting of an entire day seemed to have been concentrated.” Encouraged by the opportune reinforcements, the whole Confederate line rallied, and the fight was resumed with redoubled energy. Splendidly manoeuvred, the divisions of McLaws and Walker swept on like a wave upon Sumner’s columns that had so stubbornly forced their way to the original position held by the Confederates in the morning. A considerable interval had been left between Sumner’s right division under Sedgwick and his centre division under French. Through this the Confederates penetrated, enveloping Sedgwick’s left flank, and pressing heavily at the same time on his front, forced him out of the woods on the west side of the Hagerstown road, and back across the open field and into the woods on the east side of the road, the original position held in the morning. The Confederates did not follow up their advantage on this end of the line, but retired to the original position held by them at the beginning of the battle.²

From the ground thus occupied the Federal forces were unable to dislodge the Confederates, “and the great struggle ‘of the left at Sharpsburg’ was over. It had begun at dawn, and was decided by ten or eleven o’clock, and the troops on both sides had fought as resolutely as in any other action of the war.”

In the mean time the divisions of French and Richardson, composing Sumner’s centre and left, had not been idle. “When the pressure on Sedgwick became the hardest, Sumner sent orders to French to attack, as a diversion in favor of the former. French obeyed with the brigades of Kimball and Weber, and succeeded in forcing back the enemy to a sunken road which runs almost at right angles with the Hagerstown road. This position was held by the division of D. H. Hill, three of whose brigades had been advanced to assist Jackson in his morning attacks, and it was these that were assailed by French and driven back in disorder to the sunken road. These brigades were respectively those of Colquitt, Ripley, and McRae, and Gen. Hill mentions the following curious circumstance as the cause of the repulse that befell them: ‘The men advanced with alacrity, secured a good position, and were fighting bravely, when Capt. Thompson, Fifth North Carolina, cried out, ‘They are flanking us!’ This cry spread like an electric shock along the ranks, bringing up vivid recollections of the flank fire at South Mountain. In a moment they broke and fell to the rear. Efforts were made to rally them in the bed of an old road, nearly at right angles to the Hagerstown pike,”³

¹ Cooke’s “Life of General Lee.” ² Swinton. ³ Swinton. Of this attack McLaws says, “The troops were immediately engaged, driving the enemy before them in magnificent style at all points, sweeping the woods with perfect ease. They were driven not only through the woods, but over a field in front of the woods and over two high fences beyond, and into another body of woods about half a mile distant from the commencement of the fight.”
and which had been their position previous to the advance." Uniting here with the other brigades of Hill, they received the attacks of French and of Richardson's division to his left. The latter division was composed of the brigades of Meagher, Caldwell, and Brooke. Meagher first attacked, and fought his way to the possession of a crest overlooking the sunken road in which Hill's line was posted. After sustaining a severe musketry fire, by which it lost severely, this brigade, its ammunition expended, was relieved by the brigade of Caldwell, the former breaking by companies to the rear, and the latter by companies to the front. Caldwell immediately became engaged in a very determined combat, and was supported by part of Brooke's brigade, the rest of the latter being posted on the right to thwart an effort on the part of the enemy to flank in that direction. The action here was of a very animated nature, for Hill, being reinforced by the division of Anderson, assumed a vigorous offensive, and endeavored to seize a piece of high ground on the Union left, with the view of turning that flank. This manoeuvre was, however, frustrated by the skill and promptitude of Col. Cross, of the Fifth New Hampshire (Caldwell's brigade), who, detecting the danger, moved his regiment towards the menaced point. Between his command and the Confederate force there then ensued a spirited contest, each endeavoring to reach the high ground, and both delivering their fire as they marched in parallel lines by the flank. The race was won by Cross. The effort to flank on the right was handsomely checked by Brooke, French, and Barlow, the latter of whom, changing front with his two regiments obliquely to the right, poured in a rapid fire, compelling the surrender of three hundred prisoners with two standards. A vigorous direct attack was then made, and the troops succeeded in carrying the sunken road and the position in advance, around what is known as Piper's House, which, being a defensible building, formed, with its surroundings, the citadel of the enemy's strength at this part of the line. The enemy was so much disorganized in this repulse that only a few hundred men were rallied on a crest near the Hagerstown road. This slight array formed the whole Confederate centre, and there is little doubt that a more energetic following up of the success gained would have carried this position and fatally divided Lee's wings. The few Confederates showed a very bold front, however, and deceived by this, Richardson contented himself with taking up a position to hold what was already won."

1 Swinton. Gen. D. H. Hill says, "There were no troops near to hold the centre except a few hundred rallied from various bri-

Of this incident in the attack upon the centre, John Esten Cooke, in his "Life of Gen. Lee," gives essentially the same account. "In the centre," he says, "a great disaster was at one time imminent. Owing to a mistake of orders, the brave Gen. Rhodes had drawn back his brigade posted there; this was seen by the enemy, and a sudden rush was made by them with the view of piercing Lee's centre. The promptness and courage of a few officers and a small body of troops defeated this attempt. Gen. D. H. Hill rallied a few hundred men, and opened fire with a single gun, and Col. Cooke faced the enemy with his regiment, 'standing boldly in line,' says Gen. Lee, 'without a cartridge.' The stand made by this small force saved the army from serious disaster."

"Three of the six corps of the Army of the Potomac, and they the strongest," says Swinton, "had thus been drawn into the seething vortex of action on the right, and each in succession, while exacting heavy damage of the enemy, had been so punished as to lose all offensive energy, so that soon found them simply holding their own. Porter with his small reserve corps, numbering some fifteen thousand men, held the centre, while Burnside remained inactive on the left, not having yet passed the Antietam. Between twelve and one o'clock, Franklin, with two divisions of his corps, under Slocum and W. F. Smith (Couch remaining behind to occupy Maryland Heights), reached the field of battle from where the action at Crampton's Pass had left him. Gen. McClellan had designed retaining Franklin on the east side of the Antietam, to operate on either flank or on the centre as circumstances might require. But by the time he neared the field the strong opposition developed by the attacks of Hooker and Sumner rendered it necessary for him to be immediately pushed over the creek to the assistance of the right. The arrival of Franklin was opportune, for Lee had now accumulated so heavily on his left, and the repulse of Sumner's right under..."
Sedgwick had been so easily effected, that the enemy began to show a disposition to resume the offensive, directing his efforts against that still loose-jointed portion of Sumner's harness between his right and centre. Gen. Smith, with quick perception of the needs of the case, of his own accord filled up this interval with part of his division; and his third brigade, under Col. Irwin, charged forward with much impetuosity, and drove back the advance until abreast the Dunker church. Though Irwin could not hold what he had wrested from the Confederates, his boldness, seconded by another charge made soon after by the Seventh Maine Regiment alone, served to quell the enemy's aggressive ardor. Franklin then formed the rest of his available force in a column of assault, with the intention of making another effort to gain the enemy's stronghold in the rocky woodland west of the Hagerstown turnpike,—the woods Hooker had striven for and Sumner had snatched and lost. But Sumner, having command on the right, now intervened to postpone further operations on that flank, as he judged the repulse of the only remaining corps available for attack would peril the safety of the whole army."

Referring to the attack on the Confederate left, Col. Walter H. Taylor, adjutant-general of the Confederate Army of Northern Virginia, says, "It is established upon indisputable Federal evidence that the three corps of Hooker, Mansfield, and Sumner were completely shattered in the repeated but fruitless efforts to turn this flank, and two of these corps were rendered useless for further aggressive movements. The aggregate strength of the attacking columns at this point reached forty thousand men,1 not counting the two divisions of Franklin's corps, sent at a late hour in the day to rescue the Federal right from the impending danger of being itself destroyed; while the Confederates, from first to last, had less than fourteen thousand men on this flank,—consisting of Jackson's two divisions, McLaws' division, and the two small divisions of two brigades each under Hood and Walker,—with which to resist their fierce and oft-repeated assaults."

The attack upon the Confederate right had been intrusted to the Ninth Corps, under Gen. Burnside. This force lay massed behind the heights on the east side of the Antietam, and early in the morning Gen. Burnside was ordered to hold his troops in readiness to force a passage over the Antietam by the lower stone bridge, with the view of assailing the Confederate right, carrying the Sharpsburg crest, and forcing Gen. Lee from his line of retreat by way of Shepherdstown. At eight o'clock, "on learning how much opposition had been developed by Hooker, Gen. McClellan ordered Burnside to carry the bridge, gain possession of the heights, and advance along their crest upon Sharpsburg, as a diversion in favor of the right. Burnside's tentative were frivolous in their character, and hour after hour went by, during which the need of his assistance became more and more imperative, and McClellan's commands more and more urgent. Five hours, in fact, passed, and the action on the right (the Confederate left) had been concluded, in such manner as has been seen, before the work that should have been done in the morning was accomplished. Encouraged by the case with which the left of the Union force was held in check, Lee was free to remove two-thirds of the right wing under Longstreet,—namely, the divisions of McLaws and Walker; and this force he applied at the actual point of conflict on his left, where the arrival of these divisions served to check Sumner in his career of victory and hurl back Sedgwick. This step the Confederate commander never would have ventured on had there been any vigor displayed on the part of the confronting force; yet this heavy detachment, having been made from the hostile right, should have rendered the task assigned to Gen. Burnside one of comparative ease, for it left in that entire wing but a single hostile division of two thousand five hundred men under Gen. Jones, and the force actually present to dispute the passage of the bridge did not exceed four hundred.2 Nevertheless it was one o'clock, and after the action on the right (the Confederate left) had been determined, before a passage was effected; and this being done, two hours passed before the attack of the crest was made. This was successfully executed at three o'clock, the Sharpsburg ridge being carried, and a Confederate battery that had been delivering an annoying fire captured. It was one of the many unfortunate results of the long delay in this operation on the Federal left that just as this success was gained the division of A. P. Hill, which Jackson had left behind to receive the surrender of Harper's Ferry, reached the field from that place by way of Shepherdstown, and uniting his own reinforcement of two thousand men with the troops of Jones that had been broken through in the attack, he assumed the offensive, recaptured the battery, and drove back Burnside over all the ground gained and to the shelter of the bluff bordering the Antietam. This closed the action on the (Federal) left, and as that on the (Federal) right had been suspended, the battle closed for the day."

To Swinton's account of Gen. Burnside's attack upon the Confederate right may be added the following from another source: "While the attack upon the Confederate left and centre was in progress, Gen. Burnside made repeated efforts to force the bridge over the creek opposite Longstreet's right wing, defended by Gen. Toombs with two regiments of his own brigade and the batteries of Gen. Jones. This small force repulsed five different assaults made by greatly superior numbers. In the afternoon Gen. Burnside made a feint, as if intending to pass by the bridge below, and then threw a heavy force upon Toombs, and drove the Confederates from their position. But the timely arrival of Gen. A. P. Hill with his command from Harper's Ferry entirely changed the position of affairs. He was ordered to reinforce Gen. Jones, commanding Longstreet's right wing, and moved to his support with the brigades of Archer, Branch, Gregg, and Pender, who attacked the Federals, and with the assistance of several batteries of artillery arrested their progress. After an obstinate resistance the Federals began to waver. At this moment Gen. Jones ordered Toombs to charge the flank, while Archer, supported by Branch and Gregg, charged them in the front. Gen. A. P. Hill, in his official report, says that "the enemy had already advanced in three lines, had broken through Jones' division, captured McIntosh's battery, and were in the full tide of success. With a yell of defiance, Archer (of Maryland) charged them, retook McIntosh's guns, and drove them back pell-mell. Branch and Gregg, with their veterans, sternly held their ground, and pouring in destructive volleys, the tide of the enemy surged back, and breaking in confusion passed out of sight." Burnside made a brief resistance, then broke and retreated in confusion towards the Antietam, pursued by the Confederates, until he reached the protection of his batteries on the other side. In this attack the Confederates lost Gen. L. O'B. Branch, killed. The troops of Gen. Hill were now recalled, and they occupied the position originally held by Gen. Jones in the morning.

Referring to the arrival of the reinforcements under Gen. A. P. Hill, John Esten Cooke says, "These attacked the enemy, drove him from the hill across the Antietam again; and so threatening did the situation at that moment appear to Gen. McClellan that he is said to have sent Gen. Burnside the message, 'Hold your ground! If you cannot, then the bridge, to the last man! Always the bridge! If the bridge is lost, all is lost.' The urgency of this order sufficiently indicates that the Federal commander was not without solicitude for the safety of his own left wing. Ignorant, doubtless, of the extremely small force which had thus repulsed Gen. Burnside,—in all four thousand five hundred men,—he feared that Gen. Lee would cross the bridge, assail his left, and that the hard-fought day might end in disaster to his own army. That Gen. Lee contemplated this movement, in spite of the disproportion of numbers, is intimated in his official report. 'It was nearly dark,' he says, 'and the Federal artillery was massed to defend the bridge, with Gen. Porter's corps, consisting of fresh troops, behind it. Under these circumstances,' he adds, 'it was deemed injudicious to push our advantage further in the face of fresh troops of the enemy much exceeding our own.' The idea of an advance against the Federal left was accordingly abandoned, and a movement of Jackson's command, which Lee directed, with the view of turning the Federal right, was discontinued from the same considerations."

cleared lands, with no shelter from the batteries in front and on both his flanks after he should have succeeded in crossing the stream. The road crossing the Antietam farthest south, instead of being at right angles, runs diagonally to Sharpsburg up the hill. The ground is undulating, lying in ridges or swells, with dry ravines between, all cleared land, and at the time of the battle beautiful fields of corn and clover, or newly plowed for the fall wheat sowing. The Confederate batteries were so posted that any force crossing either bridge or advancing directly upon the town would be exposed to a severe cross-fire.

The following description of the battle-field and of the positions of the armies is taken from a contemporaneous account:

Antietam River, which rises near Gettysburg, Pa., runs nearly south along the western slope of Elk Ridge. The Keedysville and Williamsport road crosses it a mile west from Keedysville by a stone bridge.

A mile farther down is a second stone bridge, on the Sharpsburg and Shepherdstown turnpike, and two miles below that a third, which must be kept in special remembrance, for there gallant deeds were done.

The enemy selected the ground, choosing a line where the two armies would be face to face, with but little opportunity for flank movements, a line about four miles long,—a gateway four miles wide, where he put up his batteries. Harper's Ferry was in his possession, also Shepherdstown, Williamsport in ours, so that the enemy could not flank us in that direction, neither escape them if defeated. McClellan could not flank Lee or get in his rear. Neither could Lee outflank McClellan. Neither was there an opportunity for the cutting round policy pursued against Pope.

It is a mile from the turnpike to the Potomac, measuring from Joel Paffenburgh's house, which stands east of the turnpike. Right behind Paffenburgh's house is a ridge of land, a cleared field running nearly parallel with the turnpike. Standing on this ridge and looking west we see first a mown field of ten or twelve acres, then a corn-field on the eastern slope of a parallel ridge, which is crowned with an oak grove. The distance between the two ridges is about one-half mile. Just below Paffenburgh's is an old toll-house and gate. Walking southeast we find that we are gradually crossing the ridge; that there is a slope east towards the Antietam, and a gentle slope, with hills, knolls, and ravines, west towards the Potomac; that the turnpike is on the high ground between the two streams. A short distance, through a beautiful oak grove, and we come to a large plowed field. The grove extends along the turnpike a half-mile. East of the plowed field is another grove—the distance between the two groves half a mile. Continuing our walk we find the slope more abrupt as we gradually near the lower stone bridge. The eastern slope is bare of trees, but mottled with corn-fields, the stalks beginning to wear the rusted baces of autumn. There are a few farm-houses with white-washed outbuildings. Conspicuous in the panorama is the house of William Realet, in a ravine, three-fourths of a mile northeast of Sharpsburg. Numerous fences, smooth fields, a few apple-orchards, and a burial-ground, with the white headstones standing in pleasant contrast against the greenwood.

Looking east we have the valley of the Antietam,—a winding stream, sparkling in the sunlight, fringed with willows, the village of Keedysville, undulating lands, farm roads, with the Elk Ridge green to its summit, and the South Mountain lying beyond.

Crossing the upper stone bridge into the village, and along the base of Elk Ridge opposite the lower bridge, then turning towards the west, we have a view of two-thirds the entire line,—from the ridge near Paffenburgh's to a mile below Sharpsburg. Right before us, a mile and a half distant from the river, is the town, pleasantly situated, two church steeples piercing the sky above the horizon. North of the town is a considerable elevation, also south of it. If we should go up there and look towards Keedysville we should behold the valley like an elongated basin below us, in a great measure commanded by the two elevations. There is a ford between the lower and turnpike bridge. It was not used, however, as a crossing for our troops till after our line of battle was formed. With this view of the ground we are prepared to see how Gen. McClellan disposed his army corps.

It is not easy to give the line of battle with distinctness,—that is, the disposition of the different corps. Let it be kept in mind that the nature of the ground was such that there was necessarily wide gaps between some of the corps. Gen. Hooker was assigned the extreme right, near Paffenburgh's house; next Gen. Mansfield, commanding Banks' army corps; next Sumner, next Franklin, next Richardson. All of these were west of the river, extending from the Sharpsburg and Beanesport turnpike bridge to the Potomac. East of the Antietam was Porter and Burnside, the latter at the lower stone bridge. Franklin did not arrive on the ground till Wednesday afternoon. He came up Pleasant Valley, crossed the upper bridge, turned in column to the left, moved over the fields and took his position partly between Richardson and Sumner, his right overlapping Sumner's left.

"Of course this is but approximately accurate, as nearly accurate as can be made at present. I have shown Franklin at right angles with Sumner, and the rebels also at right angles, but an angle of forty-five degrees would more nearly represent it. You are to imagine an elevation in front of Sumner's left, crowned by the grove before mentioned. Between Franklin and Richardson, and between the rebels in front of Richardson, three-fourths of a mile, is an unobstructed sweep of ground. The distance between Sumner and the rebels in front of him is not more than a third of a mile. Sumner is in a western border of a grove, the rebels in an eastern, the rebels on ground fifty to seventy-five feet highest. In front of Mansfield is a grove; in front of Hooker the mown land, the corn-field, and the wood-crowned ridge beyond, already mentioned, occupied by the rebels. The batteries in front of Richardson are fifty feet above him, on the highest land in the vicinity, and were turned at times upon Sumner, Franklin, Richardson, Porter, and Burnside. The rebel batteries at Sharpsburg played upon Richardson, Porter, and Burnside. Burnside also had a heavy rebel battery in front and on his flank.

"It will be seen that the lines were near together in the centre, opposite Sumner, but more widely separated on the flanks. The centre was the rebel stronghold. Hooker took the extreme right, having Doubleday's, Hacketts', and Meade's divisions. He did not know that the enemy were in full force. Jackson, when last heard from, was at Harper's Ferry, with only Longstreet's, A. P. Hill's, and Ewell's corps in the vicinity of Sharpsburg. I do not think our generals comprehended that Lee had chosen the locality for a great battle till the batteries began to play on Tuesday afternoon."
and five hundred men, and that of the Confederates at above eight thousand. This latter estimate, he admits, is only approximate. "Gen. Lee," he says, "gives his aggregate loss in killed and wounded in the Maryland campaign as ten thousand two hundred and ninety-one. As the killed and wounded in all the other actions save Antietam were not above two thousand two hundred and ninety-one, it leaves about eight thousand for the casualties of that battle. Gen. McClellan states that about two thousand seven hundred of the Confederate dead were buried; and taking this as a basis and uniting the usual proportion of five wounded to one killed, the aggregate would be very much in excess of Gen. Lee's statement."

Speaking of the losses suffered in the battle, Gen. McClellan, in his testimony before the Committee on the Conduct of the War, said,—

"The next morning (the 18th) I found that our loss had been so great, and there was so much disorganization in some of the commands, that I did not consider it proper to renew the attack that day, especially as I was sure of the arrival that day of two fresh divisions amounting to about fifteen thousand men. As an instance of the condition of some of the troops that morning, I happen to recollect the returns of the First Corps, Gen. Hooker's,—made the morning of the 18th, by which there were about three thousand five hundred men reported present for duty. Four days after that the returns of the same corps showed thirteen thousand five hundred."

Such was the battle of Sharpsburg, or Antietam, one of the most sanguinary and protracted engagements of the war. The results of the battle may be

2 The Second Maryland Infantry, operating with the Ninth Corps under Burnside, and attached to the First Brigade, Nagle's, of the Second Division, under Sturgis, was posted in the immediate vicinity of the third bridge, better known in history as "Burnside's bridge."

Gen. J. D. Cox, in his official report, said, "The bridge is a stone structure of three arches, with stone parapet above, this parapet to some extent flanking the approach to the bridge at either end. The valley in which the stream runs is quite narrow, the steep slope on the right bank approaching quite to the water's edge. On this slope the roadway is scarped, running both ways from the bridge end, and passing to the higher land above by ascending through ravines above and below, the upper ravine being some six hundred yards above the bridge, the turn about half that distance below. On the hillside immediately above the bridge was a strong stone fence running parallel to the stream. The turns of the roadway were covered by rifle-pits and breastworks made of rails and stone, all of which defenses, as well as the woods which covered the slope, were filled with the enemy's infantry and sharpshooters. Besides the infantry defenses, batteries were placed to command the bridge and all its approaches."

An attempt to carry the bridge by other troops of the corps having failed, Gen. Sturgis was ordered about ten A.M. to take it at all hazards and seize the heights beyond. The force selected to make this desperate attempt was composed of two regiments, the Sixth New Hampshire and the Second Maryland, commanded respectively by Col. S. G. Grif—fin and Lieut.-Col. J. Eugene Duryea. At this point the Antietam was not fordable, and the road by which the attacking column was to move struck the creek about two hundred yards below the bridge, then turned at right angles and ran along the bank of the stream, with only the narrow creek between it and the enemy, then turned again at right angles to cross the bridge. The side held by the enemy was a steep, high bluff, heavily wooded. Behind the trees and behind a stone wall and a bar-risade of logs he held a very strong position, his fire covering the whole ground over which the assailants must pass to reach the objective.

The two regiments were formed in the field below where the road strikes the creek, directly under the fire of the concealed foe. The residue of the brigade lay still farther down the stream under cover of fences and corn-fields. The assaulting regiments formed by the flank, the Second Maryland leading, fixed bayonets, and moving forward at the double-quick, passed through a narrow opening in a post-and-rail fence which there was no time to remove, and charged in the most gallant manner directly up the road towards the bridge. Batteries from the heights opposite plunged their shot into them, sharpshooters singled them out, musketry thinned their lines, but on they kept, and had nearly gained the bridge, when a murderous charge of grape and canister dealt death and destruction in their ranks. Many went down never to rise again, and of the first hundred men who passed through the opening in the fence a large number were either killed or wounded. So near was the enemy and so completely did his fire command the road that almost every shot took effect. Neither physical nor moral courage could withstand such a withering fire of shell, canister, and musketry, and the shattered regiments halted near the kithet end of the bridge, and the men sheltered themselves behind the abutments, fences, trees, logs, and whatever cover they could find.

The Third Maryland Infantry, Lieut.-Col. Joseph M. Soudry commanding, entered the conflict on the right with the Second Brigade, Second Division (Greene's), Twelfth Corps (Mansfield's). The Third went into action with one hundred and forty-eight officers and men, of which it lost two men (Henry Asher and Francis Bruner) killed, two officers (Lieuts. Wm. E. Hacker and Charles Stevens) and twenty-two men wounded, and four missing.

The Purrill Legion, under Maj. Wm. T. Fulton, was ordered into action with the Third Brigade, Second Division, Twelfth Corps, but was detached and sent to the support of the Sixth New York and One Hundred and Twenty-fourth Pennsylvania. briefly summed up. Every effort of Gen. McClellan to dislodge Gen. Lee from his position had been defeated with great loss. Nowhere did McClellan gain any permanent advantage over the Confederates. Varying as were the fortunes of the day, Lee was left intact, unbroken, and an equal master of the field with his antagonist. Both armies fought well, and were handled in a masterly manner. McClellan had the advantage, not only in numbers, but of a position from which he could assume an offensive or defensive attitude at will, besides which his signal-stations on the Blue Ridge commanded a view of every movement of Lee's army. Lee could not make a manoeuvre in front or rear that was not instantly revealed to the Federal lookouts; and as soon as the intelligence could be communicated to the Federal batteries below, shot and shell were poured upon the moving columns.

The following distinguished Confederate officers were killed in this battle: Longstreet's division,—Col. Liddell, Eleventh Mississippi; Lieut.-Cols. Coppens and Holmes, of the Second Georgia Volunteers. Jackson's division,—Gen. Stark, Col. Douglas, and thirty-six other officers. D. H. Hill's division,—Brig.-Gen. G. B. Anderson; Col. C. C. Tew, Second North Carolina Regiment; Col. W. P. Barcy, Twenty-third Georgia; Col. Levi B. Smith, Twenty-seventh Georgia; Lieut.-Col. J. M. Newton, Sixth Georgia; Maj. Tracy, Sixth Georgia; Maj. Robert S. Smith, Fourth Georgia. In the Twenty-seventh Georgia Regiment every commissioned officer was killed; in the Fourth North Carolina all the officers were killed or wounded. Gen. A. P. Hill's division lost Gen. L. O'B. Branch, of North Carolina, and Col. Barnes; Gen. Mc Laws lost his adjutant-general, Maj. T. S. McIntosh. Among the Federal killed were Maj.-Gen. Mansfield, Maj.-Gen. Israel B. Richardson, Brig.-Gen. Isaac P. Rodman, Col. Kingsbury, of Connecticut;Cols. Crossdale, Childs, and McNutt, of Pennsylvania; Col. Hinks, of Massachusetts; Col. Coleman, of Ohio; and Lieut.-Col. Dwight, of Boston.

Capt. Noyes, who visited the field soon after the battle, gives the following graphic description of what he saw:

"My route carried me over the battle-field, and I spent much of the afternoon, part of the time in company with a friend, in visiting some of the most severely contested points, to be averse, sickened, almost hemmed with its sights of horror.

1 The Confederate reports are replete," says Swinton, "with evidence of the enormous straggling that attended the Maryland campaign. Says Lee, in his official report, 'The arduous service in which our troops had been engaged, their great privations of rest and food, and the long marches without shoes over mountain roads had greatly reduced our ranks before the action began. These causes had compelled thousands of brave men to absent themselves, and many more had done so from unworthy motives. This great battle was fought by less than forty thousand men on our side, all of whom had undergone the greatest labors and hardships in the field and on the march. Nothing could surpass the determined valor with which they met the large army of the enemy, fully supplied and equipped, and the result reflects the highest credit on the officers and men engaged.' Says Hill, 'Had all our stragglers been up McClellan's army would have been completely crushed or annihilated. Thousands of thievish poltroons had kept away from sheer cowardice.' As an illustration of the privations endured it is stared that Walker's command, which marched from Harper's Ferry the night before the battle, had nothing to eat except green corn from the time they left Harper's Ferry until after the conclusion of the battle. Speaking of the heroism displayed by the Southern troops, a Northern journal said in its description of the battle, 'It is beyond all wonder how men such as the rebel troops are can fight as they do. That those ragged and filthy wretches, sick, hungry, and in all ways miserable, should prove such heroes in fight is past all explanation. Men never fought better. There was one regiment that stood up before the fire of two or three of our long-range batteries and of two regiments of infantry, and though the air around them was vocal with the whistle of bullets and the shrreek of shells, there they stood and delivered their fire in perfect order, and there they continued to stand until a battery of six light twelves was brought to bear on them, and before that they broke. Nothing mortal can stand a battery of six light Napoleon guns, if there is plenty of grape and canister in the ammunition chests.'"
Within this space of little more than a mile square, this spot, once beautiful with handsome residences and well-cultivated farms, isolated, hedged in with verdure, sacred to quiet, calm content, the hottest fury of man's hottest wrath had expended itself, burning residences and well-filled barns, plowing fields of ripened grain with artillery, scattering the remains of animal life, corn-fields, wood, and valley the most awful illustrations of war. Not a building about us which was not desolated by its occupants and rent and torn by shot and shell; not a field which has not witnessed the fierce and bloody encounter of armed and desperate men.

"Let us first turn off to the left of the Hagerstown turnpike; but we must ride very slowly and carefully, for lying all through this corn-field are the victims of the hardest contest of our division. Can it be that these are the bodies of our late antagonists? Their faces are so absolutely black that I said to myself at first, 'This must have been a negro regiment.' Their eyes are protruding from their sockets; their heads, hands, and limbs are swollen to twice the natural size.

"Passing through this corn-field, with the dead lying through its aisles, out into an uncuttivated field beyond, I saw bodies, attired mainly in rebel gray, lying in ranks so regular that Death, the reaper, must have mowed them down in swaths. Our burying parties were already busily engaged, and had put away to rest many of our own men. Still here, as everywhere, I saw them scattered over the fields. The ground was strewn with muskets, knapsacks, cartridge-boxes, and articles of clothing, the excrements of horses, and thousands of shot and shell. And so it was on the other side of the turnpike, my, in the turnpike itself. Ride where we may, through corn-field, wood, or ravine, and our ride will be among the dead, until the heart grows sick and faint with horror. Here, close to the road, were the hay-stacks near which our general and staff paused for a while when the division was farthest advanced, and here, at the corner of the barn, lay one of our men killed by a shell, which had well-nigh proved fatal to them also.

"Just in front of these hay-stacks was the only pleasing picture on this battle-field,—a fine horse, struck with death at the instant when, cut down by his wound, he was attempting to rise from the ground. His head was half lifted, his neck proudly arched, every muscle seemed replete with animal life. The wound which killed him was wholly concealed from view, so that I had to ride close up before I could believe him dead. Hundreds of his kind lay upon the field, but all were repulsive save himself, and he was the admired of every passer-by. Two weeks afterwards I found myself pausing to gaze upon him, and always with the wish that some sculptor would immortalize in stone this magnificent animal in the exact pose of his death-hour.

"One would like to see something from a battle-field not wholly terrible.

"Over this graveyard of the unburied dead we reached a wood, every tree pierced with shot or cut with bullets, and came to the little brick Dunker church on the turnpike. This must have been a focal point in the battle, for a hundred round-shot have pierced its walls, while bullets by thousands have scorched and battered it. A little crowd of soldiers was standing about it, and within a few severely wounded rebels were stretched on the benches, one of whom was ravaging in his agony. Surgical aid and proper attendance had already been furnished, and we did not join the curious visitors within. Out in the grove behind the little church the dead has been collected in groups waiting for burial, some of them wearing our uniform, but the large majority dressed in gray. No matter in what direction we turned, it was all the same shocking picture, awakening awe rather than pity, numbing the senses rather than touching the heart, glazing the eye with horror rather than filling it with tears.

"I had, however, seen many a poor fellow during my ride, something in whose position or appearance had caused me to pause; and here, lying side by side with three others, I saw a young rebel officer, his face less discolored than the vest, whose features and expression called forth my earnest sympathy, not so much for him as for those who, in his Southern home, shall see him no more forever. No one among the burying party knew his name, and before night he was laid in a trench with the rest,—no headstone to mark his resting-place,—one of the three thousand rebel dead who fill nameless graves upon this battle-field.

"Very slowly, as men move through the burial-places of the dead, we ride through the woods at the back of the church, and reached the rocky citadel, behind which crouched the enemy to receive our charging battalions, sweeping their ranks with destruction and compelling their retreat. I was astonished to see how cunningly nature had laid up this long series of rocky ledges, breast-high, for the protection of the rebel lines. In front of this breastwork we found a majority of the dead dressed in blue. At this point also commenced a long barricade of fence-rails, piled closely, to protect the rebel lines, and stretching off towards the north. Here is one more evidence of the use to which the rebel generals put ever spare moment of time, and of their admirable choice of position.

"One more scene in this battle picture must be seen, and with a visit to it our ride may end. It is a narrow country lane, bordered out somewhat between the fields, partially shaded, and now literally crowded with rebel corpses. Here they stood in line of battle, and here, in the length of five hundred feet, I counted more than two hundred of their dead. In every attitude conceivable,—some piled in groups of four or six, some grasping their muskets, as if in the act of discharging them, some evidently officers, killed while encouraging their men, some lying in the position of calm repose,—all black and swollen, and ghastly with wounds. This battle of the dead filled the lane with horror. As we rode beside it,—we could not ride in it,—I saw the field all about me black with corpses, and they told me that the corn-field beyond was equally crowded. It was a place to see once, to glance at, and then to ride horrified away, for, strong-hearted as was then my mood, I had gazed upon as much horror as I was able to bear.

"All around," says a Northern correspondent, "were evidences of the terrible strife, of the long-contested contest, such as I do not like to dwell upon. The enemy had buried many dead. There were many long trenches, where they had laid their fallen, thrown a few inches of earth upon them, and covered them with fence-rails. The slaughter on their side must have been terrific. Horses were thickly strewn where our artillery had plowed the ground, cut down the tall forestrees, and buried destruction in their ranks. The enemy had strengthened the ridge by constructing rifle-pits of rocks, logs, and loose stones, gathered from the ledges. Passing down to the spot where through the day they had held the ground, it was easy to see why they clung to it with such tenacity; if they had been driven from the spot they would have been forced out into a large open field, and the place would have been equally strong to Gen. McClellan. So long as they held it they could hope to keep McClellan at bay, but if once lost there could be for them but little hope of success.

"Continuing on, I reached the line where French and Richardson had moved up the road leading to the farm-house of Mr. Roulet. The enemy had held it as a rifle-pit, and there across the fencer fifteen thousand muskets had blazed, there the shells had fallen like thunder-bolts from heaven. Some had fallen upon their faces towards our advancing columns; some in the act of leaping the fence behind them; some while loading their guns; one while tearing a cartridge with his teeth had received a bullet through his heart, and had fallen with all his features fixed to that end. There was an officer, with his face towards heaven, bald-headed, yet not far advanced in years, his insignia of rank cut from his gray frock-coat. He fell while cheering his men, with all his muscles set, his system under tension, warned up to the great exigencies of the moment.

"It was a fearful sight along the roadway, in the corn fields. Thousands of dead were there.

"The army was moving on towards Sharpsburg. There our shells had fallen in a continuous shower, tearing houses to pieces, killing one young child, and driving from the place all but a few persons, who took refuge in the cellar of a strong stone house.

"Gen. McClellan was there, with a careworn, troubled countenance. The people greeted him warmly. Nearly every house had its Union banner out, and there was a general rejoicing that the enemy was gone."

Another contemporaneous account says,—

"Upon walking over the field so hotly contested the evidences abound, especially near the centre and the right of the centre of our line, of the terrible carnage that occurred. Among our forces, where the brigades mentioned charged over the crest of the hill and were repulsed from the woods, the slaughter was most fearful, the ground, as far as bodies could be distinguished, being thickly strewn with them. To the left of where Capt. Frank's battery of French's division was stationed—one of the most effective volunteer batteries in the service—a large group of dead horses attracted attention. Wounded and turned loose at different points where the fight was the hottest in this part of the field, they had bred together in their affright and pain, to perish in every attitude that makes the picturesqueness in a field of battle. One especially looked as if in the act of rising up once more to take part in the strife. On all sides was abundant evidence of the obstinacy of the struggle in the impromptu breastworks which abounded. Wherever a few panels of fence afforded opportunity to do so, these were thrown down and then piled thickly together, perhaps two feet high, and from behind them, and to the last moment possible, the rebels poured forth a deadly fire upon their assailants. Small ledges of rocks also, along the hillside which descended to the woods so fatal to our advance, served for shelter at every few steps, and while the shot and shell from our batteries, as they gained the crest of the hill, tore the trees to fragments over their heads, it was very hard to dislodge them except by an actual charge through, which ended in strewing the whole neighborhood with their killed. A brick school-house on a slight knoll in front of the woods was riddled with shot and shell. To the rear of this piece of wood a splendid steel gun was left by the rebels, a shot having slightly injured one of the axles.

"Passing back again through the woods, two rebel colonels and one brigadier were found on the ground, and interspersed with the multitudes of their fallen were so many of those in the National uniform that at a glance one might see how fearful was the cost of the victory. Upon one dead body was found a large black dog, dead also from some chance shot which had struck him whilst stretched upon his master's corpse carelessly, his forepaws across the man's breast. Ride where one might for a space of perhaps a mile and a half in width in places, and four or five miles in length, the dead were on every side, interspersed with the arms that had fallen from their hands, Shattered cannon-wheels and caissons and enormous quantities of round-shot and conical shell gave more evidence of the deadly storm that had a treacherous destruction in its track.

"Sharpsburg was sadly cut up, almost every house in it giving proof of the terrible force of the missiles which were rained upon it so abundantly. Dead horses, too, were scattered around, to make the scene afforded more revolting, if possible, whilst the excitement of the occasion was painfully apparent in the faces of its inhabitants, such of them as had ventured to stay. . . .

"Returning to the field again, and looking into the houses and barns of the neighborhood, sights were seen calculated to harrow the hearts of the most hardened in such scenes. We came to the great barn and stack of wheat straw of the Roulet farm, and here might have been seen lying in the straw a large number of wounded rebels, hardly yet assured of the kindness of their captors, although their wounds had been dressed, and all had been done for them which the circumstances of the case permitted. The great cry was for water, and it was a sad reflection as one filled their canteens and put them to whiteervish lips that another day would place them beyond the want of it. Returning to the unfortunate group the next morning, we found that several of them were dead, those capable of being removed having been taken to more comfortable quarters. Go where one might, in every place that afforded the slightest chance of shelter, the wounded of the battle-field were found. Every farm-house became a hospital, whilst whole regiments were detailed to bury the dead."

"In one part of the battle-field, a large corn-field," says another account, "just at the edge of a wood, where the rebels appear to have suffered most, their dead lay so thick that their dark forms could be plainly distinguished a long distance. A rifle-pit which was charged upon by a Pennsylvania regiment contained heaps of dead, lying just as they had fallen, one upon the other. In a ravine three rebels had met their death apparently while eating their breakfast. A plate lay before them with food upon it, containing a spoon, and around them lay the scattered fragments of a shell which had doubtless exploded in their midst, taking off the top of the head of one, and giving death wounds also to the others.

"But if to look upon the mangled bodies of the dead was horrible, still more terrible was the spectacle which the wounded on this vast blood-stained battle-field presented on Wednesday night, Thursday, and Friday. Many of the wounded remained on the field for twenty-four hours or more before their wounds received any attention. The surgeons were taxed beyond their ability by the multitude of sufferers, and I regret to say there was a lamentable deficiency in the supply of the various appliances needed at such a time. But for the many volunteer helpers on the field, there must have been a fearful aggravation of the sufferings of many of the heroic men who were stricken down in their country's service. Every church and school-house and nearly every private dwelling in Boonsboro' was a hospital.

"The fence-posts and panels and the trees of the woods were shivered and scattered around in every direction, covering the dead and the wounded, who lay piled up and scattered over miles of the country. They were mostly shot through with musie bullets, torn with grape and shell, and mangled with cannon-balls. Here lay a Wisconsin man with his hand and leg shot away with a round-shot; here lay two Mississippi brothers, one, with his head propped against a tree, mortally wounded, and the other by his side locked in the embrace of death. I saw a Thirteenth Massachusetts man propping the head of a wounded South Carolinian, and filling his canteen with water by draining his own; I saw our Union wounded sharing water and food with the wounded rebels, and I saw, during Wednesday and Thursday, hundreds of rebel wounded saccoed by the hands of our own soldiers as they lay on the field.

"After the rebel left had been driven back across the pike, they retreated in order from their front directly across the country, over well-made roads, striking the Sharpsburg and Shepherdstown road about one and a half miles from the latter place. Near this point, on the farm of Capt. D. Smith, we found one of the rebel hospitals, in which were about an equal number of rebel and Federal wounded, and here we learned from our own wounded that our left under Barnside had been unsuccessful in driving in the rebel right, and that they had been repulsed and lost the ground they had taken early in the morning. Had they been as successful on the left as on the right, we would have captured a large portion of the rebel left before they could have reached Shepherdstown; but the rebel right then resting on the Potomac, and their centre about the town of Sharpsburg, the nature of the country covered them with such strong fortifications that they successfully resisted every attack of our left, and from Monday till Wednesday evening our artillery poured a continuous stream of shell and shot into the loyal and patriotic town of Sharpsburg and along their entire right, but with no effect in driving them out of this line.

"In Sharpsburg the houses of the Widow Homes and the Widow Shelley and the barn of Jacob H. Grove were burnt to the ground; but few houses of the town escaped the shot and shell. The women and children of the town suffered terribly from fright and hunger. For three days and nights they were gathered together in the cellars of the stone houses of the town, while the rebel soldiers despoiled their homes. They carried off everything in the stores, robbed the women of their clothing, flour, meat, preserves, fruits, vegetables, and everything they could use. We stopped at the house of Judge Smith, a Union refugee. He invited us in to take a drink of water, the only thing left to supply the wants of his family. His wife and family had remained at home, but the rebels. crowded his house and ate every particle of food they had. A cannon-ball passed through his front door and out the rear door into his pantry, and demolished his dishes and crockery-ware.

"At the rebel hospital, on Capt. D. Smith's farm, about two miles from Shepherdstown, I noticed the rebel gravers of W. T. Malligan, colonel of the Fifteenth Georgia Regiment; Maj. Smith, Fourth Georgia; Lieut.-Col. N. Lutter, South Carolina Volunteers, and some fifteen dead rebels in a pile. On the farm adjoining I noticed some twelve gravers of rebel officers, and about thirty of their dead unburied.

"Gen. McClellan stopped at the house of Col. Miller, a good Union man. We had seen Gen. McClellan in the front, at the right, on Wednesday and Thursday, but here we had the extreme pleasure of shaking hands with him and conversing with him. Just at that time Mr. Knowles, of Martinsburg, came in and introduced himself as Col. White's scout, who had piloted all our cavalry out of Harper's Ferry and through the rebel lines to Williamsport, where they captured Longstreet's ammunition train. The general shook his hand cordially and warmly, thanked him for his successful effort in saving our cavalry, and asked him several questions concerning the fight at Harper's Ferry, and then remarked, 'Had Col. Miles held Harper's Ferry twenty-four hours longer it would have insured the destruction of the Confederate army.'"

A correspondent of the New York Tribune, describing the field of battle, says, under date of September 18th.—

"I have just returned from the sickening spectacle. Soldiers who went through all the battles of the Peninsula say Fair Oaks and Malvern Hill were as nothing compared with it. The dead lie in heaps, the wounded are coming in by thousands. Around and in a large barn, about half a mile from the spot where Gen. Hooker engaged the enemy's left, I counted eleven hundred and twenty wounded. Along the same road, and within the distance of two miles, are three more hospitals, each having from six hundred to seven hundred in them, and long trains of ambulances standing in the road waiting to discharge their bloody loads. Surgeons, with hands, arms, and garments covered with blood, are busy amputating limbs, extracting balls, and bandaging wounds of every nature in every part of the body. Rebel soldiers in great numbers lie among our own and receive the same attention. I saw a rebel officer of the Twenty-seventh Alabama Regiment endure the amputation of his leg without the use of chloroform. Every muscle in his face was contractions, his jaws locked as if in death-spasm, but no sound of pain issued from him. The saw and the knife did their work, but they could not feed him an expression of physical agony.

"Keedysville, Boonsboro', Middletown, and Frederick are rapidly being filled with the wounded from the battles of Sunday and yesterday. The inhabitants in all these villages are laboring night and day to render the dying and the suffering. A more Christian people, in the practical significance of that word, I never saw. Every private dwelling is filled with the wounded. Carpets are torn up, costly furniture removed, and comfortable mattresses spread upon the floor, awaiting the arrival of the ambulances. And much of this preparation for the wounded is without one word from the medical directors in regard to it. In the pleasant village of Middletown especially I have seen nothing in the hospitals in Washington that indicated so much thoughtfulness and devotion. All the ladies in the village are spending night and day with the wounded."
Hall, the old Presbyterian church, and the "Old Mill" on South Mechanic Street were among the buildings taken for the purpose.

The destruction of property in the section of country through which the two armies passed, and in which the battles of the Maryland campaign were fought, was necessarily very great. The Chesapeake and Ohio Canal for the distance of twelve miles "presented a scene of desolation;" the canal was tapped in five places, several flood-gates were torn to pieces, large bowlders were dislodged and rolled into the basin, and an attempt was made to blow up the aqueduct at Monocacy. The bridge about one mile west of Middletown, in Frederick County, was destroyed by the Confederate forces. A barn and shop belonging to Mr. Koogle, near the bridge, were burned, and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad bridge at Monocacy Junction, near Frederick, was destroyed, while more or less damage was done to the railroad and telegraph lines. During the battle of Antietam a number of houses and barns were destroyed, among them the house and barn of Samuel Mumma, which were between the two armies and were ignited by shells. Mr. Mumma lost all his household furniture, including the wardrobe of his family, and all his grain, hay, and farming implements. His neighbor, William Rulett, one of the county commissioners, lost his horses and cattle and other property. He was in his house while the battle raged around it, and was obliged to seek refuge in his cellar. There he remained until the Federal troops drove back the Confederates temporarily and afforded him an opportunity to escape. The barns of Samuel and Henry Reel were also destroyed by fire, and nearly all the houses along the whole line of battle from Sharpsburg to Keedysville exhibited marks of having been under fire. Some were penetrated in three or four different places by shot and shell, and in many instances their inmates made narrow escapes from destruction.

When the Confederates approached Hagerstown many Union men sought refuge in Pennsylvania, and the Herald and Torch was suspended for two weeks. In its issue of September 24th it gave the following account of the Confederate occupation of the town:

"The advent of a Federal force under Gen. Reynolds, on Monday of last week, relieved our community from the suspense caused by the presence of the rebel army under Gen. R. E. Lee. Five days had been passed amid the greatest excitement, during which the rebels occupied Frederick County. Day brought partial relief, but night was passed amid perfect terror, until Thursday, the 11th instant, when the advance-guard, a squad of the First Virginia Cavalry, came dashing into our midst. These were followed by the whole regiment under L.
HISTORY OF WESTERN MARYLAND.

T. Brien, of our county, which numbered about three hundred and fifty. During the afternoon TOombs' brigade of Georgians passed through, and encamped on the railroad. The advance-guard captured Lieut. A. Nesbitt and four of his men, all of Russell's cavalry. During the day a few others were made prisoners, all of whom were paroled. In the meanwhile the stores of the town were quickly throeged, and Confederate scrip passed upon our merchants. Many of our citizens having filed with their goods and chattels, the amount of worthless paper forced upon the community was much lessened. As it was, but a few hours elapsed ere the quartermaster-general impressed stores of various kinds, boots, shoes, hats, caps, clothing, medical stores, and produce of every description, paying a few in United States Treasury notes, but by far the greater part and the larger amounts in scrip, or its equivalent, certificates of indebtedness. On Friday morning, about ten o'clock, Longstreet's division, headed by Gen. R. E. Lee, made its appearance, and for three hours continued to one uninterrupted stream. But about 2 p.m. it became evident from the movements that there was some change of programme, the march having ceased, and the ammunition trains were started for the rear, with artillery following.

"Thus, having camped in two localities on the southwest and southeast of town, they remained until early on Sunday morning, when the line of march was again formed, but with a retrograde movement. Jackson, Tallaferrero, and Hill's forces had crossed from Boonsboro' to Williamsport, over the Manor road, thence to Virginia. By noon of Sunday all had passed, and seeming quiet again prevailed until midnight, when TOombs' brigade moved down the Sharpsburg pike to Jones' Cross-Roads, thence on the Manor road to Williamsport, and about two o'clock Brien's cavalry left for the same place. Thus we were left in a state of doubtful uncertainty until about 2 p.m. of Monday, when a company of United States regular cavalry, under Lieut. Tarleton, came charging into town, and were received with wild and enthusiastic applause.

"The condition and morale of the Confederate army is beyond description. They came among us not only badly clothed and unclean in person, but in a half-starving condition. For days, indeed, since the fights at Centreville they had subsisted on rations of bread, irregularly issued, and green corn and fruits. Hundreds are weakened by diarrhea and were out by their long marches, but they fight desperately because forced by hunger and want."

The following interesting description of the Confederate occupation of Frederick is from the report of Dr. Lewis H. Stein, inspector of the United States Sanitary Commission:

"FRIDAY, September 5th.—Left Washington at six o'clock, under the impression that the Confederate army had crossed the Potomac the preceding evening and were then in Frederick. Anxiety as to the fate of my friends, as well as to the general treatment my native place would receive at rebel hands, made the trip by no means a pleasant one. Along the road at different stopping-places reports reached us as to the number of Confederates that had crossed into Maryland. The passengers began to entertain fears that the train would not be able to reach Frederick. These were, however, quieted by a telegram received at a station near Monrovia, which announced the road open. Arriving at twelve o'clock, I found the town full of surmises and rumors. Such information had been received by the post quartermaster and the surgeon in charge of hospital that they were busy all the afternoon making arrangements to move off their valuable stores. The citizens were in the greatest trepidation. Invasion by the Southern army was considered equivalent to destruction. Impression into the ranks as common soldiers or immunity in a Southern prison, these were not attractive prospects for quiet, Union-loving citizens!"

"Towards nightfall it became pretty certain that a force had crossed about the mouth of the Monocacy. Telegrams were crowding rapidly upon the army officers located here, directing that what stores could not be removed should be burned, and that the sick, as far as possible, should be sent on to Pennsylvania. Here began a scene of terror seldom witnessed in this region, Lieut. Castle, assistant quartermaster, burned a large quantity of his stores at the depot. Capt. R. S. Weir fixed his storehouse on the hospital grounds, and burned the most valuable of his surplus bedding, contained in Kemai House, on Church Street near Market. Many of our prominent citizens, fearing impression, left their families and started for Pennsylvania in carriages, on horseback, and on foot. All the convalescents at the hospital that could bear the fatigue were started also for Pennsylvania, in charge of Hospital Steward Cox. The citizens removed their trunks, containing private papers and other valuables, from the bank vaults, under the firm belief that an attack would be made on these buildings for the sake of the specie contained in them. About 11 o'clock A.M. it was ascertained that Jackson's force, the advance-guard of the Southern army, was encamped on Moffatt's farm, near Buckeystown, and that this force would enter Frederick after daylight, for what purpose no one knew. Having possession of this amount of information, I retired about two o'clock, being willing to wait the sequel whatever it might be."

"SATURDAY, September 6th.—Found, on visiting the market in the morning, that a very large number of our citizens had left the town last night. Every mouth was full of rumors as to the numbers, whereabouts, and whereabouts of the Confederate force. One old gentleman, whose attachment to McClellan has become proverbial, declared that it was an impossibility for the rebels to cross the Potomac; and another, who looks upon Banks as the greatest of generals, declared that Banks' force had been taken for Confederates, and that the supposed enemies were friends."

"At length uncertainty was changed into certainty. About nine o'clock two neatly-looking individuals rode up Market Street as fast as their jaded animals could carry them. Their dress was a dirty, faded gray, their arms rusty and seemingly uncared for, their general appearance raffish or vagabondish. They shouted for Jeff Davis at the intersection of Patrick Street, and then riding to the intersection of Church and Market Streets, repeated the strange jubilant shout. No one expressing an opinion as to the propriety or impropriety of this proceeding, they countermarshalled and trotted down the street. Then followed some fifty or a hundred horsemen, having among them Bradley T. Johnson. These were received with feeble shouts from some secession sympathizers. They said 'the time of your deliverance has come.' A force of cavalry entered the hospital grounds and took possession of hospital and contents. All the sick were carefully paroled, not excepting one poor fellow then in a most abject condition. After some hours the medical officers and hospital stewards were allowed to go about town on horses."

"At ten o'clock Jackson's advance force, consisting of some five thousand men, marched up Market Street, and encamped north of the town."

"During the afternoon a provost-marshal was appointed for the town, and he occupied the same office which had been the headquarters of the United States provost-marshal. Guards were posted along our streets, and pickets along the roads leading from Frederick. Our stores were soon thronged with crowds. The shoe-stores were most patronized, as many of their men were shoeless and stockless. The only money that many of them had was Confederate scrip, or shellplasters issued by banks, corporations, individuals, etc., all of equal value. To use the expression of an old citizen, "the notes deprecated the paper on which they were printed." The crowded condition of the stores enabled some of the clippers to take what they wanted ('confiscate' is the technical expression) without going through the formality of handing over Confederate rags in change. But guards were placed at the stores whenever requested, and only a few men allowed to enter at a time. Even this arrangement proved inadequate, and the stores were soon necessarily closed.

"An attack on the Examiner printing-office being anticipated, a small guard was placed at the door. About nine o'clock p.m., a rush was made on the guard by some of the Southern soldiers, the door was driven in, and the contents of the office thrown in the street. W. G. Ross, Esq., a prominent lawyer of Frederick, called on the provost-marshal, who, when arrived with a strong force, suppressed the riot, and having obliged the rioters to return everything belonging to the office, put them in the guard-house. During the continuance of this struggle the oaths and imprecations were terrible. Every one in the neighborhood expected that a general attack would be made on the Union houses. Fortunately a quiet night ensued."

"SUNDAY, September 7th.—The rebels obliged most of our shoe-stores to be kept open during the day, so that their men could obtain shoes. The reign of terror continued, although no personal violence was done to any citizen. Pickets are posted miles out of town. The main body of the rebel troops is said to be encamped about Urbana. Gen. Robert E. Lee is in command, and there are three divisions, or it may be four, commanded by Jackson, Longstreet, D. H. Hill, and some one else. At the Evangelical Reformed church the pastor, Rev. Dr. Daniel Zacharias, offered up prayers for the President of the United States, notwithstanding the presence of a number of Confederate officers. In the evening Gen. Jackson attended the same church.

"The commissioner for the enrollment of the State militia was seized to-day and made to hand over the enrollment-books. No further requirement was made of him, except that he should report himself daily at the office of the provost-marshal."

"Mr. Heard (formerly editor of the Frederick Herald, a secession paper) issues a card calling for recruits to a company he is forming."

"JOHN W. HEARD'S PRAYER."

"Men of old Frederick, arouse! Defend your homes! Under the authority of the Confederate government, I am now engaged in raising a company of infantry. The great army of the South, unconquered and unconquerable, is now in your midst, and has determined that Maryland shall be free. What say you, Marylanders? Are you willing to fight for the liberties for which you have so long been chaste, or are you so abject as to accept them as a boon at the hands of another? Not the sons of Maryland, inheritors of her Revolutionary glory, by your own right arm achieve the independence of your own State. Falter not, hesitate not, now that the opportunity is offered you, but rally at once and vindicate your history."

"RECRUITING-OFFICE NEXT DOOR TO THE PROVOST-MARSHAL'S, WHERE THERE WILL ALWAYS BE AN OFFICER IN ATTENDANCE."

"SEPTEMBER 9, 1862." "JOHN W. HEARD."

"The following was also issued by Capt. White:"

"CAPTAIN E. V. WHITE'S PROCLAMATION."

"MARYLANDERS TO THE RESCUE!"

"I am a Marylander! I have been in the service eighteen months, opposing the tyranny which would have made of the South a subjugated and ruined country. I come to Maryland with the Southern army to do what I can to carry her where she belongs, to the Southern Confederacy. I want Marylanders to join me. I am authorized to raise a regiment of Maryland cavalry. I have no recruiting office. I can be found at Gen. Lawton's headquarters, where I will be happy to receive recruits. Come at once, or make up your minds to be slaves to the Northern despotism forever."

"E. V. WHITE, CAPTAIN COMMANDING GEN. LUCKETT'S BODY-GUARD."

"CAVALRY NOTICE."

"I have been detailed to recruit for Capt. White's cavalry regiment. All persons desiring to join this faith-famed corps will apply to me at the provost-marshal's."

"SEPTEMBER 9, 1862."

"WEDNESDAY, September 10th.—At four o'clock this morning the rebel army began to move from town, Jackson's force taking the lead. The movement continued until eight o'clock p.m., occupying sixteen hours. The most liberal calculations could not give them more than sixty-four thousand men. Over three thousand negroes must be included in this number. These were clad in all kinds of uniform, not only in cast-off or captured United States uniforms, but in coats with Southern buttons, State buttons, etc. These were shabby, but not shabbier or seedier than those worn by white men in the rebel ranks. Most of the negroes had arms,—rifles, muskets, sabres, bowie-knives, dirks, etc. They were supplied in many instances with knapsacks, haversacks, canteens, etc. They were seen riding on horses and mules, driving wagons, riding on caissons, in ambulances, with the staff of generals, and promiscuously mixed up with all the rebel army."

"Some of the rebel regiments have been reduced to one hundred and fifty men; come number over five hundred."

"This force had about one hundred and fifty guns with the letters U. S. This rebel army seemed to have been largely supplied with transportation by some United States quartermaster, Uncle Sam's initials were on many of its wagons, ambulances, and horses. One next spring-wagon was lettered 'General Casey's Headquarters.' Each regiment was supplied with but one or two wagons. The men were mostly without knapsacks, some few carried blankets, and a tuck of bread was occasionally to be seen at the buttonhole of a private soldier, whose reminiscences of home-life were not entirely eradicated."

"THURSDAY, September 11th.—Gen. Hill's division, numbering about eight thousand men, marched through the streets on its route westward this morning. This division moves more rapidly than either of the others. This was held to indicate the approach of the National army. Three of the buildings on the hospital grounds were taken possession of by the Confederates for the accommodation of the sick."

"FRIDAY, September 12th.—Stuart's cavalry passed through town to-day on their way to Hagerstown. It is said to be composed of Ashby's cavalry and the Hampton Legion. The men are more neat and cleanly than the infantry that preceded them, and their horses, of good stock, are well groomed and fed."

"The advance cavalry of the Federals charged into our streets, driving the rebels before them. They were met by a counter charge of Stuart's men, made in grand style. Sal-

On the night of the 15th, having previously sent over all his trains, artillery, and stores at the ford near Shepherdstown, Lee moved his army to the south bank of the Potomac, entirely un molested, the last body crossing about ten o'clock on the following morning. Anticipating pursuit, he made no display of force to intimidate the Federals, who followed on the night of the 19th. The passage of the river was undisputed, except by a few shots from a four-gun battery, whose gunners fled when the Federal advance reached the Virginia side. Supposing that the Confederates were in full retreat, they pressed on with loud cheers. Jackson, who was bringing up the Confederate rear, at once ordered A. P. Hill's division to drive them back. Arriving about half a mile from Boteler's Ford, Hill drew his men up in two lines, the first composed of the brigades of Pender, Gregg, and Thomas, under command of Gen. Gregg, and the second of Lane's (Branch's brigade), Archer's, and Brockenbrough's, under the command of Gen. Archer, of Harford County, Md.

"The enemy had lined the opposite hills," says Gen. Hill, "with some seventy pieces of artillery, and the infantry, who had crossed, lined the crest of the high banks on the Virginia shore. My lines advanced simultaneously, and soon encountered the enemy. This advance was made in the face of the most tremendous fire of artillery I ever saw, and too much praise cannot be awarded my regiments for their steady, unwavering step. It was as if each man felt that the fate of the army was centred in himself. The infantry opposition in front of Gregg's centre and right was but trifling, and soon brushed away. The enemy, however, massed in front of Pender, and extending, endeavored to turn his left. Gen. Pender became hotly engaged, and informing Archer of his danger, he (Archer) moved by the left flank, and forming on Pender's left, a simultaneous, daring charge was made, and the enemy driven pell-mell into the river. Then commenced the most terrible slaughter that this war has yet witnessed. The broad surface of the Potomac was blue with the floating bodies of our foes. But few escaped to tell the tale. By their own account they lost three thousand men killed and drowned from one brigade alone. Some two hundred prisoners were taken. My own loss was thirty killed and two hundred and thirty-one wounded. Total, two hundred and sixty-one. This was a wholesome lesson to the enemy, and taught them to know it may be dangerous sometimes to press a retreating army. In this battle (Shepherdstown) I did not use a piece of artillery.”

Leaving the dead behind, and unheeding the constant cannonade maintained from the north bank of the Potomac, the Confederates withdrew towards the Opequan, and drew up in line of battle on the west side of that stream, with their left extending to Williamsport and the Potomac. They maintained this position for several days, but McClellan declining to advance, they retired leisurely to the Opequan near Martinsburg, where they remained a few days, and then removed to the vicinity of Bunker Hill and Winchester, carefully removing all army stores as they went.

On the 2d of October, Gen. Lee issued the following order, giving a summary account of his campaign:

"HEADQUARTERS ARMY NORTHERN VIRGINIA, October 2, 1862.

General Orders No. 116.

In reviewing the achievements of the army during the present campaign, the commanding general cannot withhold the expression of his admiration of the indomitable courage it has displayed in battle, and its cheerful endurance of privation and hardship on the march.

"Since your great victories around Richmond you have defeated the enemy at Cedar Mountain, expelled him from the Rappahannock, and after a conflict of three days utterly repulsed him on the plains of Manассas, and forced him to take shelter within the fortifications around the capital. Without halting for repose, you crossed the Potomac, storming the heights of Harper’s Ferry, made prisoners of more than eleven thousand men, and capturing upwards of seventy pieces of artillery, all their small-arms, and other munitions of war. While one corps of the army was thus engaged, the other insured its success by arresting at Boonsboro’ the combined armies of the enemy, advancing under their favorite general to the relief of their beleaguered comrades.

"On the field of Sharpsburg, with less than one-third of his number, you resisted from daylight until dark the whole army of the enemy, and repulsed every attack along its entire front of more than four miles in extent. The whole of the following day you stood prepared to renew the conflict on the same ground, and retired next morning without molestation across the Potomac.

"Two attempts subsequently made by the enemy to follow you across the river have resulted in his complete discomfiture and being driven back with loss.

"Achievements such as these demanded much valor and patriotism. History records few examples of greater fortitude and endurance than this army has exhibited; and I am commissioned by the President to thank you, in the name of the Confederate States, for the ondying fame you have won for their arms.

"Much as you have done, much more remains to be accomplished. The enemy again threatens us with invasion, and to your tried valor and patriotism the country looks with confidence for deliverance and safety. Your past exploits give assurance that this confidence is not misplaced."

"B. E. Lee, General Commanding."

The official returns of the Army of Northern Virginia of the 22d of September, 1862, after the return of the Confederate army to Virginia, and when the stragglers left behind in the extraordinary marches in Maryland had rejoined their commands, show present for duty thirty-six thousand one hundred and eighty-seventy infantry and artillery; the cavalry, of which there is no report, would perhaps increase these figures to forty thousand of all arms.

The returns of the Army of the Potomac of the 20th of September, 1862, show present for duty at that date of the commands that participated in the battle of Sharpsburg eighty-five thousand nine hundred and thirty of all arms, as follows:

This is exclusive of Couch’s division of the Fourth Corps (seven thousand two hundred and nineteen), which reached Gen. McClellan after the battle.

In the battle of Sharpsburg and other engagements fought in Maryland quite a number of the Maryland commands in the Federal and Confederate armies suffered severely. The Third Maryland Federal Regiment, as has been seen, occupied a prominent position on the right of the line at the battle of Sharpsburg, and was reduced to about two hundred effective men. They fought with the greatest gallantry, driving the Confederates before them, and only retired when the remainder of the army fell back. This gallant command also suffered in the various engagements in Virginia. At the battle of Slaughter Mountain, under Col. De Witt, they lost in killed Maj. Kennedy, and in killed and wounded seventy-two. At Beverly Ford, on the 21st of August, they were

1 The Federal loss was undoubtedly severe; but John Esten Cooke, while expressing the opinion that this bloody repulse deterred McClellan from further pursuit, says that Gen. Hill’s estimate of his enemy’s loss “appears to be exaggerated.”

2 Gen. Longstreet says, “In one month these troops had marched over two hundred miles, upon little more than half rations, and fought nine battles and skirmishes, killed, wounded, and captured nearly as many men as we had in our ranks, besides taking arms and other munitions of war in large quantities.”

3 Taylor’s “Four Years with Gen. Lee,” p. 75.
again called into action, and had in killed and wounded seventeen, and forty-three taken prisoners. Col. De Witt being sick, Lieut.-Col. Sudsburg took command at Georgetown, on their march to Frederick, and fought the regiment at the battle of Sharpsburg. The Fifth and Second Regiments also evinced distinguished bravery in the battle of the 17th of September. The former regiment, as has already been said, was under the command of Major Blumenburg, who was severely wounded, and it lost forty-two killed and one hundred and forty-two wounded. The latter, under Lieut.-Col. Duryea, fought on the left of the Federal line, under Burnside, near the stone bridge. This regiment had also performed hard service in Newbern, N. C. At that time it numbered seven hundred and seventy-nine men, and after the campaign in Maryland it only numbered two hundred and fifty men and officers. It lost in battle by death and wounds one hundred and forty-four men. At the battle of Sharpsburg the Purnell Maryland Legion fought in the third brigade of Brig.-Gen. George S. Greene's second division of the Eleventh Army Corps. They were complimented by Gen. Greene for their gallant conduct on the field, having lost three killed and twenty-four wounded out of one hundred and ninety-three men with which they went into the engagement. The First Maryland (Federal) Artillery, or the Gist Artillery, as it was sometimes called, also won great distinction in this memorable battle. It occupied an advanced position.

Gen. Kenly with his brigade left Baltimore for the army on the 18th, and arrived at Williamsport on the 20th, to reinforce the Pennsylvania militia drawn up in line of battle near the town. The Pennsylvanians were very much alarmed at the presence of the Confederates, and had made preparations to destroy the stores, etc., in case of an attack. But the presence of Gen. Kenly's command, notwithstanding their long and forced march and the great need of rest and subsistence, "encouraged us," says Governor Curtin, "and proved a material influence in compelling the enemy to withdraw to the right bank of the Potomac, and in checking the demonstration he was making on Hagerstown." Governor Curtin, in a very complimentary letter, acknowledged the valuable services of the Maryland Brigade at that time, and expressed his thanks to Gen. Kenly personally "for the cheerful alacrity with which you obeyed the orders of Gen. Reynolds, and for the faithful discharge of all the duties which devolved upon you."

In the Confederate army, besides Gen. Trimble, Gen. Archer, Col. Bradley T. Johnson, Col. Charles Marshall, Maj. Henry Kyd Douglass, and other prominent Marylanders, who held distinguished positions and took a prominent part in the battles in Maryland, the State was represented in the ranks by the First Maryland Artillery, Chesapeake Artillery, Baltimore Light Artillery, and several companies of cavalry, besides scouts, etc.

After the campaign in Western Maryland, the entire country around, as has already been seen, was turned into a vast hospital for the sick and wounded soldiers of the two armies. Federal and Confederate sufferers were lying side by side in the hospitals, and received equal attention and relief, no distinction being made between them. The ladies of opposite sentiments united as relief associations and accomplished their humane and benevolent objects. The Christian Commission of Baltimore visited the battle-fields and hospitals, and distributed food, clothing, and bandages to the sick and wounded, and rendered all possible aid to the needy soldiers. Among those who rendered valuable assistance to the sufferers was Dr. Lewis H. Steiner, of Frederick City.

Subscription lists were opened in all sections of the State by the association for the relief of the sick and wounded, and soon large sums of money, clothing, and necessaries were contributed. Many who had slight wounds made their way to Baltimore, stopping at the railroad stations, etc., to have their wounds dressed.

Governor Bradford and his staff, with eighteen volunteer surgeons, visited the hospitals around the battle-fields of Sharpsburg, and the latter remained to assist the army surgeons in their duties. After the Governor's return he issued an address thanking the Marylanders under McClellan—the Second, Third, and Fifth Regiments, the Purnell Legion, the First Regiment of the Potomac Home Brigade, and First Maryland Artillery—for their courage and conduct, and expressing acknowledgments on behalf of the State to Gen. McClellan and Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania. On the 1st of October, President Lincoln, accompanied by John W. Garrett, president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad; Mr. Kennedy, superintendent of the United States census; Marshal Lamon, of the District of Columbia, and several other distinguished personages, visited Gen. McClellan, and remained several days. He visited the battle-fields of South Mountain and Sharpsburg, and spent some time viewing the important points of historical interest.

Upon arriving at the scene of the recent battle of South Mountain the whole party took horses and rode over the battle-field, spending some time in visiting the localities rendered historical by the severe struggles of September 14th and 15th. After this was done, Gen. McClellan and his staff took leave of the President and returned to headquarters. The President and his party occupied two large ambulances, in which they returned to Frederick.

At fifteen minutes before five the Presidential salute, which was fired by Battery K of the First New York Artillery, announced their approach. Patrick Street was lined with people anxious to see and welcome the President of the United States. Just at this time a smart shower commenced falling, accompanied by a heavy wind, which raised suffocating clouds of dust. But this could not drive in the crowds, who had been long and anxiously waiting his approach. The procession was led by Col. Allen, the military governor of Frederick, followed by the ambulances containing the Presidential party, accompanied by a detachment of the First Maine Cavalry, under the command of Capt. Smith, the provost-marshal, as a guard of honor. The President was enthusiastically received by the multitude as he rode up Patrick to Court Street, where the procession turned off and proceeded to the residence of Mrs. Ramsey, on Record Street, where Gen. Hartsuff was stopping and being attended upon since he was wounded at the battle of Antietam. The President had expressed a desire to pay his respects to this gallant soldier on his way through the city.

Here he remained for a few moments, and upon making his appearance he was again enthusiastically cheered and called upon for a speech. He briefly addressed the assemblage as follows:

"In my present position it is hardly proper for me to make speeches. Every word is so closely noted that it will not do to make foolish ones, and I cannot be expected to be prepared to make a sensible one. If I were as I have been most of my life, I might perhaps talk nonsense to you for half an hour, and it wouldn't hurt anybody. As it is, I can only return thanks for the compliment paid our cause. Please accept my sincere thanks for the compliment to our common country."

Here repeated cheers were given for the President and Gen. McClellan. Mr. Lincoln then re-entered the ambulance, and was driven to the railroad station, closely followed by the rapidly increasing crowd. The party immediately entered the handsomely fitted up cars, which had been in readiness to receive them for nearly forty-eight hours. The President was again loudly called for by the throng of citizens and soldiers, and upon making his appearance another speech was demanded. He good-naturedly responded as follows:

"I am surrounded by soldiers, and a little farther off by the citizens of this good city of Frederick. Nevertheless I can only say, as I did five minutes ago, it is not proper for me to make speeches in my present position. I return thanks to our good soldiers for the services they have rendered, the energy they have shown, the hardships they have endured, and the blood they have shed for this Union of ours; and I also return thanks, not only to the soldiers, but to the good citizens of Frederick, and to the good men, women, and children in this land of ours, for their devotion in the glorious cause, and I say this with no malice in my heart towards those who have done otherwise. May our children and children's children for a thousand generations continue to enjoy these benefits conferred upon us by a united country, and have cause yet to rejoice under these glorious institutions, bestowed upon us by Washington and his compatriots. Now, my friends, soldiers and citizens, I can only say once more, farewell."

Cheers for the President and Gen. McClellan were alternately given. Just as the cars moved off Gen. McClellan was loudly called for, and he stepped out on the platform and bowed a farewell to the multitude. At twenty minutes past five the train started for Washington, and the crowd dispersed. Frederick Schley, editor of the Examiner, telegraphed an invitation to the President to accept the hospitalities of his mansion, but Marshal Lamon, on behalf of Mr. Lincoln, declined it on account of the necessarily brief time that he would remain in the city. The President's car was ornamented by a very large and beautiful bouquet, presented to him by Mrs. Schley, with which he appeared to be much pleased.

Not long after the battle of Sharpsburg the State was again thrown into excitement by an adventurous inroad of the Confederate cavalry under Gen. J. E. B.

1 A Washington correspondent who accompanied President Lincoln in this visit to the battle-fields of Sharpsburg and South Mountain relates the following incident:

"After leaving Gen. Richardson the party passed a house in which was a large number of Confederate wounded. By request of the President, the party alighted and entered the building. Mr. Lincoln, after looking, remarked to the wounded Confederates that if they had no objection he would be pleased to take them by the hand. He said the solemn obligations which we owe to our country and posterity compel the prosecution of this war, and it followed that many were our enemies through uncontrollable circumstances, and he bore them no malice, and could take them by the hand with sympathy and good feeling. After a short silence the Confederates came forward, and each silently but fervently shook the hand of the President. Mr. Lincoln and Gen. McClellan then walked forward by the side of those who were wounded too severely to be able to arise, and bid them to be of good cheer, assuring them that every possible care should be bestowed upon them to ameliorate their condition. It was a moving scene, and there was not a dry eye in the building, either among the Nationals or Confederates. Both the President and Gen. McClellan were kind in their remarks and treatment of the rebel sufferers during this remarkable interview."
Stuart. The following official reports contain the history of this daring expedition:

"Headqu'r's Army Northern Virginia,
Camp Near Winchester, Va., 8th Oct., 1862,
Major-General J. E. B. Stuart, Commanding Cavalry, etc.

General,—An expedition into Maryland with a detachment of cavalry, if it can be successfully executed, is at this time desirable. You will therefore form a detachment of from twelve to fifteen hundred well-mounted men, suitable for such an expedition, and should the information from your scouts lead you to suppose that your movement can be concealed from bodies of the enemy that would be able to resist it, you are desired to cross the Potomac above Williamsport, leave Hagerstown and Greencastle on your right, and proceed to the rear of Chambersburg, and endeavor to destroy the railroad bridge over the branch of the Conococheague.

"Any other damage that you can inflict upon the enemy or his means of transportation you will also execute. You are desired to gain all information of the position, force, and probable intention of the enemy which you can, and in your progress into Pennsylvania you will take measures to inform yourself of the various routes that you may take on your return to Virginia.

"To keep your movement secret, it will be necessary for you to arrest all citizens that may give information to the enemy, and should you meet with citizens of Pennsylvania holding State or government offices, it will be desirable, if convenient, to bring them with you, that they may be used as hostages, or the means of exchange for our own citizens that have been carried off by the enemy. Such persons will, of course, be treated with all the respect and consideration that circumstances will admit.

"Should it be in your power to supply yourself with horses, or other necessary articles on the list of legal captures, you are authorized to do so.

"Having accomplished your errand, you will rejoin the army as soon as practicable. Reliance is placed upon your skill and judgment in the successful execution of this plan, and it is not intended or desired that you should jeopardize the safety of your command, or go farther than your good judgment or prudence may dictate.

"Col. Imbolden has been desired to attract the attention of the enemy towards Cumberland, so that the river between that point and where you may remain may be less guarded. You will, of course, keep out your scouts to give you information, and take every other precaution to secure the safety and success of the expedition.

"Should you be led so far east as to make it better, in your opinion, to continue around to the Potomac, you will have to cross the river in the vicinity of Leesburg.

"I am, with great respect,
Your obedient servant,
(Signed)
R. E. Lee, General.

"Headquarters Cavalry Division,
October 9, 1862.

"Soldiers,—You are about to engage in an enterprise which, to insure success, imperatively demands at your hands coolness, decision, and bravery, implicit obedience to orders, without question or cavil, and the strictest order and sobriety on the march and in bivouac.

"The destination and extent of this expedition had better be kept to myself than known to you. Suffice it to say that, with the hearty co-operation of officers and men, I have not a doubt of its success,—a success which will reflect credit in the highest degree upon your arms.

"The orders which are herewith published for your government are absolutely necessary, and must be rigidly enforced.

(Signed)
J. E. B. Stuart,
Major-General Commanding.

"Headquarters Cavalry Division,
October 9, 1862.

"Orders No. 13.—During the expedition into the enemy's country on which this command is about to engage, brigade commanders will make arrangements for seizing horses, the property of citizens of the United States, and all other property subject to legal capture, provided that in no case will any species of property be taken except by authority, given in person or in writing, of the commander of brigade, regiment, or captain of a company in the absence of his superior officers. In all cases a simple receipt will be given to the effect that the article is seized for the use of the Confederate States, giving place, date, and name of owners, in order to enable the individual to have recourse upon his government for damages.

"Individual plunder for private use is positively forbidden, and every instance must be punished in the severest manner, for an army of plunderers consumes its own destruction. The capture of anything will not give the captor any individual claim, and all horses and equipments will be kept, to be apprised, upon the return of the expedition, through the entire division. Brigade commanders will arrange to have one-third of their respective commands engaged in leading horses, provided enough can be procured, each man linking so as to lead three horses, the led horses being habitually in the centre of the brigade, and the remaining two-thirds will keep at all times prepared for action.

"The attack, when made, must be vigorous and overwhelming, giving the enemy no time to recombine or consider anything except his best means of flight. All persons found in transit must be detained, subject to the orders of division provost-marshal, to prevent information reaching the enemy. As a measure of justice to our many good citizens who, without crime, have been taken from their homes and kept by the enemy in prison, all public functionaries, such as magistrates, postmasters, sheriffs, etc., will be seized as prisoners. They will be kindly treated, and kept as hostages for our own. No straggling from the route of march or bivouac for the purpose of obtaining provisions, etc., will be permitted in any case, the comissaries and quartermasters being required to obtain and furnish all such supplies in bulk as may be necessary.

"So much of this order as authorizes seizures of persons and property will not take effect until the command crosses the Potomac River.

"The utmost activity is enjoined upon the detachments procuring horses, and necessitating vigilance upon the entire command.

"Maj. J. P. W. Hairston is hereby appointed division provost-marshal.

"By command of Maj.-Gen. J. E. B. Stuart.

R. Channing Price, 1st Lieut. and A. D. C.

"Headquarters Cavalry Division,
October 14, 1862.

"Col. R. H. Chilton,
A. A. General, Army Northern Virginia.

"Colonel,—I have the honor to report that on the 9th instant, in compliance with instructions from the commanding general Army Northern Virginia, I proceeded on an expedition into Pennsylvania with a cavalry force of eighteen hundred men and four pieces of horse artillery, under command of Brig-
THE MARYLAND CAMPAIGN OF 1862.

Gen. Hampton and Col. W. H. P. Lee and Jones. This force rendezvoused at Darksville at 12 m., and marched there to the vicinity of Hedgesville, where it camped for the night. At daylight next morning (October 18th) I crossed the Potomac at McCoy's (between Williamsport and Hancock) with some little opposition, capturing two or three horses of the enemy's pickets. We were told here by citizens that a large force had been camped the night before at Clear Spring, and were supposed to be en route to Cumberland. We proceeded northward until we had reached the turnpike leading from Hagerstown to Hancock (known as the National road). Here a signal-station on the mountain and most of the party, with their flags and apparatus, were surprised and captured, and also eight or ten prisoners of war, from whom, as well as from citizens, I found that the large force, alluded to, had crossed but an hour ahead of me towards Cumberland, and consisted of six regiments of Ohio troops and two batteries under Gen. Cox, and were en route, ein Cumberland, for the Kanawha. I sent back this intelligence at once to the commanding general. Striking directly across the National road, I proceeded in the direction of Monocacy, Pa., which point was reached about 12 m. I was extremely anxious to reach Hagerstown, where large supplies were stored, but was satisfied from reliable information that the notice the enemy had of my approach and the proximity of his forces would enable him to prevent my capturing it. I therefore turned towards Chambersburg. I did not reach this point till after dark in a rain. I did not deem it safe to defer the attack till morning, nor was it proper to attack a place full of women and children without summoning it first to surrender.

I accordingly sent in a flag of truce, and found no military or civil authority in the place; but some prominent citizens who met the officer were notified that the place would be occupied, and if any resistance were made the place would be shelled in three minutes. Brig.-Gen. Wade Hampton's command being in advance took possession of the place, and I appointed him military governor of the city. No incidents occurred during the night, during which it rained continuously. The officials all fled the town on our approach, and no one could be found who would admit that he held office in the place. About two hundred and seventy-five sick and wounded in hospital were paroled. During the day a large number of horses of citizens were seized and brought along. The wires were cut, and railroads were obstructed. Next morning it was ascertained that a large number of small-arms and munitions of war were stored about the railroad buildings, all of which could not be easily brought away were destroyed, consisting of about five thousand new muskets, pistols, sabres, ammunition, also a large assemblage of army clothing. The extensive machine-shops and depot buildings of the railroad and several trains of loaded cars were entirely destroyed.

From Chambersburg I decided, after mature consideration, to strike for the vicinity of Lewsburg as the best route of return, particularly as Cox's command would have rendered the direction of Cumberland, full of mountain gorges, particularly hazardous. The route selected was through an open country. Of course I left nothing undone to prevent the inhabitants from detecting my real route and object. I started directly towards Gettysburg, but, having passed the Blue Ridge, turned back towards Hagerstown for six or eight miles, and then crossed to Maryland by Emmittsburg, where, as we passed, we were hailed by the inhabitants with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of joy. A scouting party of one hundred and fifty Lancers had just passed towards Gettysburg, and I regret exceedingly that my march did not admit of the delay necessary to catch them. Taking the road towards Frederick, we intercepted dispatches from Col. Rush (Lancers) to the commander of the scout, which satisfied me that our whereabouts was still a problem to the enemy.

"Before reaching Frederick I crossed the Monocacy, continued the march through the night, ria Liberty, Never Market, Monrovia, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, where we cut the telegraph wires and obstructed the railroad. We reached at daylight Hyattstown, on McClellan's line of wagon communication with Washington, but we found only a few wagons to capture, and we pushed on to Barnesville, where we found just vacated by a company of the enemy's cavalry. We had here corroborated what we had heard before, that Stoneman had between four and five thousand troops about Poolesville and guarding the river fords. I started directly for Poolesville, but instead of marching upon that point avoided it by a march through the woods, leaving it two or three miles to my left, and getting into the road from Poolesville to the mouth of the Monocacy. Guarding well my flanks and rear, I pushed boldly forward, meeting the head of the enemy's column going towards Poolesville.

"I ordered the charge, which was responded to in handsome style by the advance squadron (Irving's) of Lee's brigade, which drove back the enemy's cavalry upon the column of infantry advancing to occupy the crest from which the cavalry were driven. Quick as thought Lee's sharpshooters sprang to the ground, and engaging the infantry skirmishers, held them in check till the artillery in advance came up, which, under the gallant Pelham, drove back the enemy's force to his batteries beyond the Monocacy, between which and our solitary gun quite a spirited fire continued for some time. This answered, in connection with the high crest occupied by our piece, to screen entirely my real movement quickly to the left, making a bold and rapid strike for White's Ford, to make my way across before the enemy at Poolesville and Monocacy could be aware of my design. Although delayed somewhat by about two hundred infantry, strongly posted in the cliffs over the ford, yet they yielded to the moral effect of a few shells before engaging our sharpshooters, and the crossing of the canal (now dry) and river was effected with all the precision of passing a defile on drill.

"A section of artillery being sent with the advance and placed in position on the London side, another piece on the Maryland height, while Pelham continued to occupy the attention of the enemy with the other, withdrawing from position to position until his piece was ordered to cross. The enemy was marching from Poolesville in the mean time, but came up in line of battle on the Maryland bank, only to receive a thundering salutation, with evident effect, from our guns on this side. I lost not a man killed on the expedition, and only a few slight wounds. The enemy's loss is not known, but Pelham's one gun compelled the enemy's battery to change its position three times. The remainder of the march was destitute of interest. The conduct of the command and their behavior towards the inhabitants is worthy of the highest praise; a few individual cases only were exceptions in this particular.

"Brig.-Gen. Hampton and Col. Lee, Jones, Wickham, and Butler, and the officers and men under their command, are entitled to my lasting gratitude for their coolness in danger and cheerful obedience to orders. Unoffending persons were treated with civility, and the inhabitants were generous in provisors of provisions on the march. We seized and brought over a large number of horses, the property of citizens of the United States.

"The valuable information obtained in this reconnaissance as to the distribution of the enemy's force was communicated orally to the commanding general, and need not here be repeated. A number of public functionaries and prominent citizens were taken captives and brought over as hostages for our..."
own unoffending citizens whom the enemy has torn from their homes and confined in dungeons in the North. One or two of my men lost their way, and are probably in the hands of the enemy.

"The results of this expedition in a moral and political point of view can hardly be estimated, and the consternation among property-holders in Pennsylvania beggars description.

"I am especially indebted to Capt. B. S. White, South Carolina Cavalry, and to Mr. — and Mr. ——, whose skilful guidance was of immense service to me. My staff are entitled to my thanks for uniting energy in the discharge of their duties.

"I inclose a map of the expedition, drawn by Capt. W. W. Blackford to accompany this report, also a copy of orders enforced during the march.

"Believing that the hand of God was clearly manifested in the signal deliverance of my command from danger, and the crowning success attending it, I ascribe to Him the praise, the honor, and the glory.

"I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant, (Signed) "J. E. B. Stuart,

"Maj.-Gen. Commanding Cavalry."

"Headquarters Department of Northern Virginia, Oct. 18, 1862.

"Gen. S. Cooper, Adjutant and Inspector-General:

"General.—In forwarding the report of Maj.-Gen. Stuart of his expedition into Pennsylvania, I take occasion to express to the Department my sense of the boldness, judgment, and prudence he displayed in its execution, and cordially join with him in his commendations of the conduct and endurance of the brave men he commanded. To his skill and their fortitude, under the guidance of an overruling Providence, is their success due.

"I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) "R. E. Lee, General."

In the mean time the Confederates had destroyed about thirty-five miles of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, beginning at Harper's Ferry and running to a point about ten miles west of Martinsburg. This portion of the road had the rails torn up, and either carried off or twisted and rendered useless. All the bridges throughout this extent were destroyed, and at Martinsburg one of the great store-houses of the company, and an immense amount of damage was done. Switches and sidings were torn up, the various repair-shops, water-tanks, coal-dumps, offices, machine-shops, engines, cars, and, in short, everything pertaining to the railroad was destroyed as far as possible.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE GETTYSBURG CAMPAIGN.

After the termination of the Maryland campaign, the Army of the Potomac remained on the north bank of the river, in the vicinity of Sandy Hook, Sharpsburg, and Williamsport, with a large detachment thrown across at Harper's Ferry, occupying Loudon and Bolivar Heights.

Reconnoissances were made on the 16th and 17th of October from Sharpsburg in the direction of Reamsville, Leetown, and Smithfield, Va., and from Harper's Ferry to Charlestown. In the latter the Fifth Maryland participated. On the 21st of October a reconnoissance was also made from Loudon Heights to Lovettsville, in which the Third Maryland bore a part. On the 26th of October, Gen. McClellan began his second advance into Virginia from the line of the Potomac. Early on that day a cavalry force under Gen. Pleasonton crossed the Potomac at Berlin, and moved in the direction of Purcellville. Soon after the Ninth Corps began to cross in light marching order, and took position near Lovettsville. The First, Sixth, and Ninth Corps, the cavalry and the reserve artillery crossed at Berlin between the 26th of October and the 2d of November. The Second and Fifth Corps crossed at Harper's Ferry between the 29th of October and the 1st of November. The Twelfth Corps was left in the vicinity of Harper's Ferry, to guard against another invasion of Maryland. Attached to it at this time were the Third and Fifth Maryland Infantry Regiments, Purnell's Legion, and Cole's cavalry.

On the 7th of November an order was received from Washington relieving Gen. McClellan of command and appointing Gen. Burnside as his successor. On the 13th of December, Burnside made an assault upon the Confederate heights in the rear of Fredericksburg, when "a slaughter the most bloody and most useless of the war" took place. Gen. Jackson commanded on the right of the Confederate line, and Gen. Longstreet on the left. On the Federal side Franklin was on the left, Hooker occupied the centre, and Sumner the right. The Federal attack was repulsed with a loss on the Union side of about fifteen thousand killed and wounded, and on the Confederate side of about five thousand. After the battle of Fredericksburg, Gen. Burnside was relieved of the command, and Gen. Hooker appointed in his stead.
The Twelfth Corps, which had been left at Harper’s Ferry when McClellan advanced towards the Rappahancock, again joined the main army in the latter part of December. During its stay on the upper Potomac several reconnaissances were made to ascertain the location and strength of the Confederate forces in the Shenandoah Valley. In one of these expeditions, made by the Second Division, under Gen. Geary, on the 9th of November, the Third Maryland and Purnell’s Legion participated. The division moved from Bolivar Heights to Rippon, within six miles of Berryville, driving back the enemy, and capturing prisoners, arms, horses, and cattle.

From the 2d to the 6th of December, Cole’s cavalty and the Third Infantry formed part of a column under Gen. Geary, which marched to Winchester. En route Cole’s cavalry skirmished with the enemy’s cavalry at Charlestown, Berryville, and Ash Hollow.
On the withdrawal of the Twelfth Corps from Harper’s Ferry, Cole’s cavalry and the Fifth Infantry were left in that vicinity, while the Purnell Legion was sent to Frederick City.

The First Maryland Cavalry did not accompany the Army of the Potomac in the Maryland campaign of 1862. It was given a more arduous duty in the defenses of Washington south of the Potomac.
During the fall and winter months it made numerous reconnaissances through the section of country lying between the Bull Run Mountains and the Potomac and Rappahannock Rivers. The regiment was kept almost incessantly in motion, picking up guerrillas, watching dangerous defiles, scouting across the country, always on the qui vive against attack or surprise.

On the 25th of October, 1862, while making one of these reconnaissances, a detachment of the regiment was attacked near Manassas Junction by a superior force of the enemy, and had one man (Robert Starkey) killed, two officers (Lieux. A. S. Dorsey and N. P. Patterson) wounded, and seven men captured.
Again, on the 27th of December, a portion of the regiment, under Capt. Joseph H. Cook, aided in repulsing Stuart’s attack upon the town of Dumfries. After a sharp and determined fight, lasting several hours, the enemy was driven off with considerable loss. Capt.
Cook was highly commended by Col. Candy, commanding the post, for his efficient services on this occasion. In the morning a detachment of the First, commanded by Capt. J. K. Buckley, had been sent from Dumfries on a scout in the direction of Staff-ford Store and Springs. Next day, while en route from Fairfax Station to the relief of the garrison of Dumfries, the Third Maryland Infantry took part in a skirmish with the enemy at a point between Ocequan Creek and the town of Dumfries. Finally, on the 31st of January, 1863, the First Cavalry left Hall’s Farm, four miles from Washington, and marched to Stafford Court-House, where it arrived on the 4th of February, and was attached to the cavalry brigade of the Eleventh Army Corps, Col. Kielmansegge, of the First, commanding. On the 12th of February it changed camp to Aquia Creek. Upon being assigned to the Second Brigade, Third Division, Cavalry Corps, Feb. 21, 1863, the First moved to near Belle Plain Landing. While here it performed picket duty on the Rappahannock.

In the mean time steps had been taken to reorganize the First Maryland Infantry, which had so greatly distinguished itself at Front Royal. On the 5th of June, 1862, the Secretary of War ordered the remnants of the regiment, then at Wil-liamssport, to proceed without delay to Baltimore for reorganization, recruiting, and equipment. In accordance with this order the depleted regiment, under Capt. Thomas S. J. Johnson, proceeded to Baltimore, where Col. Kenly resumed command on the 15th of August. On the 22d of the same month
Col. Kenly was promoted brigadier-general of United States Volunteers for “gallant conduct at the battle of Front Royal,” and on the 6th of September he was directed to organize and command a brigade of new troops. Two days after, on the 8th of Sep-ember, 1862, Gen. Kenly assumed command of the “Maryland Brigade,” which was composed of the First, Fourth, Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Regiments of Maryland Volunteers, then in process of formation in or near Baltimore, and Capt. Alexander’s battery of Baltimore Light Artillery. On the morning after the battle of Antietam the Maryland Brigade, except the Sixth Infantry and Alexander’s battery, left Baltimore for Hagerstown, which it reached at 2.30 a.m. on the 20th. It immediately marched towards Wil-liamssport to reinforce the Pennsylvania militia, whom they found formed in line of battle about two and a half miles from the town, and engaged in a brisk skirmish with the advance cavalry of the enemy, who were approaching in the direction of Hagerstown.
The brigade remained in line and under arms until the next day, when it marched in and occupied Williamssport, the enemy meantime having withdrawn to the Virginia side of the river.

1 "Historical Record of the First Regiment Maryland Infantry."
The significance of this movement of the brigade is explained in the following extract from a letter of Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, addressed to Gen. Kenly:

"The enemy crossed at Williamsport in force, with cavalry, artillery, and infantry, on the afternoon of the 10th of September, 1862, and attacked the pickets of Gen. Reynolds between that place and Hagerstown. After night they approached his lines, then about three miles from the latter place. In the mean time large consignment and quartermaster stores and ammunition for the Army of the Potomac had arrived at Hagerstown. Gen. Reynolds had his men in line of battle, and kept me informed as to the movements of the enemy. Between twelve and one o'clock the general came to Hagerstown, and a council was held in my room, composed of Gen. Andrew Porter and Her- man Haupt, Maj. Veges, Capt. Gentry of Gen. Porter's staff, and Col. John A. Wright of my staff. It seemed to be the united judgment of the military gentleman that the enemy would attack in the morning, if not before, and serious apprehensions were entertained as to the result.

"Our troops were raw and undisciplined, and we were without efficient artillery. Preparations were ordered to be made for the destruction of military stores and the removal of the troops, to be carried out if the enemy should attack in force, and if it should become apparent that we could not resist him. At two o'clock on the morning of the 29th you arrived with your command, the Maryland Brigade, en route to report to Gen. McClellan. I deemed the danger so imminent at that point that at my instance Gen. Reynolds was notified of your arrival and took command of yourself and troops. Your ar- rival relieved us all, and your troops marched directly to the front (notwithstanding the long and rapid march they had made and their need of rest and subsistence), where you re- mained until the enemy recrossed the Potomac, and Gen. Rey- nolds, by my direction, ordered the militia under his command to return to Pennsylvania. Although no battle was fought, your presence and the strength of your command encouraged us, and proved a material influence in compelling the enemy to withdraw to the right bank of the Potomac, and in checking the demonstration he was making on Hagerstown."

The brigade went into camp just outside of Wil- liamsport, on the road leading to Hagerstown and Clear Spring. Company A of the Seventh Regiment, Capt. E. M. Mobley, was detailed as the provost-guard of the town.

The command now formed part of Gen. Franklin's Sixth Army Corps. The pickets of either army faced each other across the river, easily fordable and within comparatively short range. This led to an occasional interchange of compliments more spicy than courteous, but the practice was soon suppressed. Shortly after reaching Williamsport the brigade was again united by the arrival of the Sixth Infantry and Alexander's battery, which had been left behind when the other regiments moved from Baltimore. During the night of September 23rd the Eighth Infantry, under Col. Denison, marched to Clear Spring, reaching there about daybreak. When the inhabitants of the village awoke their profuse hospitality demonstrated that the regiment was among friends. In a short time the whole command was breakfasted, and often in after and more dangerous times the generous reception at Clear Spring was pleasantly recalled by the soldiers of the Eighth.

On the afternoon of the 24th the regiment fell back some three miles towards the river, and took position on Cowton's farm in support of a battery posted at Dam No. 5. It was relieved of this duty on the 10th of October, and returned to Williamsport. That day information was received by Gen. Kenly that Stuart's cavalry was crossing the river at McCoy's Ferry and moving towards Williamsport. The whole brigade was turned out under arms, the streets of the town barricaded, and every disposition made to hold the post. Capt. Russell's company of the First Mary- land Cavalry was dispatched in the direction of Clear Spring to watch the movements of the enemy. It was soon discovered that he was heading for Pennsyl- vania. After remaining under arms for three rainy days and nights the brigade was ordered back to camp. During this period of excitement there were the usual flying rumors and false alarms, with frequent "falling in," as if the enemy was actually at hand, and reported demonstrations upon the advanced pickets, concluding with the intelligence that Stuart had finally succeeded in effecting his escape across the river near the mouth of the Monocacy. In the purs- uit of Stuart, Fiery's cavalry company marched from New Creek, Va., to Mersburg, Pa., whence it returned to Clear Spring, where for some time it was employed in guard and picket duty along the river front from Dam No. 5 to Cherry Run. The other companies of Cole's battalion pursued the enemy vigorously on his return march, harrying him upon every occasion, and capturing seven men with horses and equipments of Wade Hampton's Legion, about the only loss that Stuart suffered in this raid around the Army of the Potomac. Towards the end of October everything about Williamsport in the military line quieted down for the time. On the 29th of Oc- tober the Seventh Infantry marched to Four Locks, where its headquarters were established. The several companies (except Company A, which remained at Williamsport) were distributed along a front of some five miles, guarding the fords of the Potomac and the culverts and draw-bridges of the canal from a point above McCoy's Ferry to below Dam No. 5. On the 2d of November, 1862, the Fourth Infantry, at the request of Governor Bradford, took its departure from Williamsport for Baltimore for service as guards at Camp Bradford, the general rendezvous of drafted men. On the 11th of December, Gen. Kenly marched with the First and Sixth Infantry for Maryland Heights, under orders to take post there. Next day the Seventh Infantry, under Lieut.-Col. Charles E. Phelps, marched back to Williamsport, leaving only Company I, Capt. Anderson, at Four Locks. Company G, Capt. Bragonier, continued its march to Dam No. 4. On the 13th of December four companies of the Seventh were ordered on provost duty at Hagerstown, and Capt. Bennett, of Company E, was appointed provost-marshall. On the 21st the Seventh Regiment (except Company B, left on provost duty in Hagerstown) was assembled at Williamsport, and in company with the Eighth and Alexander's battery, and a squadron of the First Cavalry under Capt. Russell, proceeded, via Sharpsburg, to Maryland Heights.1

Here the entire Maryland Brigade (the Fourth Regiment having rejoined it from detached service at Camp Bradford on the 17th of December) went into winter quarters, and the regular routine of drill and discipline was re-established.

The sojourn of the brigade in Western Maryland was a bright page in its history. The feeling of the people towards the soldiers was, with very few exceptions, cordial and thoroughly sympathetic. When the brigade first entered Williamsport, upon the heels of the enemy's cavalry, they were welcomed as deliverers, and, so far as opportunity for intercourse was permitted, with hospitality. The Union sentiment seemed to increase in volume and intensity as you approached the border. It was in some measure doubtless owing to the spirit inspired by the Virginia Union refugees that the loyalty of this southern border of Maryland was of a flavor that the word bitter would but feebly characterize.

As the Confederates had lost all hopes of making these people their friends, there was no special motive for forbearance, and hence repeated raids and invasions had stamped desolation upon the face of the country, and upon the minds of the inhabitants many recollections of personal wrongs and losses.

After the withdrawal of McClellan's army from the vicinity of Harper's Ferry, Cole's cavalry remained in that neighborhood, scouting, picketing, and meeting the enemy in several minor conflicts. On the 20th of December, 1862, a detachment of sixty men from Companies A and C, under command of Capt. Vernon, left the Ferry on a reconnaissance. After proceeding about three miles up the left bank of the Shenandoah, it was learned that Capt. Baylor's guerrillas, one hundred and twenty strong, were at Charles-town, but it was subsequently understood they had gone to Halltown. Moving rapidly to that point, Capt. Vernon succeeded in capturing the guerrilla chief, who was visiting a farm-house near by. On its return the detachment encountered a Confederate force drawn up in line on the crest of a hill. Receiving the enemy's fire, Vernon's command immediately charged upon him, breaking his ranks and putting him to flight. A running fight ensued, in which Lient. W. W. Wilson, of the Twelfth Virginia Cavalry, a private, and five riderless horses were captured. One of Vernon's men received a slight wound.

Shortly after the arrival of the Maryland Brigade at Maryland Heights, Companies A and B of the First Regiment were posted at Duffield Station, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, while Company K, with Companies F and H of the Seventh, were sent to garrison the "Stone Fort" and signal-station on the crest of the mountain. This fort was located on the ground upon which had occurred the fight preceding the surrender of Col. Miles. It was still in an unfinished condition. Heretofore the brigade had enjoyed little opportunity for target practice, from the fact that its operations had been mainly confined to picketing in the immediate presence of the enemy. At Maryland Heights this essential part of a soldier's practical education was systematically attended to, not only in the brigade, but throughout the entire command of all arms of the service. On some days there was noise enough for a regular battle.

The "naval battery" of Dahlgren guns threw "flour-barrel" shells with a noise like that of a locomotive and a long train of cars going through mid-air at the rate of several hundred miles an hour. Alexander's field battery and others in the vicinity were also busily engaged in practice, and musketry firing from all the regiments at the post added to the general din.2

1 On the 29th of October, 1862, Gen. Wade Hampton, commanding the Confederate forces opposite Williamsport, sent a communication by flag of truce to Gen. Kenly; "but before the truce party had made its appearance, or anything was known of its mission on the Federal side, an expedition, consisting of Lieut. McMahon and fifteen men of the First Maryland Cavalry, was sent across the river by order of Gen. Keely to surprise and capture a picket guard of the enemy stationed on the peak opposite Williamsport. On crossing the Potomac near Sharpspeis' warehouse, Lieut. McMahon kept the woods until he struck the Williamsport and Martinsburg turnpike beyond the picket station, when he took to the road, and with a dash came so suddenly upon the guard as to completely surprise them, all of whom, six in number, were captured. Gen. Hampton claimed the unconditional release of the prisoners, on the ground of a violation of military law and usage governing flags of truce," but Gen. Kenly refused to surrender the prisoners, and his action was sustained by superior authority.—Historical Record of the First Regiment Maryland Infantry.

2 On the 28th of February, 1863, a beautiful national flag, sent by a number of Marylanders residing in San Francisco,
With the opening of spring some changes were made in the location of the regiments of the Maryland Brigade. On the 14th of March the camp of the Eighth on Maryland Heights was broken up, and the regiment crossed the river and pitched tents on Bolivar Heights, a fine plateau on the Virginia side above Harper's Ferry, stretching away from a steep bluff overlooking the Potomac. The Seventh followed on the 4th of April, and the First on the 9th of the same month.

On the 27th of March, 1863, the Maryland Brigade was officially designated the First Brigade, forming part of the First Division, Eighth Army Corps. The same order transferred the Sixth Regiment and Alexander's battery to Gen. Milroy's command, and they left for Berryville on the 28th of March. On the 27th of April the Fourth and Seventh Regiments,Cols. Bowerman and Webster commanding, were transferred by rail to Oakland, under orders which indicated a campaign in West Virginia, then alarmed by a dashng raid of Confederate cavalry under Imboden and Jones. Upon arriving at Altamont, it was found that the railroad track had been torn up the day before and hastily relaid. Several bridges had been burned and the telegraph wires cut. The fidelity of the engineer was questioned, and Col. Webster, who by reason of seniority commanded the force, took his position upon the leading locomotive, and at all doubtful places an advanced guard marched ahead of the train. Oakland was found in a state of intense excitement, created by the recent presence of the raiders, who had carried off with them a large number of valuable horses belonging to the citizens. The town and its approaches were at once picketed by the Seventh, supported by the Fourth, which came up during the day. The men were under arms all night, during almost the whole of which there was constant telegraphing of reports, rumors, and inquiries in all directions. The result of all this was that early on the morning of the 29th the Seventh left knapsacks behind at Oakland, in charge of the Fourth, and marched westward along the line of the railroad, or parallel with it. The bridge over the Youghiogheny, some two or three miles out, having been destroyed by the raiders a few hours before, some delay occurred before a crossing could be effected, the creek being high and the banks steep and miry. A march of ten miles brought the regiment to Cranberry Summit. This little town had made a spirited defense, but the Confederates were much too strong for the citizens and the few soldiers who were there, and the stores had been plundered and all the horses seized. The regiment left Cranberry about 7 P.M. in a thunder-storm, and made a forced march of thirteen miles farther to "No. 73," a water-station near Rowlesburg. The distance by the railroad between these points, passing through tunnels, was less, but the line of march was over rough country roads, climbing and descending the mountains. Nothing could be worse than the condition of these roads, or more trying than this march. The steep slippery roads were crossed and recrossed by Salt Lick and other creeks, through which the men waded a dozen times, sometimes almost waist-deep, and wound along the brink of precipices, up and down rough mountain-sides, and through the dense darkness of gloomy gorges. After marching all day and nearly all night, twenty-three miles in the rain over the Alleghanies, at two o'clock on the morning of the 30th of April a picket-guard was posted, and while these watched, their weary comrades slept. The memory of this forced march became the standard of comparison for the Seventh Regiment in all its future campaigns. At an early hour of the 30th the regiment resumed its march, following the railroad four miles to Rowlesburg. This place had been defended not only with spirit but success, and after a hot skirmish the enemy's cavalry had been repulsed with loss by a detachment of the Sixth Virginia Volunteers under Maj. Showalter. Singularly enough, these troops evacuated the town soon after the enemy's departure, leaving the important railroad structures unguarded.

Up to this point the orders were to watch and follow, intercept, and, if possible, capture the enemy. The Seventh had followed close upon their heels, but naturally without gaining on them. The companies were now so disposed as best to guard the railroad bridge over Cheat River and the elaborate trestles in the vicinity, and Capt. Bennett with his company (E) was sent on a scout to St. George, twenty miles distant.

On the 1st of May, Gen. Kenly, who had left Harper's Ferry the day before, passed up the road with the First and Eighth Regiments en route for Clarksburg, whither he had been ordered to the support of Gen. Roberts' command, which was hard pressed by the enemy. Large quantities of government stores were collected at Clarksburg, it being the supply depot for all the Federal forces operating in that section of country. Gen. Kenly reached Grafton at 1 P.M., May 1st, and upon receiving information that the bridge near Bridgeport, on the Parkersburg Railroad, had been burned, and that a large force of the enemy was near that town preparing to attack Gen. Roberts, he at once pushed on to the relief of that officer and his command. On arriving at Bridgeport, at 7 P.M., it was ascertained that the Confederates had retired, having doubtless been informed by telegraph from Grafton of the approach of the Federal troops with exaggerated numbers. Gen. Kenly, however, continued his march to Clarksburg, where he arrived at midnight, much to the relief of Gen. Roberts, who no doubt would have been attacked that night but for the opportune arrival of these reinforcements. The command remained at Clarksburg, watching the movements of the enemy, who threatened the Parkersburg Railroad and Wheeling, until the 11th of May, when it marched five miles on the road to Weston, bivouacking for the night near Janelen. On the 13th it proceeded through Weston, and camped near the bridge over Stone Coal Creek, where it remained until the 23d, guarding the approaches to West Union, on the line of the Parkersburg road. On the last-mentioned date it resumed the march, and passing through Buchanan and Philippi, arrived at Webster on the 26th of May. Here the command took cars and returned to Harper’s Ferry, reoccupying the old position on Bolivar Heights. The Seventh Regiment had already returned from Rowlesburg, and on the 2d of June the Fourth Regiment came back from Oakland. Respecting the services of the Maryland Brigade in this campaign, Gen. Kelley, the division commander, in a letter to Gen. Kenly, says,—

“When the rebel Gen. Jones and Imboden, in April last, threatened to overrun the entire State of West Virginia, your prompt movement under orders to the support of Gen. Roberts at Clarksburg alone saved from destruction much valuable public property, as well as that of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Your services afterwards in aiding to drive the enemy from the State were not less valuable, and deserve great praise.”

Upon returning to Harper’s Ferry the daily routine of camp was re-established, and preparations were made for the summer campaign. About this time the Eighth Regiment was the recipient of a national ensign and a set of guidons, the gift of Marenns Denison, of Baltimore. Col. A. W. Denison presented the colors in the name of his father, and they were received on behalf of the regiment by Lieut.-Col. J. G. Johannes.

On the 30th of May the First Regiment recrossed the river and again occupied the site of the old camp on Maryland Heights. It was followed on the 9th of June by the Seventh. Company B of this regiment was still at Hagerstown, where it had been stationed since December.1

Gen. Hooker took command of the Army of the Potomac on the 26th of January, 1863, and at once proceeded to reorganize it. In his testimony before the Committee on the Conduct of the War, Gen. Hooker thus describes the condition of the army when he assumed command:

“It had recently returned from two unsuccessful efforts to cross the river and drive the enemy from his position, the first resulting so disastrously as to render a second effort soon after, even with propitious weather, almost futile. Before the second effort ended the winter rains set in, and all operations for a while were suspended, the army literally finding itself buried in mud, from which there was no hope of extrication before spring. With this prospect before it, taken in connection with the gloom and despondency that followed the disaster of Fredericksburg, the army was in a forlorn, deplorable condition. At the time the army was turned over to me desertsions were at the rate of about two hundred a day. So anxious were parents, wives, brothers, and sisters to relieve their kindred that they filled the express-trains to the army with packages of citizen clothing to assist them in escaping from service. At that time perhaps a majority of the officers, especially those in high rank, were hostile to the policy of the government in the conduct of the war. The Emancipation Proclamation had been published a short time before, and a large element of the army had taken sides antagonistic to it, declaring that they never would have embarked in the war had they anticipated this action of the government. I may also state that the moment I was placed in command I caused a return to be made of the absences of the army, and found the number to be 2922 commissioned officers and 81,961 non-commissioned officers and privates. These were scattered all over the country, and the majority were absent from causes unknown. When it was announced to me that I had been placed in command of the Army of the Potomac I doubted, and so expressed myself, if it could be saved to the country.”

Having thoroughly reorganized his army and matured his plans for a campaign against Richmond, Gen. Hooker on the 27th of April, 1863, commenced his advance, and on the 2d and 3d of May fought the

1 The Hagerstown Herald and Torch of March 25, 1863, says, “Some ten or twelve rebel guerrillas crossed the Potomac in the vicinity of Sharpsburg on Monday night, the 18th instant, and after stealing some eight or ten horses (five of which were taken from Mr. Adam Huttell, living near the Smoketown Hospital) they returned to the river at the ferry opposite Shepherdstown. The ferry is kept by two brothers named Enler, formerly citizens of Shepherdstown, and these the rebels called up and asked them to take them over the river, asserting they were Federal soldiers with important dispatches. The Enters refused to cross them, and they then theretofore fired upon the brothers, killing one of them, a young man of excellent character, while the other made his escape into the house before they had time to assassinate him. They then seized the ferry-boat and made their way over the river with a portion of their booty, several of the horses having broken away from them, and were found in the road the next morning.”
battle of Chancellorsville, in which he was defeated with dreadful loss. The Confederates under Lee gained a great victory, but this was more than counter-balanced by the death of Gen. "Stonewall" Jackson, who was mortally wounded by the fire of his own men in his attack on Howard's corps, and died on the 10th of May. His loss was irreparable, and was deeply felt throughout the South.

"After the battle of Chancellorsville, the position occupied by the enemy," says Gen. Lee, "opposite Fredericksburg being one in which he could not be attacked to advantage, it was determined to draw him from it. The execution of this purpose embraced the relief of the Shenandoah Valley from the troops that had occupied the lower part of it during the winter and spring, and, if practicable, the transfer of the scene of hostilities north of the Potomac. It was thought that the corresponding movement on the part of the enemy, to which those contemplated by us could probably give rise, might offer a fair opportunity to strike a blow at the army then commanded by Gen. Hooker, and that in any event that army would be compelled to leave Virginia, and possibly to draw to its support troops designed to operate against other parts of the country. In this way it was supposed that the enemy's plan of campaign for the summer would be broken up, and part of the season of active operations be consumed in the formation of new combinations and the preparations that they would require. In addition to these advantages, it was hoped that other valuable results might be attained by military success."

Having arranged his plan of campaign, Gen. Lee proceeded with great energy to put it into execution. The infantry were organized into three corps, under Longstreet, Ewell, and A. P. Hill, each of these corps containing three divisions, the cavalry under J. E. B. Stuart, consisting of the brigades of Fitzhugh Lee, Hampton, and W. H. F. Lee, which were concentrated at Culpeper Court-House. All his preparations having been made, on June 3, 1863, McLaws' division of Longstreet's corps left Fredericksburg for Culpeper Court-House, and Hood's division of the same corps was ordered to the same place. On the next day Ewell marched in the same direction, leaving A. P. Hill to occupy the lines at Fredericksburg. On the 11th and 12th, Hooker broke up his encampments on the line of the Rappahannock and moved cautiously northward, followed by Hill. Meanwhile Gen. Lee had continued his march to the north.

On the 14th of June, Milroy was attacked near Winchester by the Confederates under Ewell, and on the next day was defeated with the loss of nearly his whole command. After their return to Harper's Ferry, the Sixth Maryland (Federal) Regiment and Alexander's battery were permanently attached to Gen. Milroy's command in the valley, and in the defense of Berryville and Winchester bore the brunt of the heavy fighting, and suffered severely, the latter losing their guns at the battle of Winchester. The remnant of Milroy's force after this disastrous engagement retreated to Maryland Heights, where with the Maryland Brigade they strengthened the fortifications, and observed the movements of the Confederate forces.

During these operations Cole's cavalry had come in for its usual share of hard service. On the 12th of June, when Rodes' Confederate division was approaching Berryville, Company A, under Capt. Vernon, made a scout into London County to ascertain the enemy's movements. Next day it boldly attacked a superior force of Confederate infantry at Berryville, which proved to be a part of Rodes' division. The company was compelled to retreat with the loss of several men, but the object of the reconnaissance was accomplished. Having ascertained that the enemy was pushing in the direction of the Winchester and Martinsburg pike, in rear of the Union forces at Winchester, Capt. Vernon dispatched a scout through the Confederate lines to apprise Gen. Milroy of his danger. On the 14th the company skirmished all day with the enemy on the roads leading from the Potomac to Winchester.

Capt. Summers' company ran into a large body of the enemy's cavalry near Berryville. After losing one man wounded and two men captured, the company fell back to Charlestown and then to Halltown, contesting every inch of the ground, and inflicting some punishment on its pursuers.1

On the 15th of June, Vernon's company was at Charlestown and on the roads beyond, covering the retreat of remnants of Milroy's command, then endeavoring to effect their escape to Harper's Ferry. On the 16th it skirmished with the enemy's advance, then moving on the roads from Winchester to the Potomac.

1 On the night of the 15th of May, 1863, this company, numbering seventy-seven men, had been completely surprised by the enemy at Charlestown. The Confederate cavalry dismounted outside the town, and passing unobserved in squads through the company's pickets and patrols, attacked the men in their quarters. The company made a spirited resistance, but was finally overpowered, and one officer (Lieut. McKinley) and fifty-five men were forced to surrender. The lieutenant and two men were wounded. A force of Federal cavalry sent out from Winchester by Gen. Milroy to intercept and attack the enemy overtook him at Piedmont Station, in Pasquier County, on the afternoon of the 16th, and recaptured all of Capt. Summers' men except one, who was seriously wounded and left in the enemy's hands.
mac. At Charlestown, Capt. Vernon's squadron, consisting of his own and Capt. Summers' company, was summoned to surrender. To this demand Capt. Vernon responded, "I did not come to Charlestown to surrender, but to fight to the best of my ability, and I propose to do it." By skilful manœuvring he succeeded in extricating his command, and at night fell back within easy striking distance of the Federal lines at Harper's Ferry. On the 14th and 15th, Company C scouted the country from Kearneysville to Shepherdstown, Hallstown, and Harper's Ferry.

On Sunday, the 14th of June, about 4 p.m., Gen. Rodes, who had been instructed, after dislodging the force at Berryville, to cut off the communication between Winchester and the Potomac, appeared before Martinsburg, held by two regiments of infantry, Fiery's company of Maryland cavalry, and one battery of artillery, the whole commanded by Col. B. F. Smith, One Hundred and Twenty-sixth Ohio Volunteers. Gen. Jenkins, commanding the Confederate advance, demanded the surrender of the town, which was refused, and an attack was then made, which Col. Smith resisted until dark, when he began to evacuate the position. The cavalry and artillery moved towards Williamsport, and the infantry towards Shepherdstown. The enemy followed on the Williamsport road, and succeeded in capturing the battery and about seven hundred prisoners. After crossing the river at Shepherdstown, Col. Smith marched his infantry to Maryland Heights.

In this affair Capt. Fiery's company acquitted itself with its accustomed gallantry. Having skirmished nearly all day with the enemy's cavalry, it was confronted in the evening by a heavy force massed on the Winchester road to turn the right of the Federal line. With great impetuosity the enemy charged up the pike, and despite a stubborn resistance by the company and some infantry (not over one hundred in all) he pushed forward, and a running fight was kept up through the town, Capt. Fiery bravely contesting every inch of the ground. Taking the Williamsport road, the company hurried in retreat towards the river, which was crossed before midnight. Next morning learning that the enemy would cross at Dam No. 5, Capt. Fiery started for that point with twenty-five men to harass him. On the road he met a small squad of Confederate cavalry and dashed after them. He soon ran into a large force concealed behind a hill and the fences close by. In this encounter Lieut. Jacob A. Metz, of Washington County, was killed, and Capt. Fiery was taken prisoner, but soon after escaped. The rest of the detachment escaped unharmed. From this point the company kept constant watch on the enemy as far as Harrisburg, and on his return followed him back to the river, capturing nearly two hundred prisoners in the course of the campaign.

Upon receipt of the first news of the attack on Winchester every preparation was made by the garrison of Maryland Heights and Harper's Ferry to give the enemy a warm reception should he again try the stronghold which he had once assailed with success.

The fortifications were greatly strengthened, heavy and light artillery advantageously posted, and strong picket-lines established. The troops remained on the alert, performing heavy fatigue and guard duty for two weeks, with rainy days and nights disagreeably frequent.

But the attack, which was so confidently expected by the military authorities, did not occur.

On the 13th of June, when Rodes' division appeared in front of Berryville, the First and Seventh Maryland were on Maryland Heights, and the Fourth and Eighth Maryland, with Miner's Indiana Battery, under the personal direction of Gen. Kenly, occupied Bolivar Heights. With these troops Gen. Kenly strengthened the line of works on Camp Hill, between the Potomac and the Shenandoah, picketed London Heights, and reconnoitered almost daily into London County and towards and beyond Charlestown. Holding this outpost until the night of June 17th, Geo. Kenly was then ordered by Gen. Tyler (who had just arrived and assumed command, relieving Gen. Kelley) to abandon Harper's Ferry and remove his troops to Maryland Heights. At nine p.m. the command withdrew from the Virginia side (all the army stores having been previously removed from Harper's Ferry), the Eighth Maryland being the last regiment to cross.

Before daybreak of the 15th the Seventh was marched about a mile west of its camp on the heights and thrown into line with the First Maryland and the Sixth New York Artillery, its left resting on the Sharpsburg road.

The report was that the enemy had appeared on the river opposite Sharpsburg. This was the beginning of a long and exciting day. About sunrise the line was heavily reinforced, and during the day the tongue of rumor was busy with a thousand startling reports, all of which centred around the one established fact that Milroy's command at Winchester had been crushed before an overwhelming force of the enemy on their march to transfer the seat of war to the Northern States. It was with especial regret that the soldiers of the Maryland Brigade heard that their old comrades of the Sixth Maryland and Alexander's battery had shared in the general disaster.
A very gratifying incident, and one which aroused the enthusiasm of the Seventh Maryland, was the arrival this day of Company B from Hagerstown. Capt. Makeheeney had been charged with the collection of government property, and had a train of fifteen loaded wagons and about two hundred horses. By strenuous exertions he succeeded in getting all this property away in safety before the enemy crossed over from opposite Williamsport and occupied Hagerstown.

On the 16th the First and Seventh were relieved from their position of the day before and moved up to the crest of the heights. Here they were joined by the Fourth and Eighth Regiments from Bolivar Heights, and the entire brigade threw up timber breastworks and abatis.

A private letter, written by an officer of the Seventh Maryland, thus describes the condition of affairs on the heights at this time:

"Our position here is impregnable and supplies abundant. We are nearly on the summit of the heights, overlook the surrounding country for miles, cannot be taken by surprise, and cannot be whipped. Our men were never in better trim for service, confident and impatient. Although not actually engaged as yet, we have been by no means idle. It would not be proper to state what has been done towards strengthening the natural defenses of this position. Suffice it to say that we have done enough in that way to make it very desirable that we should be attacked here. All we fear is that Lee is too old and too cunning a rat to nibble at our cheese."

On the 25th of June the same correspondent wrote as follows:

"The evidences of a heavy force in front of us and around us continue to be visible. For several days past we have seen trains of wagons of almost endless length creeping along our front from left to right, and crossing the Potomac at Shepherdstown and perhaps Williamsport. Lee's headquarters are reported at Berryville, and in that direction, along the base of the Blue Ridge, we see heavy columns of dust and the smoke of camp-fires. Yesterday a train of cars arrived from Baltimore, an event which caused an agreeable excitement."

On the 27th of June, Gen. Hooker came and directed the heights to be abandoned, and orders were issued for the troops to be ready to move in light marching order at 6 A.M. of the 28th. It was intended by Gen. Hooker that the force on the heights, in conjunction with the Twelfth Corps, then in the vicinity, should march upon the enemy's line of communication at Williamsport, destroy his pontoon-bridge at that point, and stop the enormous quantities of provisions, horses, and cattle which were steadily flowing from Pennsylvania and Maryland into Virginia. But Gen. Hallock would not consent to the abandonment of the heights, and this order to march was soon countermanded.

Gen. W. H. French, a regular army officer and a Marylander, was now in command of the heights, having relieved Gen. Tyler on the 26th. His command at this time consisted of four brigades, commanded by Genns. Elliott, Morris, and Kenly and Col. Smith.

On the last day of June, after some previous preparations, Maryland Heights was evacuated. All unmovable property was rendered useless, the heavy ordnance was dismounted, and the ammunition, commissary stores, camp equipage, etc., destroyed. Some property—artillery, forage, stores, etc.—was loaded upon canal-boats for shipment to Washington via the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, under escort of Gen. Elliott's and Col. Smith's brigades, which had been specially assigned to that duty. The Sixth Maryland accompanied this force as a part of Gen. Elliott's brigade. The remainder of Gen. French's command, comprising the brigades of Genns. Kenly and Morris, marched to Frederick City.

During the evacuation of the heights rain was pouring in sheets, and the mountain roads were becoming the beds of torrents. As the Maryland Brigade moved down the mountain, it found the road blocked with wagons, and the march was interrupted at intervals of about five minutes by halts of fifteen.

An accidental explosion in the magazine of the thirty-pounder battery filled the air with fragments of shell, rock, and timber, and human bodies also. Limbs without bodies and bodies without limbs flew in all directions, and the wounded and the dead, horribly mutilated, were borne away on stretchers. There were nine killed and twelve wounded by the accident. Among the number were some members of the Sixth and Eighth Regiments.

On Monday, June 15th, Jenkins' brigade of Confederate cavalry crossed the Potomac at Williamsport without opposition, and immediately moved through Hagerstown to Green Castle, and thence to Chambersburg, Pa., arriving there on Tuesday night. No Federal troops were at either of these places to oppose this force, and its only hostile acts were the seizure of horses, cattle, and forage. Goods were purchased at the stores, and paid for in Confederate scrip.

On Tuesday afternoon, June 16th, a small force of Confederate infantry crossed the Potomac at Williamsport for the purpose of guarding the passage until the return of the cavalry expedition.

On the 17th, Jenkins, having already gathered a large number of horses and cattle from the Pennsylvania farmers, evacuated Chambersburg and retired to the vicinity of Hagerstown, there to await the arrival of the main army.1

1 On the 15th of June, the day of the dispersion of Milroy's force at Winchester, Rodes moved to Williamsport, and sent
In his official report Gen. Rodes says,—

"As soon as possible after arriving at Williamsport a strong guard was placed over it, and the necessary instructions were given to Gen. Jenkins about obtaining supplies of cattle and horses. In obedience to orders the command remained at Williamsport during the 16th, 17th, and 18th (of June), in which time, with the aid of Gen. Jenkins' cavalry, the commissaries and quartermasters obtained in a proper manner large supplies in their respective departments. The pioneers, under Capt. Chichester, were busy during our rest here trying to destroy the aqueduct over the Conococheague. Some five thousand pounds of leather were bought by Maj. Paxton at Williamsport and sent to the rear. At Hagerstown and Williamsport thirty-five kegs of powder were purchased and sent back. I may as well mention here that at Williamsport, Hagerstown, Chambersburg, etc., large quantities of such articles as were suitable for government use were obtained by purchase or certificate and sent back by Quartermasters Paxton, Rogers, and Harman. During the march into Pennsylvania some two or three thousand head of cattle were taken, and either appropriated for the command or sent to the rear for the other divisions. Some twelve or fifteen hundred were thus sent back. The horses were almost all seized by the cavalry of Gen. Jenkins, and were rarely accounted for. My best efforts were made to suppress all irregularities, and being very generally and cheerfully seconded by the officers and men, they succeeded satisfactorily. Some few cases of fraud and some (at Greensville) of violence to property—the latter traceable to the cavalry—were heard of. A few instances of forced purchases were reported, but never established. I believe that one quartermaster seized such articles as velvet, etc., but I could not find him out. In all cases of purchase that came before me the parties were fully paid and satisfied."

Upon the invasion of the State the citizens of Western Maryland were thrown into the greatest excitement. In Frederick hundreds of the citizens left the city, while many more made preparations to do so. The free negroes were thrown into the greatest perturbation, fearing that they would be carried South and sold as slaves by the Confederates. They crowded the freight-trains to Baltimore, and in a short time there was a general flight of them towards the Pennsylvania line and other directions. The government on the 15th of June removed its surplus commissary and quartermaster stores from Frederick, and cleared the hospitals of all patients who could be moved.

On the 16th of June it was reported that the Confederates were rapidly approaching Cumberland in force, whereupon a number of citizens retired hastily towards Pennsylvania. Early the next morning a small squad of men on the brow of the hill east of the city, on the Williams road, were discovered; several of Milroy's escaped cavalry advanced to ascertain who they were, and were saluted by the discharge of two small field-pieces, the shells dropping in the vicinity of McKaig's foundry, and putting the Federal scouts to flight. In a short time two Confederate soldiers rode into the town with a flag of truce, and after consultation with acting Mayor V. A. Buckey and a deputation of citizens, obtained the formal surrender of the place. About three hundred and fifty of Imboden's cavalry with two pieces of artillery soon appeared, and after securing such horses as they could find, induced some of the merchants to open their stores, paying for their purchases with Confederate money. No damage was done to either public or private property, beyond the partial destruction of the telegraph-lines. The invading force soon departed, doing no violence to any one except in the case of Griffin Twigg, Sr., living near Murley's Branch. The particulars are involved in some doubt, but the old man was killed, after having killed two of his assailants and wounded another. Gen. Kelley and staff had arrived in Cumberland from Pennsylvania on Tuesday night, and left for New Creek about the time of the arrival of Imboden's men next morning. Discovering a portion of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad turn up a short distance from the city the train returned, and proceeded over the Cumberland and Pennsylvania Railroad to Piedmont, and thence to New Creek. On the following day a force of Federal cavalry from New Creek arrived in Cumberland and captured several of Imboden's command who had remained with friends in town.

On the 24th, Gen. Ewell, with Rodes' and Johnson's divisions, had reached Chambersburg, and Early was at Greenwood. On this day Hill and Longstreet crossed the Potomac at Shepherdstown and Williamsport, and moved towards Hagerstown. The Confederate scouts penetrated as far as the line of the Susquehanna, which was defended by militia hastily summoned from Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey. Strong foraging parties were sent out, and Ewell's corps occupied Carlisle, York, and the intervening country. A force under Gen. Gordon, sent by Gen. Early from York, captured Wrightsville, on the Susquehanna, where a sharp skirmish for the possession of the bridge at that point occurred. Some Pennsylvania militia, with Capt. McGovern's company of Maryland infantry, were driven across the river, but succeeded in burning the bridge. On the 22d of June the Union army lay stretched from Leesburg, through Centreville and Gainesville, to Thoroughfare Gap and Bristoe Station.

Lee's movements had been conducted with so much skill that Gen. Hooker was kept for some time in doubt as to his real designs. Having at length learned that Lee's whole force had crossed into Maryland, on the morning of June 25th he sent over Stahil's cavalry, followed by Gen. Reynolds with the First, Third, and Eleventh Corps, at Edwards' Ferry. On the next day he crossed over with the Twelfth, Fifth, Second, and Sixth Corps, the cavalry bringing up the rear. The main army was concentrated near Frederick, while the Twelfth Corps was advanced towards the passes in the South Mountain leading to Hagers-town, and Stahil's cavalry thrown forward to scour the country in the neighborhood of Gettysburg. On the 28th, Gen. Hooker, at his request, was relieved of the command of the Army of the Potomac at Frederick, and Gen. George H. Meade was appointed in his stead. On the same day Lee, with the corps of Long-street and Hill, reached Chambersburg.

In the mean time, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad all trains ceased to be run farther than Harper's Ferry. A vast quantity of freight and locomotives were sent to Baltimore, the bridges over Patterson's Creek, Evett's Creek, North Branch, South Potomac country road, Great and Little Cacapon, and Opequon were all destroyed, and the railroad between Harper's Ferry and Cumberland was very much damaged. On June 29th telegraphic communication with the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad ceased beyond Marriottsville at an early hour, the Confederate cavalry doing much damage along the line in that vicinity. At this point, which is only thirty-one miles from Baltimore, the telegraph wires were cut, the rails torn up, bridges burned, and other damage done. The Confederates also spread themselves over Montgomery County, but for the most part abstained from plunder, except seizing all the horses they could find. A large body of cavalry also carried on their operations undisturbed at Rockville, and a small body also appeared at Colesville, a few miles from Beltsville, on the Washington Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. At Westminster, Carroll Co., a body of about one hundred of the First Delaware Regiment of Federal cavalry, being surrounded by the Confederates under Maj. Harry Gilmor, were nearly all captured, and others were chased by the Confederates beyond Pikesville, eight miles from Baltimore. A newspaper correspondent, speaking of the occupation of Westminster, says,—

"During ten days previous to July 9, 1863, this usually quiet town was the scene of the wildest excitement and unanticipated events, the people having had the opportunity of witnessing warlike measures in a manner quite new to them, experiencing some of its horrors in their own streets that before they had only read of elsewhere."

"On Sunday morning, June 28th, the citizens and the congregations at the different churches were considerably startled by a squad of cavalry suddenly rushing into town, and as a Confederate raid had for some time been anticipated, many readily supposed it to be their advance. They, however, prove to be a portion of the First Delaware Cavalry, about one hundred and fifteen strong, under command of Maj. N. B. Knight, who had been detailed for special duty at this place. Late on Sunday evening some of the pickets who had been stationed on the different roads leading into town came hurrying in, reporting the advance of a heavy Confederate force from the direction of Littlestown, and soon all were in the saddle, and repaired to a position a short distance below town, and within reach of reinforcements, to await events. The alarm, however, proved causeless, and within a few hours they returned and quiet was again restored."

"About four o'clock on Monday afternoon, however, affairs assumed a more serious aspect. A number of rebel cavalry dashed suddenly into the east end of town, and succeeded in capturing three of the Delaware boys, who were having their horses shod at a blacksmith-shop. Information being at once taken to their camp, they immediately started in pursuit, superseding the Confederate force to be merely a small raid; in this they were mistaken, as it proved to be the brigades of Fitzhugh Lee and Stuart. They met the advance at the junction of the Washington road, and actually held them in check for a few moments, fighting most desperately, being armed as they were with only revolvers and sabres; but observing the overpowering numbers which menaced them, they retired. Their loss was two privates killed and some five or six wounded, and, as far as we can learn, some thirty captured. The rebel loss was two lieutenants killed and some eight wounded. Too much praise cannot be bestowed upon this more handful of men for their bravery in this attack. Lieutenant Bowman, the provost-marshal, with twelve of his men were soon after captured, only two making their escape.

The Confederates immediately afterwards occupied the town. In some cases Confederate scrip was offered in payment, and in others no equivalent whatever was made. Several citizens were arrested, some of whom were paroled, while others were taken with them. A large number of horses were taken off with them, and the merchants suffered heavily. Some few private residences were searched by them, but with there exceptions private property was not molested.

"Their force was variously estimated at from five to eight thousand, the greater portion of which made no halt, but pushed steadily forward. By seven o'clock on Tuesday morning the rear-guard passed out of the west end of town, and simultaneously Gen. Gregg with a brigade of Federal cavalry entered at the east end. Advance-guards were thrown out by the Federals, and some twenty strugglers of the Confederates captured, among whom was the clerk of Gen. Lee. The cavalry followed close upon the heels of the Confederates in the direction of Littlestown, and had hardly cleared the town when the advance of Gen. Sedgwick's Sixth Army Corps entered the town, and continued passing through until a late hour in the evening. The number composing the corps was quite large and appeared very formidable. The Confederates mostly were jaded and fatigued, while the Federal troops exhibited the very best of spirits. The citizens without exception tendered to them the kindest bas-pitalities, for which all appeared greatly thankful, many of them offering payment for the most trifling articles.

On Wednesday the citizens enjoyed a rather quiet day, but few incidents transpiring to remind them of the close proximity to the opposing armies, until the afternoon, when heavy cannonading was heard in the direction of Gettysburg, where a most sanguinary contest was raging. On Thursday the wagen-trains from the different army corps began to arrive under heavy escort, and to encamp in the fields in and around town, and it was soon ascertained that this place was to be a grand centre for supplies, as the government had taken possession of the railroad for the emergency, and trains were running day and night. During the balance of the week the streets presented a continual mass of moving wagons, horses, and train-guards, with all the paraphernalia requisite for a large army passing and re-passing. Headquarters of the different departments were established, and for the time all business was suspended. Little moment was heard during this time from the opposing armies in front, save by the large numbers of rebel prisoners arriving, and a considerable number of sick and wounded which arrived during Friday. Hospitals were hastily and temporarily established at the Union church, and the large school-house near it, and also on the Catholic chapel grounds, where the patients received all the time and care the citizens could bestow. Quite a number were sent to Baltimore on Sunday evening, where they received more prompt and necessary attention.

Orders were received from headquarters on Saturday evening, July 4th, for a removal from here to Gettysburg, and a movement was at once commenced, the trains leaving in an almost unbroken line. Subsequently orders for a portion of the troops and trains to remove to Middletown and Frederick were received, and during Sunday night and Monday morning many moved in that direction, rather indicating an attempt of the rebels to retreat towards the Potomac. On Tuesday afternoon Lieut.-Col. Butler, provost-marshal, with his guard left for the front, and with the exception of a small number of sick and wounded and a few stragglers, the town, after a week's occupation, once more assumed its usual quiet serenity. The streets were rendered almost impassable by the recent rains and extraordinary travel.

All the operations of the Confederate cavalry were under the direction of Stuart, who had crossed the Potomac from Loudon County, Va., into Montgomery County, Md., pushed through Rockville, crossing the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad at Marriottsville, and passed up through Carroll by Westminster to Carlisle, in Pennsylvania. His flanking and scouting parties extended over a wide stretch of country on each side of his line of march, and spread terror and confusion by the impression this produced of the presence of overpowering forces.

Gens. Hill and Longstreet on the 29th moved towards Gettysburg from Chambersburg, and Ewell was directed to march from Carlisle to the same place. These marches were conducted slowly, the position of Gen. Meade being unknown, and Gen. Lee, in the absence of any information from Stuart, his cavalry leader, did not know that the Federal army was so near him. The concentration of Lee's army was so admirably ordered that Ewell from Carlisle, Early from York, and Hill from Chambersburg all reached Gettysburg within a few hours of each other on July 1st.

Although the change of command in the Army of the Potomac was made on the march, and almost in the very face of the enemy, it caused no hindrance to the onward movement, no loss of confidence on the part of the army. The appointment of Gen. Meade was received with unusual satisfaction, and under his leadership the veteran troops hurried forward to meet the Confederate forces. The Federal army was put in motion on the 29th of June, and on the night of the 30th, after two days' marching, Gen. Meade arrived at Taneytown; the First Corps was at Marsh Run, near Gettysburg, the Second at Uniontown, the Third at Bridgeport, the Fifth at Union Mills, the Sixth at Manchester, the Eleventh at Emmitsburg, supporting the First at Marsh Run, and the Twelfth at Littlestown. The cavalry was kept well to the front and on both flanks, and the night of the 30th found Gamble's and Devin's brigades of Buford's division at Gettysburg, Gregg's division at Manchester, and Kilpatrick's division at Hanover.

Gettysburg, the capital of Adams County, Pa., at which the two armies were soon to meet in the most desperate and best-fought battle of the war, lies on the northern slope of a gentle eminence known as Cemetery Hill. On the west of the town, one mile distant, is another eminence called Oak, or Seminary Ridge. This ridge slopes to the west into a little open valley of plowed fields and meadows, interspersed with clumps of timber. Beyond this valley is another ridge, thickly wooded, along the western base of which flows Willoughby Run. The distance between these two ridges is one-half mile. Southeast from Cemetery Hill, between the Baltimore turnpike and Rock Creek, is Culp's Hill, and beyond the creek in that direction is Wolf's Hill, a rugged wooded eminence. Between these two hills, extending from the Baltimore pike to Rock Creek, is Spangler's meadow, partially wooded. Spangler's spring lies near the eastern debouch of this swale. Two miles southwest of Cemetery Hill is a knob of considerable elevation, called Round Top, and adjoining it on the north, with only a narrow valley intervening, is a rocky hill of less altitude called Little Round Top. This extends in diminished altitude to Zeigler's grove, on Cemetery Ridge, the general name for the entire eminence lying between Little Round Top and Cemetery Hill proper. North of the town the country is a rolling plain. Beginning on the right at Culp's Hill, as one faces the north, and bending around Cemetery Hill and following the ridge south to Round Top is a distance of four miles. The whole ridge is shaped somewhat like a fish-hook, the barb being Culp's Hill, and the shank ending in the rocky peak of Round Top. In the town a number of roads converge, making it easy of access from every direction. Here on the 1st, 2d, and 3d of July was fought the great battle of Gettysburg, in which the Confederacy virtually received its death-blow.

In this, as in all the great contests of the war, the sons of Maryland, under either flag, bore a distinguished part. The Second Maryland Confederate Infantry, under Lieut.-Col. James R. Herbert, which was the pride and the boast of the Confederate army, made an assault on the Federal breastworks on Culp's Hill. On the first day it captured the first line of works, but on the next, in attempting to storm the hill in the face of heavy masses of infantry and artillery, they were compelled to fall back with heavy loss. Nearly all the commissioned officers were killed or wounded, and of the five hundred of the command who went into the fight only two hundred escaped unhurt.

In this terrible conflict the commander of the Chesapeake Maryland Artillery, Capt. William H. Brown, was killed. Capt. Dement's battery of First Maryland Artillery also suffered greatly. On the Federal side, Col. Maulsby's First Potomac Home Brigade displayed conspicuous gallantry, and suffered severely in killed and wounded. When the invasion commenced this command was stationed on the lower Potomac, and on the 17th of June, the very day that Jenkins' cavalry entered Chambersburg, Pa., Gen. Lockwood received orders to move all his forces to Baltimore, and in obedience to these orders they were immediately concentrated at Point Lookout. The First Potomac Home Brigade, under Col. Maulsby, was put on board the steamer "John A. Warner" early on the morning of June 21st, and landing at Baltimore about noon, immediately marched to Druid Hill Park, where it bivouacked for the night. The regiment remained in Baltimore until the 25th, when Gen. Lockwood received orders to march his command, consisting of the First Potomac Home Brigade, First Eastern Shore and One Hundred and Fiftieth New York Volunteers, to Monocacy Junction, for assignment to the Army of the Potomac. Col. Maulsby's regiment, in company with the One Hundred and Fiftieth New York, left Baltimore during the afternoon, and on the 27th reached Monocacy Junction, where it passed the 28th, moving thence on the 29th to Boyd's Lot, north of Frederick. Leaving the latter place on the morning of the 30th, in the midst of a rain-storm, the First took up the line of march towards Pennsylvania, reaching Bruceville late in the evening. The next morning the men were astir at early light, and soon the regiment was again upon the march, hurryng on through Taneytown towards Gettysburg. That night it bivouacked near Two Taverns, on the Baltimore pike, about four miles from Gettysburg. While on the march this day sounds of the battle between the Union advance and that of the Confederates could be distinctly heard, and late in the afternoon the wounded, on foot and in ambulances, carriages, and every kind of vehicle that could be used, were met coming from that desperate encounter.

At 2.30 A.M. of July 2d the regiment was moved to the front, and at 8 A.M. was placed in position, with Ruger's first division of the Twelfth Corps, along the west bank of Rock Creek, near McAllister's mill. Here the regiment threw up breastworks of rails and earth, behind which it remained until six in the evening, when the brigade, consisting of the First Potomac Home Brigade and One Hundred and Fiftieth New York (the First Eastern Shore not having yet arrived), was ordered to the left of the Union line, then the scene of a heavy action. Lockwood's brigade led the advance of the reinforcements sent from the Twelfth Corps, and upon reaching the summit of Cemetery Ridge was immediately formed in two lines, the First Potomac Home Brigade in front. With a shout of defiance the brigade rushed down the declivity, and sweeping obliquely to the left across the plain, aind a most terrific fire of artillery and musketry, continued its rapid advance without pause until it reached the vicinity of Sherfy's peach-orchard, where the severest contest of the day had occurred. Before this impetuous charge the enemy fell back, leaving his dead and wounded within the Federal lines. Reaching the line originally held by the Third Corps, the men of the First Potomac Home Brigade raised a shout of triumph which rang through the valley and over the hills, and it was with the utmost difficulty they could be restrained from following the enemy farther. While advancing the First Regiment recovered from the enemy three guns of Bigelow's Massachusetts battery that had been lost during the fearful onset of the Confederates. After dark the regiment returned by a circuitous route to the Baltimore pike, near the cemetery, where the men stretched their weary limbs to rest, and slept regardless of the skirmishing of the pickets, which was kept up, with brief intermissions, all night. Before daybreak of the 3d, Col. Maulsby was ordered to post his regiment in position to support Knapp's Pennsylvania battery, posted on a slight ridge west of the Baltimore pike and opposite Spangler's house.

At daylight the artillery opened a rapid fire, which was continued for more than an hour. But, although severe, it failed to dislodge the enemy, who still held the captured breastworks. At about six o'clock orders were given Col. Maulsby's regiment to advance across Spangler's meadow and carry the position held by the enemy at the base of Culp's Hill, near Spangler's spring. It seemed certain destruction, but such were the orders, and Col. Maulsby gave the command, "Forward, double quick!" With deafening cheers the line sprang forward and advanced as rapidly as the nature of the ground would allow. Maj. Steiner, with the left wing of the regiment, moved directly through a tongue of woods jutting out from Culp's Hill, and extending half-way across the meadow, while the right wing, under Col. Maulsby, advanced across the open swale, and then into the woods. From behind every tree and rock the enemy's fire was poured in, but the regiment with undaunted courage pushed forward towards the stone wall, from which the adversary sent death-dealing missiles. The fire of his sharpshooters, posted in trees on the other side of the creek, was also very close and annoying. Already many had fallen and the regiment seemed devoted to destruction, but onward it went, its officers leading and cheering the men. Gaining a position within twenty yards of the stone wall, and while preparing for a final charge, orders were given for the regiment to return to the turnpike, as a movement of another regiment on the enemy's flank would expose it to an enfilading fire from its friends. Collecting its dead and wounded, the regiment retired to an orchard near the pike, where it was held in reserve for a short time. During the charge at Spangler's spring, Company I, under Capt. Walter Saunders, had a lively skirmish with the enemy at Culp's Hill. After resting in the orchard until about nine o'clock the regiment was advanced to the front on Culp's Hill, where it occupied rifle-pits and engaged the enemy. Here, too, it fought earnestly and bravely, and not a man faltered or displayed the least sign of fear. Its loss in this last engagement was severe, but the heaviest loss was sustained at Spangler's spring. Among the killed were Lt. James T. Smith, Company C, and Lt. John S. Willman, Company D. In the action at Culp's Hill, Lt. Charles E. Eader, Company I, was killed. These officers were all citizens of Frederick County. Lt. Smith was a young lawyer of Frederick City, and one of the editors of the "Maryland Union." Lt. Eader, also of Frederick City, was an educated mechanic of brave and generous impulses. Lt. Willman, who was from Mechanicsburg, was a young officer of great gallantry, accomplishments, and promise.

The total loss of the regiment at Gettysburg was three officers and twenty-two enlisted men killed or mortally wounded, three officers and sixty-nine men wounded, and one man missing. Capt. Joseph Groff, Company B, Lieut. George H. Wain, Company C, and Lieut. Frank H. Hardesty, Company G, were among the wounded.1

During the night of the 3d the regiment lay in the works near its original position at McAllister's mill, on Rock Creek.

On the 4th of July, Lee took a position to receive an attack, but as Meade showed no disposition to disturb him, he began to retreat on the night of the 4th, and reached Hagerstown on the 6th and 7th. Finding the river too full to cross, he took up a position covering the Potomac from Williamsport to Falling Waters. While at Hagerstown he issued the following address to his army:

"Headquarters Army of Northern Virginia,
July 11, 1863.

"General Orders No. 16:

"After long and trying marches, endured with the fortitude that has ever characterized the soldiers of the Army of Northern Virginia, you have penetrated to the country of our enemies, and recalled to the defense of their own soil those who were engaged in the invasion of ours. You have fought a fierce and sanguinary battle, which, if not attended with the success that has hitherto crowned your efforts, was marked by the same heroic spirit that has commanded the respect of your enemies, the gratitude of your country, and the admiration of mankind.

"Once more you are called upon to meet the enemy from whom you won, on so many fields, names that will never die. Once more the eyes of your countrymen are turned upon you. Again do wives and sisters, fathers and mothers, helpless children lean for defense on your strong arms and brave hearts. Let every soldier remember that on his courage and fidelity depend all that makes life worth having,—the freedom of his country, the honor of his people, and the security of his home. Let each heart grow strong in the remembrance of our glorious past, and in the thought of the inestimable blessings for which we contend: and, invoking the assistance of that benign power which has so signally blessed our former efforts, let us go forth in confidence to secure the peace and safety of our country. Soldiers, your old enemy is before you. Win from him honor worthy of your right cause, worthy of your comrades dead on so many illustrious fields.

"R. E. Lee,
"General Commanding."

The pursuit by the Union army is thus stated by Gen. Meade in his report:

1 Those killed or mortally wounded in the First Potomac Home Brigade at Gettysburg were, Company A, John J. Farling; B, Alpheus Hesson, John W. Stoeckman; C, Thomas Vance, Henry Miller; D, Stephen Ford; E, Teater French; F, Philip Warner, John Conner, H. H. Hurtman, George Must; G, David Krebs, Silas Frazell, Peter L. Miller, Uriah Egle; H, George H. Barger, Andrew Cowell; I, Joseph Ballis, Daniel Kernes, K, John H. Brose, George G. Lowrey, and Daniel Zerburt.
"The 5th and 6th of July were employed in succoring the wounded and burying the dead. Maj.-Gen. Sedgwick, commanding the Sixth Corps, having pushed the pursuit of the enemy as far as the Fairfield Pass, in the mountains, and reporting that the pass was a very strong one, in which a small force of the enemy could hold in check and delay for a considerable time any pursuing force, I determined to follow the enemy by a flank movement, and accordingly, leaving McIntosh's brigade of cavalry and Neil's brigade of infantry to continue harassing the enemy, put the army in motion for Middletown, Md. Orders were immediately sent to Maj.-Gen. French at Frederick to reconnoiter Harper's Ferry, and send a force to occupy Turner Pass, in South Mountain. I subsequently ascertained Maj.-Gen. French had not only anticipated these orders in part, but had pushed a cavalry force to Williamsport and Falling Waters, where they destroyed the enemy's pontoon-bridge and captured its guard. Buford was at the same time sent to Williamsport and Hagerstown. The duty above assigned to the cavalry was most successfully accomplished, the enemy being greatly harassed, his trains destroyed, and many captures of guns and prisoners made. After halting a day at Middletown to procure necessary supplies and bring up the trains, the army moved through the South Mountain, and by July 12th was in front of the enemy, who occupied a strong position on the heights of Marsh Run, in advance of Williamsport. In taking this position several skirmishes and affairs had been had with the enemy, principally by the cavalry and the Eleventh and Sixth Corps. The 13th was occupied in reconnaissances of the enemy's position and preparations for attack, but on advancing on the morning of the 14th it was ascertained he had retired the night previous by a bridge at Falling Waters and the ford at Williamsport. The cavalry in pursuit overtook the rear-guard at Falling Waters, capturing two guns and numerous prisoners."

Speaking of the recrossing of the Potomac by the Confederate army, John Esten Cooke, in his "Life of Gen. Lee," says, "Towards dawn on the 14th the army commenced moving, in the midst of a violent rainstorm, across the river at both points, and Lee, sitting his horse upon the river's bank, superintended the operation, as was his habit on occasions of emergency. Loss of rest and fatigue, with that feeling of suspense unavoidable under the circumstances, had impaired the energies of even his superb physical constitution. As the bulk of the rear-guard of the army safely passed over the shaky bridge, which Lee had looked at with some anxiety as it swayed to and fro, lashed by the current, he uttered a sigh of relief, and a great weight seemed taken from his shoulders. Seeing his fatigue and exhaustion, Gen. Stuart gave him some coffee. He drank it with avidity, and declared, as he handed back the cup, that nothing had ever refreshed him so much." The last of the Confederate troops did not cross the river at the bridge until 1 P.M. on the 14th, and in the skirmish of the rear-guard with the Federal cavalry the gallant Pettigrew fell, who had supported Pickett in the great charge at Gettysburg, where in spite of a painful wound he had done all in his power to rally his troops.

"The pursuit," says Gen. Meade, "was renewed by a flank movement, the army crossing the Potomac at Berlin and moving down the London Valley. The cavalry were immediately pushed into the several passes of the Blue Ridge, and having learned from scouts the withdrawal of the Confederate army from the lower valley of the Shenandoah, the army, the Third Corps, Maj.-Gen. French, in advance, was moved into the Manassas Gap, in the hope of being able to intercept a portion of the enemy. The possession of the gap was disputed so successfully as to enable the rear-guard to withdraw by way of Strasburg, the Confederate army retiring to the Rapidan. A position was taken up with this army on the line of the Rappahannock, and the campaign terminated about the close of July."

The organizations from Maryland actually engaged on the Federal side in the battle of Gettysburg were the First Cavalry, Company A, Purnell's Legion, Cole's battalion of cavalry (in detached bodies, as guides, orderly, etc.), Rigby's battery, First Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, First Eastern Shore Infantry, and the Third Infantry.

The First Cavalry, under Lieut.-Col. Deems, with McIntosh's first brigade of Gregg's (second) cavalry division, broke camp at Aldie on the 26th of June, and marched to Leesburg, covering the rear of the army advancing into Maryland. Thus was commenced that series of rapid, continuous, and exhausting marches which brought it upon the field of Gettysburg, and continued with scarcely an intermission until the opposing armies were once again confronting each other on the line of the Rappahannock. In the pursuit of the Confederates after the battle of Gettysburg, the First Maryland Cavalry did valuable service, capturing many stragglers, participating in a skirmish near Emmitsburg, in which one man was wounded, and encountering the enemy in a spirited engagement on the 10th of July at Old Antietam Forge.

On the 5th of July the First Potomac Home Brigade, whose gallant conduct at the battle of Gettysburg has already been described, started with the army in pursuit of the enemy, marching, via Little town, Frederick City, and Crampton's Gap, to the neighborhood of Bakersville, where it arrived on the 10th, threw up breastworks, and remained four days. Advancing on the 14th, the enemy's works were found deserted. On the 16th the regiment reached Sandy Hook, where its connection with the Army of the Potomac ceased.

In this campaign the officers and men of the First Potomac Home Brigade were subjected to the severest hardships, besides trials and dangers of every description, yet throughout the trying ordeal all behaved with a nobility of spirit well worthy of record. Each and every one seemed aware of the great issues involved and the importance of the struggle in which they were engaged. From the time the regiment left Baltimore, on the 25th of June, until it reached Sandy Hook, on the 16th of July, it marched more than one hundred and fifty miles, engaged the enemy on three occasions at Gettysburg, built breastworks and other fortifications, suffered great hardships of every character, and under all circumstances exhibited the greatest fortitude and courage.

On the 19th of June the Second Potomac Home Brigade was ordered, with the First Virginia Volunteers and a section of artillery, to Cumberland. On the 6th of July, Gen. Kelley, who was in command, moved these forces from Cumberland to co-operate with the Army of the Potomac, then in pursuit of the Confederates. The Second Potomac Home Brigade was attached to Col. Mulligan's regiment, Department of West Virginia. Leaving Cumberland at 9.30 A.M., July 6th, Col. Bruce marched his regiment, the Second Potomac Home Brigade, eastward over the National pike. One mile from Cumberland, Company B, Capt. Morrow, was detailed to return to town and proceed down the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, for the purpose of repairing the telegraph-line along that route. At 6 P.M., the regiment halted for the night at Gilpintown. Marching all day of the 7th, and until 2.30 A.M. of the 8th, it reached a point one mile east of Hancock. After daylight the regiment returned one mile west of Hancock, where it encamped through the night, and where it was joined by Company B. Continuing the movement eastward, the Second bivouacked the night of the 10th at Indian Spring, and the night following at Clear Spring, where it remained until the 14th, when the march was renewed to Williamsport, at which place a junction was effected with Gen. Meade's army.

The Confederate army having retired into Virginia, Gen. Kelley's command on the 15th of July moved to Cherry Run, where it crossed the Potomac and advanced to Hedgesville, where skirmishing with the enemy was maintained until the 20th. During the night Gen. Kelley learned through a loyal citizen of Martinsburg that the enemy in force was moving on his rear, and immediately retreated into Maryland. The enemy approached and threw a few shells across the river, but soon withdrew. At North Mountain, during the advance into Virginia, the Second Potomac Home Brigade supported a heavy skirmish line. On the 24th of July the regiment again crossed the river with Gen. Kelley's command, and marched to Hedgesville. Leaving this place on the 1st of August, it arrived at New Creek on the 7th, having marched via Shanghai, Pughston, Great Cacapon Bridge, Blue's Gap, Romney, Mechanesburg Gap, and Burlington. At New Creek the Second remained some time, performing heavy guard and picket duty, also furnishing escorts to government supply trains to Romney and Petersburgh. The frequent details for this service allowed little or no respite from duty.

The Third Potomac Home Brigade Infantry, commanded by Col. W. Gilpin, embarked on transports at Annapolis, June 27th, and moved to Baltimore, whence it proceeded next day by rail to Elysville, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Two important iron bridges, crossing the Patapsco at this point, were threatened with destruction by Stuart's cavalry, then advancing on the right flank of the Army of the Potomac towards Pennsylvania. The preservation of these bridges was of great importance to the government, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad being the principal route of supply and communication between Washington, Baltimore, and Gen. Meade's army. The service, therefore, rendered by the Third at Elysville and vicinity, although not of a nature involving much personal danger or hardship, like that in the field, was of vast importance, and the most valuable of all the railroad arteries upon which the Union army depended for supplies was successfully guarded at this vital point. The regiment, with detachments posted at different stations from Elicott's Mills to the Monocacy Junction, remained on railroad guard duty during the ensuing fall and winter and the following spring.

As has already been stated, Vernon and Summer's companies of Cole's cavalry crossed the Potomac from Virginia into Maryland at Harper's Ferry on the 16th of June. Next day White's battalion of Confederate cavalry (mostly Marylanders) made the passage of the river at Point of Rocks and captured a small squad of Mean's Virginia (Union) cavalry. It afterwards intercepted a train of freight-cars, and captured a number of men belonging to Alexander's battery en route from Harper's Ferry to Baltimore. They were all sent South as prisoners of war. Vernon's and Summer's companies, while marching from Harper's Ferry to Point of Rocks, for the purpose of guarding the fords of the Potomac, encountered White's command at Catoctin Creek. Mistaking the enemy for friends, both companies were at first surprised and thrown into confusion by his attack, but after the loss of a few men they rallied and drove back the foe, capturing one prisoner. In Capt. Summer's company one man (Joseph L. Michael) was killed, three wounded, and four captured. Capt. Vernon also lost several men taken prisoners. On the 18th of June three of Summer's men, sent with some of Vernon's company on a scout to Frederick, were captured in the town after a lively resistance. Summer's company then went to Berlin, where it remained until the 30th of June, on which date it moved by way of Maryland Heights to Frederick City. At this place it was employed in scouting through the surrounding country and doing patrol duty in the city. Two of its members (couriers) were captured near Emmittsburg on the 5th of July by Stuart's cavalry. Meantime, from the 18th to the 21st of June, Companies A, C, and D of Cole's battalion were kept constantly in motion watching the movements of the Confederate army. The former operated east of the mountains, and the two latter on the west. As a central point from which to direct the movements of his command, Maj. Cole established his headquarters at Burkettsville. On the 22d, Company A, Capt. Vernon, numbering but thirty men, entered Frederick by the Manor road, and dashing along Market and Patrick Streets, drove out the First Maryland (Confederate) Cavalry Battalion, commanded by Maj. Harry Gilmor. Boldly charging through the streets, Company A, with Lieut. Link leading the advance, pushed the enemy beyond the city limits on the Hagerstown road. Discovering a larger force outside the city preparing to re-enter, Capt. Vernon prudently withdrew his company towards Point of Rocks. One of the Confederates was badly wounded and taken prisoner. He was paroled and left in the hospital. This brilliant dash was executed amid the plaudits of the parents, wives, and friends of many of the men. While the bullets whistled, these patriotic friends waved their handkerchiefs and cheered the men on to victory. Next day the entire battalion, under Maj. Cole, moved on a reconnaissance over South Mountain to Boonsboro'. On the 24th it skirmished with the enemy's column advancing into Pennsylvania, and captured quite a number of prisoners. From this point Company C, Lieut. W. A. Homer, pushed forward on the right flank of the Confederate army, through Wolfsville and Sabillasville, into Pennsylvania, making some effective dashes at the enemy and capturing a number of prisoners, among them a bearer of dispatches from Gen. Lee to Gen. Ewell. At Fountaintdale, on the 28th of June, it had a lively skirmish with a small body of the enemy's cavalry, capturing the lieutenant in command, three sergeants, and eight privates, with their arms and equipments and twenty horses. Companies A and D had returned from Boonsboro' to Knoxville, where they were rejoined on the 30th of June by Company C. On the 1st of July these companies established camp at Frederick, where they performed provost duty and operated in different directions as occasion required through the month of July. On the 4th of July a squad of the enemy's cavalry, which dashed into Frederick on the Harper's Ferry road, was driven back and pursued to Knoxville by the battalion. Next day it drove a party of Confederates from Sandy Hook across the bridge at Harper's Ferry and burnt the bridge.

From the time the enemy entered until he withdrew from the State, many of Maj. Cole's command, both officers and men, were detailed as guides, couriers, etc., to the various corps commanders of the Army of the Potomac. In this capacity they rendered most valuable service, their familiarity with the country being thus turned to good account.

After the evacuation of Maryland Heights by the Maryland Brigade, as described at the beginning of the Maryland and Pennsylvania campaign, it proceeded to Frederick City, where it arrived on the afternoon of July 1st. The command bivouacked just outside the city in a clover-field, with the exception of the Seventh Regiment, which, having had the advance on the march, was detailed for picket duty. Next day, July 2d, the great battle of the war raged at Gettysburg, within hearing of the troops at Frederick, and Gen. French, commanding the Federal forces, fully appreciated the responsibility of his position. On the morning of that day he issued a ringing order, concluding with the announcement that "any officer, no matter how high his rank, or soldier who fails to do his duty at this moment will be made to suffer death under immediate trial before a Drum-Head Court." Gen. French followed this up in a way that showed he meant business. He visited the outposts and camps, found fault with everything, reprimanded everybody, and put under arrest men and officers of all grades. Upon the whole, it had a capital effect.

At night the Seventh was relieved on picket by the Eighth, and the next morning the entire force was paraded through town in column of platoons (equalized), field-music playing, on the march to Monocacy Junction. The brigade never appeared to better advantage.

At the corner of Market and Patrick Streets the column passed Gen. French in review, and at all points was loudly cheered. When Gen. Meade ordered the evacuation of Maryland Heights, he directed Gen. French to march his column rapidly northward and unite with the main army. He was, however, subsequently directed to hold Frederick, camping his troops in the immediate vicinity, to guard the rail and turnpike bridges over the Monocacy. He was further directed to guard the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad from Frederick to a junction with Gen. Schenck, and in the event of the Federal army being compelled to retire before the enemy, to fall back into the defenses of Washington. At Monocacy Junction the brigade guarded the bridges over the Monocacy and the approaches from Nolan's and other ferries of the Potomac, and kept open the line of communication between Washington and Meade's army.

Soon the news of a victory at Gettysburg flew like wildfire. There was, however, no time for a Fourth of July celebration. All was activity and vigilance, constant marching and countermarching, posting of pickets and calling them in again, and hourly expectation of something important to happen. During the afternoon of the 4th the brigade was countermarched back to its old bivouac on Rizer's farm, west of Frederick, on the Harper's Ferry road.

At reveille on the morning of the 6th, when the men paraded for roll-call, they descried an object swinging from the limb of a tree in an adjoining field. It was soon learned that it was the body of an alleged Confederate spy, caught with the evidences in his boots, and hung by order of Gen. John Buford, who commanded a brigade of Union cavalry, which had arrived during the night from Gettysburg. The deceased was recognized as a visitor to the camps of the Maryland Brigade on Maryland and Bolivar Heights, offering various small articles for sale, and getting up ornamented company rolls.

On the afternoon of the 6th of July, Gen. Kenly was ordered to march with the First, Fourth, and Eighth Regiments and Miner's Indiana battery to retake and occupy Maryland Heights. Starting immediately, and making a forced march, Gen. Kenly reached Knoxville early next morning. It was here learned that the enemy was in full possession of Harper's Ferry, and engaged in repairing the railroad bridge, which had been partially destroyed by Cole's cavalry the day previous, and that they had been and were still employed in collecting the ammunition and stores which were left on the evacuation of the heights.

Upon receiving this information Gen. Kenly pushed forward, and when the column reached the mouth of Pleasant Valley, he detached Lieut.-Col. Wilson, with the First Maryland, instructing him to ascend the heights by way of the eastern slope, and to carry and hold them.

Gen. Kenly then moved with two companies of the Fourth Maryland, followed by the remainder of the Fourth and Eighth Regiments, by the road leading along the canal.

As the advance-guard neared the bridge they found the road obstructed, and the enemy at the same time opened upon them a sharp fire. The advance immediately dashed forward in gallant style, turned the point of the precipice which abuts on the road, and, taking cover, by their rapid firing soon materially lessened that of their opponents.

The balance of the command was then brought up the road and placed in position on the western slopes of the mountain. A section of Miner's battery was also placed in position on the points of the heights overlooking Harper's Ferry, and a few well-directed shots soon dispersed a body of Confederate cavalry which made its appearance on Bolivar Heights.

About this time a detachment of troops, with several pieces of light artillery, mounted on an iron-plated car, under command of Lieut. John R. Meigs, U.S.A., which had been sent up from Baltimore by Maj.-Gen. Schenck, arrived, and assisted in silencing the Confederate sharpshooters, who were annoying the Federal column from the Virginia side of the river.

The heights gained, a picket-line was at once established, extending from the river to Solomon's Gap, and before dark several squads of the enemy's cavalry came down the road from Sharpsburg and the Shepherdstown ferry; but after remaining a short time, and being apparently surprised at finding the position occupied by Federal troops, they withdrew.

The great importance of this movement may be more fully appreciated on reading the following acknowledgment from Gen. French:

"HEADQUARTERS THIRD ARMY CORPS, " Jan. 22, 1864.

"BRIG.-GEN. JOHN R. KENLY,

"COMMANDING THIRD DIVISION FIRST ARMY CORPS:

"GENERAL,—My sudden and unexpected transfer to the command of the Third Army Corps prevented me from making the recognition of the important services of yourself and the Maryland Brigade, under your command, to which you and it are eminently entitled.

"The fact that Maryland Heights had been reoccupied after a forced march, surprising the enemy and compelling him to abandon the bridge-head and the heights, is a part of the history of the Gettysburg campaign of which you and your troops may be justly proud.

"I am, general,

"Very truly yours,

"W. H. FRENCH, Maj.-Gen. Volts."

When Gen. Kenly started from Frederick the Seventh Regiment was on picket, and did not accompany the brigade. As soon as the Seventh was relieved by its namesake, the Seventh New York Militia, it marched back and rejoined the brigade on Maryland Heights. At an early hour on the 10th of July the brigade left the heights in the care of the Ninth and Tenth Maryland Regiments, which had arrived from Baltimore, and moved out through Pleasant Valley, passing Locust Grove and Rohrsersville, to a point near Boonsboro', where it arrived at nine P.M. The march was directly towards the sound of cannon, which was heard early in the day. It was necessarily a forced march, and the day becoming excessively hot, there was much straggling from sheer exhaustion. Men dragged themselves along until they dropped down in their tracks.

Next day the brigade was assigned to the First Corps, and became the Third Brigade of its Third Division. Gen. John Newton commanded the corps, Gen. Kenly the division, and Col. Dushane, of the First Regiment, the brigade.

On the following day (July 12th), about noon, the corps moved from Beaver Creek, through Funkstown, which Lee's army had evacuated in the morning, and took position fronting the enemy's line, formed on the south of the town, and extending from Falling Waters, on the Potomac, along the Salisbury Ridge to the Conococheague, six miles west of Hagerstown.

All this day the rain poured, and the fields were heavy with the tenacious clay of this limestone country, so that the order, "Close up, men; close up your files," was constantly in the mouth of every officer from colonel to file-closers.

Suddenly the sharp crack of rifles and whistle of bullets indicated the immediate presence of the foe. The men of the Maryland Brigade closed up with a spring and formed in line. Skirmishers were advanced across the fields towards the Sharpsburg and Hagers-town pike, held by the enemy, and a lively fire was kept up until after dark. Just about dark the brigade skirmish line went forward with a rush and cleared the enemy out of Stover's barn, from which their fire had been somewhat annoying.

Skirmishing was renewed with daylight of the 13th, and for some time became quite brisk. About five o'clock Private Scofill, of Company I, Seventh Maryland, was sent to the rear in a blanket, shot through the thigh. The skirmish-line was gradually pushed forward until within easy point-blank range of the enemy's main works. The firing of musketry was scattering but incessant until mid-day, when the enemy opened with artillery and fired several rounds of spherical case-shot. They put four shot into Stover's barn, but hit nobody. All day there was skirmishing and some cannonading along the whole line, but no severe fighting, although the two armies were in close proximity to each other.

During the night it was evident to the pickets on certain portions of the line that Lee was withdrawing his army. One of the first to discover this movement was a member of the First Maryland, who, about midnight, stealthily approached the enemy's rifle-pits and found them deserted. He at once reported the fact to the officer in charge of the brigade picket-line, Maj. Faehutz, of the Eighth Regiment, who promptly communicated the intelligence to the division commander, and by him was directed to push forward his line as far as he could go. This was done forthwith, and the line advanced without opposition to within one mile of Williamsport, capturing twenty-nine Confederate stragglers on the way.

The main body of the Confederate army was already over the Potomac, having effected a successful escape under cover of the night; but their rear-guard was overtaken by Kilpatrick's cavalry at Falling Waters and severely punished. Meade's entire army was then put in motion towards the river. The First Corps, following the Sixth, marched through the two strong lines of earthworks just abandoned by the enemy, the men of the Maryland Brigade noticing the fresh graves of a number of the Confederates who fell in their front during the two days' skirmish. They also soon found themselves traveling over the same ground that was familiar as the scene of their operations in September, 1862, and at night bivouacked near Williamsport. For the First Regiment this was the fifth time it had encamped in that vicinity.

The next morning the march was resumed, and, passing through Smoketown, Keedysville, and Rohrsersville, the First Corps bivouacked for the night at the foot of South Mountain, near Crampton's Gap. From Crampton's Gap another day's march brought the corps to a resting-place between Petersville and Knoxville, the Maryland Brigade bivouacking on Hillery's farm. Here it remained, refitting and re-clothing generally, until the 18th, when the corps crossed the Potomac at Berlin, and marched through Lovettsville and bivouacked just outside of Waterford, a neat and loyal little Quaker village. From Waterford the next march was to Hamilton, where the Maryland Brigade slept in Janney's woods. Marching thence on the 29th, via Middleburg, White Plains, Warrenton, Warrenton Junction, and Bealton Station, the brigade finally reached Rappahannock Station on the 1st of August, and crossing the river threw up intrenchments. Here the Gettysburg campaign ended.

While these military operations were in progress intense excitement prevailed in Maryland. Upon the invasion of the State, the people of the western counties were greatly alarmed. In Frederick, Hagerstown, Boonsboro', Williamsport, Cumberland, and other towns hundreds of the citizens left their homes, while many more made preparations to do so. The panic also spread wildly through the country. Valuable stock of all descriptions was put en route northward, and did not halt in its flight until some haven of safety was reached. Horses, wagons, and cattle crowded every avenue leading to the mountains and other safe hiding-places.

During the Confederate retreat a brisk skirmish occurred at Hagerstown on the 6th of July between Stuart and Kilpatrick.

The Hagerstown Herald and Torch of the 22d of July, 1863, says,—

"Before our people had completely settled down after the entry of Stuart, leading the advance of the rebel retreat on Monday, the 6th, they were again aroused by the cry, 'The Yankees are coming!' About half past one o'clock the advance of Kilpatrick's division appeared, and formed in line of battle on the crest of the hill near Funkstown. Stuart seemed thunderstruck, and wild hurry and hustle characterized all his movements. Approaching gradually line after line was formed, until the advance line of the Federal forces rested near Mr. A. Hager's mill. From here, led by Capt. Snyder, of the First Michigan Cavalry, a charge of not more than fifty men was made about half past two o'clock. Hastily advancing, they met and received the fire of the enemy, about one hundred and fifty strong, posted on Potomac Street, just where the road to Frederick breaks off to the left, and rushing on them, sabre in hand, they drove the rebels pell-mell up Potomac Street to beyond the Reform church, where the main body of the force rested. Here they fell back in an orderly manner to meet the skirmishers, deployed and led forward by Capt. Dahlgren (son of Rear-Admiral Dahlgren), of Gen. Kilpatrick's staff, who advanced beyond the town hall. Capt. Dahlgren was wounded in the right ankle by a pistol-ball from the market-house as he led his skirmishers up. The main column was soon deployed, part of them dismounted and put in ambuscade, and a general charge prepared for. In the meanwhile the rebel battery opened with shell, which proved insufficient to move or check the gradual advance of the Federals. Elder's battery was quickly put in position on the north of the seminary and replied, while Gen. Custer, with his brigade, was sent to the right, to work to the enemy's flank and rear. An ambuscade of the rebels on Grove's farm, a mile north of town, being discovered, Kilpatrick made dispositions to attack it in the rear, while he led a charge of two regiments in person into the front of the main body of the rebels. All his arrangements were made; Gen. Custer had reached a position where he could attack the left flank of the enemy, and Kilpatrick himself actually moving off to lead the charge, when Custer, whose skirmishers had reached the Leitersburg road, in the rear of the rebel column, discovered the advance of a brigade of rebel infantry, the beginning of the retreat of the shattered columns which Lee had so triumphantly led through an unsurmed valley but two weeks before, and with which he was to conquer and bring back a treaty of peace.

Thereupon Gen. Kilpatrick ordered his men to draw off gradually, to go to the assistance of Buford at Williamsport, who was attacking the enemy's trains. His loss was not over five killed and twenty wounded during this spirited skirmish. On his route to Williamsport he was pursued by cavalry and mounted infantry, about six thousand strong, and there met and cut up at least five hundred of their men with but slight loss, notwithstanding he was hemmed in between two columns, one of infantry, the other of cavalry and infantry mounted."

When Gen. Lee reached Hagerstown on his retreat from Gettysburg, and discovered that the Potomac was too high to effect a crossing, he took a position west of the town and proceeded to protect it by fortifications. His line of intrenchments extended about twelve miles, his extreme left resting on the farm of Frederick Bryan, a mile northwest of Hagerstown, and a few miles from the Pennsylvania line, and his right reaching the Potomac River in the vicinity of Falling Waters. These works were thrown up in about two days, and, together with the great natural strength of the positions chosen for them, were formidable in the extreme. A contemporaneous writer, speaking of the spectacle presented after the passage of the two armies, says,—

"The rebel line of intrenchments, as well as our own, which were hastily thrown up opposite to them, extend for a distance of twelve miles through one of the most fertile portions of Washington County. Along these lines farms have been terribly devastated. Fences have been destroyed, timber cut down, encampments thrown up, ditches dug, wheat, corn, and clover-fields destroyed, the whole presenting a scene of desolation and destruction painful to behold. Some farmers estimate their losses at six, eight, and ten thousand dollars, and renters and others say that they are entirely ruined." 1

1 During the skirmish at Hagerstown on the 6th of July John F. Steeples, a citizen of the place, was instantly killed. He had ascended to the roof of Marshall & Cranwell's business house to witness the fight, and was killed by a ball from the neighborhood of the market-house. On the 1st of July, when the Confederate forces occupied Hagerstown, some one reported to them that Andrew Bowlard, Esq., a respectable citizen living in the suburbs of the town, had on the previous day displayed the national flag while Kilpatrick's forces occupied the place; whereupon a squad of Confederates at once repaired to his residence and demanded its surrender. Mr. Bowlard, being slightly deaf, did not understand the nature of the demand and did not comply with it, upon which, it is said, one of the Confederates leveled his carbine and fired at him, the ball entering his left arm below the elbow. On Monday, the 13th of July, during a skirmish between Gen. Kilpatrick's cavalry and the Confederates, Andrew Hageman, a well-known citizen of Hagerstown, seized his gun, rushed into the streets, and commenced firing upon the Confederates. He was mortally wounded in the skirmish, and died a few days afterwards. After the retreat of the Confederate army large bodies of Pennsylvania militia were encamped for some time in the vicinity of Hagerstown. The Washington House and Lyceum Hall of Hagerstown were used after the battle of Gettysburg as hospitals for Union soldiers, and the seminary as a hospital for Confederate soldiers.

On the 29th of August an affray occurred at Clear Spring, in which Capt. Isaac T. Prather, a highly respectable citizen of that district, lost his life. The affair, it is said, grew out of an assault by a paroled soldier, named Samuel Masters, upon some colored men whom Capt. Prather had recruited for the United States service, and who had assembled preparatory to being sent to join the colored regiment then being formed in Baltimore. During the melee Capt. Prather was shot in the abdomen.
On the 20th of August, by order of Brig.-Gen. Lockwood, Col. Benjamin L. Simpson was directed by his brigade commander, Col. George D. Wells, to proceed with the forces under him from London Heights and encamp in the woods on the east side of the village of Charlestown, W. Va. Col. Simpson's command consisted of portions of seven companies of the Ninth Maryland Volunteers, amounting to about three hundred and fifty men, and a cavalry force of about eighty men. His instructions from his brigade commander were that the holding of Charlestown itself was of no importance, but to watch the movements of the Confederate forces, scout the country thoroughly, and if attacked to resist or retire as the force opposed to him should suggest. At half-past five o'clock on the morning of the 18th of October a Confederate force under Imboden attacked and drove in the pickets on the different roads about Charlestown, planted a battery north and south of the town, and sent in a flag of truce demanding the surrender of the place. This was refused, and the attack was soon after begun by the Confederates.

When the presence of the enemy in the vicinity was first discovered by the attack on the Federal pickets, Col. Simpson posted his men in the courthouse, the jail, and another building, making loopholes for muskets. The Confederate batteries were so planted behind buildings at a distance of two or three hundred yards that their fire was very effective, while the cannoneers were completely protected from the musketry of Col. Simpson's force. The first shot fired struck the court-house, and several others followed, killing andwounding several men and an officer. Col. Simpson then ordered the men to evacuate the building, and form column by company in the street, and ordered the cavalry force, consisting of about eighty men, under Lieut. Moore, to reconnoitre the roads and find the weak points of the enemy. Lieut. Moore led his men out on the road leading to Harper's Ferry, and finding the enemy ordered a charge, which resulted in the killing or capture of all but the lieutenant and seventeen men. Col. Simpson had in the mean time learned the force of the enemy and the number of pieces of artillery, and his men, who had been organized but two months, and had never been in action before, became panic-stricken, and could not be kept in line, broke in confusion, destroyed their arms, and were very soon all made prisoners.

Col. Simpson was remarkably cool, and at the head of his column, assisted by his officers, endeavored to rally his men, that an orderly retreat might be effected; but all efforts to do so failing, and the command having scattered in every direction, he struck off through the fields in company with his mounted officers and succeeded in escaping capture. In consequence of this disaster a court of inquiry was convened to investigate the case, and acquitted Col. Simpson of all blame, the court expressing the opinion "that the surprise and capture of the greater part of the forces under command of Col. Benjamin L. Simpson, Ninth Maryland Infantry, at Charlestown, on the morning of the 15th of October ult., were inevitable, because of the peculiar location of the place, which, surrounded by an open country for several miles on all sides, and approached by a large number of roads from all directions, was easy to be flanked and surrounded, and because of the superior force by which it was attacked, and of the inferior force for its defense. The rebel attacking force was two thousand men, with six pieces of artillery. The defending force, under command of Col. Simpson, consisted of three hundred and seventy-five infantry and seventy-five cavalry."

Gen. Kelley forwarded the record of the case, with the statement that he did not concur in the findings of the court, but believed that Col. Simpson was derelict in allowing himself to be surprised, and that he should have maintained himself in his position until the reinforcements reached him, which started from Harper's Ferry as soon as the cannonading was heard. He therefore recommended that Col. Simpson should be dismissed the service. The War Department, however, approved the finding of the court, and the judge-advocate-general, in declining to concur in Gen. Kelley's recommendation, said, "After a disaster of this kind has occurred it is much less difficult for a military commander to review the details, and remark what should or should not have been done, than for a subordinate to anticipate the strength, position, and design of the enemy, and to successfully have met or withstood their attack."

Among the officers who escaped capture were Lieut.-Col. Thomas Clandey, Maj. George Church, Surgeon Morgan, Asst. Surgeon Kemp, Chaplain G. T. Gray.

1 Company F, Second Maryland Potomac Home Brigade, Capt. George D. Summers, formed part of the cavalry force at Charlestown. While stationed here the company was engaged in continual skirmishes, in which the command was very much reduced and Capt. Summers killed.
CHAPTER XIV.
CLOSE OF THE CIVIL WAR.

While the Army of the Potomac lay on the north of the Rapidan, Maj.-Gen. U. S. Grant, who had been made lieutenant-general, was assigned by President Lincoln, on the 10th of March, 1864, to the command of all the "armies of the United States." Gen. Meade was selected as his second in command of the Army of the Potomac, and to him was intrusted the execution of his plans. This portion of the army was consolidated into three corps, the Second, Fifth, and Sixth, commanded respectively by Gen. Hancock, Warren, and Sedgwick, and numbering, with Burnside's independent corps, about one hundred and forty thousand men. The Confederates under Lee numbered about sixty thousand men. By the consolidation of the Army of the Potomac on the 23d of March, 1864, into three corps, the Maryland Brigade, under Col. N. B. Dushane, of the First Maryland Regiment, became the Third Brigade in the Second Division of the Fifth Army Corps. Brig.-Gen. John C. Robinson commanded the division, and Maj.-Gen. G. K. Warren the corps. Gen. Kenly, much to the regret of his command, was assigned a district in the Middle Department. During the temporary absence of Col. Dushane (afterwards killed at the battle of Weldon Railroad) the command of the brigade devolved upon Col. Andrew W. Denison, of the Eighth Maryland Regiment.

On the 3d of May, 1864, Gen. Meade issued an address to his army, and on the following day it left Culpeper for the Rapidan. In the evening Meade reached that tangled forest where was fought, from the 5th to the 9th, the battle of the Wilderness, the most terrible and bloody of the war. In this series of bloody engagements, fought in a mass of tangled underwood, the Maryland Brigade took a conspicuous part in Warren's corps and met with severe loss. On Sunday, the 8th of May, with its division, they charged Longstreet's command, posted in a skirt of wood at Laurel Hill, near Spottsylvania Court-House, in the face of a galling fire of musketry and a storm of both canister and shell from both front and flank. The First, Seventh, and Eighth Maryland Regiments pushed on to within fifty yards of Longstreet's trenches, but the terrible fire poured into their depleted ranks forced them to retire, leaving the field covered with their dead and wounded. Gen. Robinson, their division commander, was wounded in the leg, and Col. Denison, who commanded the brigade, lost his arm. The command of the brigade then devolved upon Col. Charles E. Phelps, who had succeeded Col. E. H. Webster, elected to Congress. While gallantly leading his men into action, Col. Phelps was struck down within the Confederate line and was taken prisoner, but was afterwards recaptured by Custer's cavalry. Col. Richard M. Boweman, of the Fourth Regiment, was then assigned command of the brigade. In consequence of the disabling wound of Gen. Robinson, his division was broken up, and the various regiments, with the exception of the Maryland Brigade, were assigned to other commands. The Maryland Brigade, as a light corps, was placed under the immediate command of Gen. Warren. It was employed in various duties until the 29th of May, when the old Second Division was reorganized, and the Maryland Brigade again became the Third Brigade, Second Division, Fifth Army Corps, which it retained until the 6th of June, when it was designated the Second Brigade of the same division and corps. Brig.-Gen. R. B. Ayres was assigned to the command of the division, and the Purnell Legion, Maryland Infantry, under Col. Samuel A. Graham, was joined to the brigade. In all the various battles in which their division was engaged, from Spottsylvania Court-House to the Chickahominy, which they crossed on the 14th of June, the Maryland Brigade bore a distinguished and active part, and suffered severe loss in killed and wounded. On the 16th, moving by way of Charles City Court-House, it crossed the James at Wilcox's Landing with the Second and Fifth Corps, and proceeded towards the lines near Petersburg, where it arrived early on the morning of the 17th.

While the Maryland Brigade was thus operating with Grant in his movements against Richmond, other Maryland commands were performing active service in other sections of the country. The Sixth Maryland Regiment of Infantry, under Col. Horn, was in the Sixth Corps, under the distinguished and lamented Gen. Sedgwick; and the Second and Third Regiments, in the Ninth Corps, under Gen. Burnside, on more than one occasion proved their patriotism by their valor. At the battle of Cold Harbor the Second and Third Regiments were in all the severe engagements in which the Ninth Corps participated, and was part of the rear-guard when Grant and his army crossed the James. On the 17th of June this brigade was ordered to charge the Confederate breastworks in... front of Petersburg, and the command was successfully executed. They held the breastworks until late at night, when for want of support their whole line fell back to their former position.

At early dawn on the morning of the 10th of January, 1864, Mosby's Confederate battalion of cavalry made an attack upon the camp of Maj. Cole's Maryland cavalry, on Loudon Heights, Va. They avoided the pickets, dashed into the camp with a yell, and poured a volley of bullets into the tents where the officers and men were sleeping. The following is Maj. Cole's official report of this spirited affair:

"I hold myself at a distance, P. H. B. Cav., Maj. Vols.,

"Loudon Heights, Va., Jan. 10, 1864.

"Wm. M. Boone,

"Adjut.-Gen. First Division, Dept. West Virginia:

"Sir,—I have the honor of addressing you for the purpose of reporting to you the facts of an attempt by Maj. Mosby's battalion of cavalry to surprise and capture my camp between the hours of three and four A.M. of this day. They tediously avoided the pickets, divided themselves into small bodies, which were specially consolidated in right of my camp; they then made an impetuous charge with a yell on the right of the same. In consequence of the suddenness of the same this company could offer but a feeble resistance. In the mean time Company A, the second in the line, was speedily rallied by its commanding officer, Capt. Vernon, who contested their further advance in such a sanguinary manner that formed a rallying-point for the balance of the command, who were now thoroughly aroused of the danger that threatened them, and one and all, from the officer to the private, entered into the contest with such a determined zest as led to the utter rout and discomfiture of the enemy and the signal failure of their base attempt. They experienced a loss of one captain, two lieutenants, and two privates killed, and two privates mortally wounded, and one prisoner; it was also very evident that they removed a large portion of their wounded with them in their precipitate flight, as a detachment of the command subsequently sent in pursuit found evidence of blood all along their line of retreat. I experienced a loss of four enlisted men killed and sixteen wounded. Capt. Vernon experienced a serious wound in the head, but it is the opinion of the battalion surgeon, W. R. Way, that it will not prove fatal. I am deeply indebted to the officers and men of my command for the daring displayed by them on this occasion, and earnestly commend them to the division commander for his favorable consideration.

"I have the honor to remain,

"Very respectfully,

"Henry A. Cole, Major Commanding.

The following is a list of the killed and wounded of Maj. Cole's command, as shown by the report of the medical director:

While Lee was defending his lines at Cold Harbor, Hunter was ravaging the Valley of Virginia and moving on Lynnehurg, for the purpose of destroying the stores, manufactories, and railroad bridges at that place. Gen. Early, who had received orders on the 12th of June at Cold Harbor to move with two battalions of artillery and the infantry of Ewell's corps, numbering about nine thousand men, to destroy or disperse Hunter's force, arrived with his advance at Lynchburg on the 18th. In the mean time Gen.

Breckenridge, who had been sent from Cold Harbor to Waynesboro' with a small force, by a forced march had arrived at the same place. Hunter with his command arrived before Lynchburg on the 18th of June, and made a slight attack on Early's lines, which was repulsed. Fearing that he would be cut off from his base, Hunter rapidly retreated during the night, closely pursued in the morning by Early and Breckenridge. He continued retreating across the mountains towards Charlestown, Kanawha, leaving Washington exposed. Lee, seeing the opportunity to make an attempt on the capital, and believing that such a demonstration might lead to the raising of the siege of Petersburg, telegraphed to Early whether, in his judgment, the condition of his troops would permit such a movement across the Potomac. Gen. Early determined to make the attempt, and immediately set about to carry out his plans. With a force of about twelve thousand men in rags, and many shoeless, he moved down the valley on the 28th of June from Staunton, and in spite of the intense heat and almost intolerable dust, advanced by forced march about twenty-five miles a day. He reached Winchester on the 2d of July, and on the 3d, dividing his force into two columns, he sent one under Breckenridge to drive Sigel out of Martinsburg, and with the other marched to drive Mulligan out of Leestown. Both columns were successful. Sigel retreated across the Potomac at Shepherdstown. Col. Bradley T. Johnson, who had been promoted to brigadier-general of cavalry, and assigned to the cavalry brigade of W. E. Jones, who was killed at New Hope, led the advance of Early's command, encountered Mulligan's advance, and after a severe fight drove them out of Leestown Ferry, evacuated the town, and after destroying the bridges over the Potomac, retired to Maryland Heights. Early destroyed the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, and boats along his line from Shepherdstown to Harper's Ferry.
On the 5th of July, Gen. Johnson with his cavalry crossed the Potomac at Sharpsburg, part going to Hagerstown and part to Boonsboro'. Breckenridge with his command crossed the Potomac the same afternoon, followed on the next day by the rest of Early's command. After receiving some stores, which he was greatly in need of, Early on the 8th of July marched twenty miles to Jefferson and Middletown, where he was joined by the cavalry, which had been securing in the vicinity of Frederick.

The sudden and unexpected invasion of Maryland by the Confederate forces under Early created intense excitement in the State, especially in Frederick and in the Cumberland Valley.

The movements of the Confederates on the upper Potomac were not sufficiently developed to afford a clear estimate either of their force or intentions until the 6th of July, when a skirmish between the pickets took place about half-way between Frederick and Point of Rocks. The Confederates retired, leaving several of their men in the hands of the Federals, who gave the intelligence that the Confederates were advancing, and that it was not simply a raid, but an invasion in force with the purpose of capturing Washington or Baltimore.

On receipt of intelligence that the Confederates were crossing the Potomac, the inhabitants of the border towns of Pennsylvania were greatly alarmed. Hundreds of men, women, and children passed through York and Harrisburg on their way to the interior, and the roads were lined with horses, cattle, and wagons, loaded with goods and provisions, being driven in the same direction. Many hid their property and cattle in the mountains. The merchants in Chambersburg, Shippensburg, and Carlisle packed up their goods and val-ubles and shipped them to points of safety. The machinery in the shops of the Chambersburg Railroad Company was removed, and every precaution taken to prevent anything valuable falling into Confederate hands. The live-stock of the farmers in Adams, Fulton, and Cumberland Counties was all removed, and every train from Cumberland Valley moving eastward was crowded with refugees.

The Confederate cavalry, under Brig.-Gen. John McCausland, entered Hagerstown on the 6th of July, and took possession of the place. The United States quartermaster had in the mean time abandoned the town, with a large quantity of his stores and several hundred horses, and arrived safely at Carlisle. A large majority of the stores were closed and their contents removed.

As soon as McCausland found that he was in undisturbed possession of Hagerstown he requested an interview with the town council. As soon as this was had he presented them with the following order, and told them that if the demand was not complied with within a limited time the town would be laid in ashes:

"Headquarters Cavalry Brigade,
"Hagerstown, Md., July 6, 1864.

"General Order No. ———.

"1st. In accordance with the instructions of Lieut.-Gen.
Early, a levy of 20,000 dollars is made upon the inhabitants of this city. The space of three hours is allowed for the payment of the sum in United States funds."
"24. A requisition is also made for all government stores.

"2d. The following articles will also be furnished from the merchandise now in the hands of the citizens or merchants, viz.: 1500 suits of clothes, 1500 hats, 1500 pairs shoes or boots, 1500 shirts, 1900 pieces drawers, and 1500 pairs socks. Four hours allowed for their collection.

"The mayor and council are held responsible for the execution of this order, and in case of non-compliance the usual penalty will be enforced upon the city.

"John McCausland, Brigadier-General C.S.A."

Upon receipt of this order a town-meeting was immediately called to assemble in the court-house, where the demand of Gen. McCausland was discussed; and it was decided that under the circumstances the town council should raise the money and as much of the clothing as it was possible for them to obtain within the time allowed. The money was soon raised, but it was found that it would be impossible to furnish the clothing. Additional time was asked in which to raise it, but McCausland was deaf to every appeal, and repeated his threat that if his demand was not complied with within the time specified he would lay the town in ashes. At last, however, when he found that there was a disposition on the part of the council and the people to furnish the required amount, he extended the time two hours, telling them that if his requisition was not filled by that time they knew what they had to expect. He then marshaled a regiment of his cavalry into the town, and stationed them in front of the court-house, as it was supposed, for the purpose of intimidating the citizens, or with a view of carrying out his threat, provided the money and goods were not promptly handed over at the hour stipulated. Every effort was put forth by the distressed citizens, and clothing of every hue and material was taken to the court-house, where it was placed in the hands of a committee, whose duty it was to hold it and transfer it to McCausland. The supply in town, however, was found to be sadly deficient, and the fact was soon announced to the Confederate leader, who swore to them that if it was not forthcoming by the time specified he would carry out his threat, should it cost him his own life and that of his whole command." He told them that before doing so he would give them half an hour to remove the women and children from the town, and that they might expect no lenity at his hands. At last, through the influence of several members of his staff, to whom the citizens had appealed, he was induced to accept the twenty thousand dollars and the amount of clothing that they had raised. Upon receiving the following assurance, written on the bottom of the original demand, that the money and clothing was satisfactory, the ransom was handed over to McCausland:

"The town of Hagerstown having complied with the foregoing requisition by paying in cash twenty thousand dollars ($20,000), and having also furnished the specified articles therein mentioned to the utmost of their ability, I hereby certify to the facts, and place the town under the protection of the Confederate forces, releasing the citizens and their property from further contribution, and agreeing to shield both from further requirements.

Boots .................................... 50

"J. C. Van Fossum, Quartermaster."

Among the sufferers in Hagerstown whose stores were rifled were Messrs. Knodle and Small, shoe-dealers, and Messrs. Rourkulp and Updagraff, dealers in hats.

While the citizens of Hagerstown were occupied in complying with McCausland's demands, a number of prowling cavalrymen entered and plundered the drug-stores. At the same time other bodies were scattered over the country plundering stores, seizing horses and cattle, and destroying property in retaliation for Gen. Hunter's devastations in Virginia. In Williamsport, Sharpsburg, Boonsboro', and Middletown they entered the stores, and in some instances private dwellings, and carried off whatever suited their purpose. At Boonsboro', they also destroyed the printing materials of the Odd-Fellow newspaper, and in their march through the country they took wagons, horses, cattle, and sheep. A large steam distillery, about a mile and a half from Williamsport, belonging to Mr. Dahl, was fired and consumed.

After the money and clothing had been handed over to McCausland by the citizens of Hagerstown he left the place, marching in the direction of Middletown and Boonsboro'. On the next day (Thursday, July 7th) several squads of Confederates passed through the town, but no damage was done to any property, and no one was molested. On Friday morning, however, a band of guerrillas, numbering about one hundred and eighty men, under command of Maj. Davis, entered the town, and broke into a number of shoe- and hat-stores, helping themselves freely to their contents. They also set fire to the hay belonging to the United States government and to the Franklin Railroad depot, which were consumed. They were about to destroy a large quantity of oats and corn belonging to the government, stored in several private warehouses, when the citizens remonstrated with them, and called their attention to the fact that they had already paid the amount of indemnity demanded by McCausland and were ransomed.
This Davis' party was not satisfied with, but they consented to spare the warehouses, and perhaps the town, provided they were paid the sum of five hundred dollars, and that one of the citizens would give bond in one hundred thousand dollars that the grain would be burned, his life, besides, to be forfeited in case of default. Isaac Nesbitt, clerk of the court, agreed to the conditions and gave the requisite bond; and the people proceeded to carry out the grain and set it on fire in accordance with the terms. They then demanded ten pair of boots, with the understanding that on receipt of them they would vacate the place. This was agreed to; the boots were furnished, and the marauders left the place. On Saturday evening the town was occupied by Federal cavalry, and thus ended the raid on Hagerstown.

After Gen. Johnson with his brigade of cavalry had crossed the Potomac on July 5th at Shepherdstown, he moved through Sharpsburg, sending a scouting party in the direction of Hagerstown, and camped at Keedysville that night. The next day (the 6th) he moved through Boonsboro' by the turnpike and camped on the top of the mountain, between Boonsboro' and Middletown, in the gap which was the scene of Reno's attack, where ex-President (then Col. R. B.) Hayes was wounded, just before the battle of Sharpsburg, in September, 1862. On the 7th, being still held back by the orders of Maj.-Gen. Ransom, commanding Early's cavalry, who insisted upon his keeping within reach of the infantry, he made another slow movement towards Frederick. Early had passed part of his force over the Potomac on the evening of the 5th, and was manoeuvring to oust the Federal force from Maryland Heights, being unwilling to expose his flank to it while moving on Washington, as well as to leave it in his rear.

In Middletown Johnson's advance came in contact with the Eighth Illinois Cavalry, Col. Clendenin, which had moved from Frederick on a reconnoissance. Col. Clendenin's force consisted of about three hundred of the Eighth Illinois, Cole's Maryland cavalry battalion, and two pieces of Alexander's Baltimore artillery. After a sharp skirmish the Federals were driven back, and made a stand on the top of the mountain between Frederick and Middletown. Gen. Johnson deployed the two Maryland battalions under Col. Harry Gilmor and pressed them on the Federal position, when Col. Clendenin, finding he was about to be flanked, withdrew into Frederick, the Confederates pressing hotly on his retreat, moving to within a mile of Frederick on the Hagerstown turnpike. Johnson's brigade consisted of about eight hundred effective and the Baltimore Light Artillery with four guns.

As he passed the hamlet of Fairview, at the toll-gate he detached Lieut.-Col. Dunn with a Virginia regiment by the road that passes from the right of the road behind the estate of Prospect Hill to the Harper's Ferry road. Dunn passed rapidly down the road in a sweeping gallop, and turning into the Harper's Ferry road, moved sharply towards the city, pushing his dismounted skirmishers as far as Rizer's barn, and across through Mount Olivet Cemetery towards the Georgetown turnpike. These operations created the utmost excitement in the city. From early dawn on the 7th it was rumored in Frederick that the Confederates were only a short distance from the city, and that they would soon enter and occupy it. The arrival of couriers and wounded from the skirmish beyond Middletown, bringing the news that the force sent out to hold the Confederates in check until reinforcements arrived was unable to cope with them, and was slowly falling back towards Frederick, raised higher the alarm, and by noon business was suspended, stores closed, and many fled from the city. All the sick and stores were hastily removed. About half-past three o'clock the Federal forces came down the Hagerstown turnpike, and immediately took position on the edge of the city. It was an exciting time for the citizens of Frederick, as it was impossible to resist a direct assault upon the city with the light force at the command of Col. Clendenin. At this time, however, Gen. Wallace, the commander of the department, sent up from Monocacy Junction the Third Maryland Regiment, which was promptly marched to the front under Col. Gilpin, the senior officer present, who assumed command and disposed of his forces for battle. The whole force under his command at this time in defense of the city was the Third Maryland, seven hundred men; Eighth Illinois Cavalry, three hundred men; three pieces of Alexander's battery (Baltimore), about fifty men; and two companies of Col. Maulby's Potomac Home Brigade, and Maj. Cole's Maryland cavalry.

About four o'clock the Confederates were to be seen from the roofs of the houses in Frederick coming down the Hagerstown road, and also the Harper's Ferry or Jefferson road, apparently in strong force. Capt. Alexander opened his battery upon the advancing foe, when they closed up and formed their line of battle on the west front of the city, covering the Harper's Ferry and Hagerstown roads, planting their guns on "Hogan's Hills" and the "Red Hills," and posting their cavalry in the valley formed between the two hills named and the Catoctin Mountains. The engagement opened about half-past four o'clock with an artillery duel between Alexander's guns in Zimmer-man's fields and the Confederate guns on Hogan's Hill. The skirmishers soon advanced, and the sharp crack of musketry was heard for about two hours with no result on either side, when the Third Maryland Regiment was advanced and drove the Confederates out of Rizer's field, lying on the Harper's Ferry road, on the west side of the city, which they held for the remainder of the day. The two companies of Col. Maulsbys's regiment supported the guns at the head of Patrick Street, and the Eighth Illinois Cavalry were dismounted and rendered effective service on the skirmish-line. During the artillery duel several shots from the Confederate batteries entered the heart of the city and did some damage. All the houses on the west side of the city were deserted, as they were in range of the Confederate guns.

The Confederate line of battle held its position, pushing its skirmishers along the front of the Federal line to conceal the movement Johnson was preparing to make by the reservoir road at the northwestern end, and by the Georgetown road at the southern end of the city. He was perfectly informed by his friends of the forces and condition of things within the Federal line, and he proposed sending in one regiment by the reservoir road, while Lieut.-Col. Dunn charged with his regiment down through Market Street, by the Georgetown road, and the main body moved directly on in front. This attack on both flanks and in front, he believed, would result in the capture of the entire force engaging him. Gen. Ransom, who was with Johnson's column, prohibited him from attempting to execute this plan, and ordered him to withdraw his troops to the top of the mountain as soon as night covered the movement.

Chagrined and mortified, Johnson saw a brilliant victory eluding his grasp and a substantial success thus escaping him, and sullenly withdrew about nine o'clock the night of the 7th. His headquarters during the engagement that afternoon had been on the range of hills not far from the house of George Wm. Smith.

All day of the 8th the Confederates lay inactive, leaving the garrison of Frederick in the greatest anxiety, which feeling was intensely shared by the administration at Washington.

Col. Clendenin and the Eighth Illinois Cavalry made another reconnaissance from Frederick by way of the Mountain or Shookstown road on the 8th, but were driven back with loss by Gilmore and the First and Second Maryland Cavalry. The head of Early's column of infantry reached Middletown the evening of the 8th, and the same evening Gen. Wallace, having assumed command at Frederick, ordered the evacuation of that place.

Hastily gathering the stores and ammunition, he forwarded them by rail to Monocacy Junction, and withdrew his forces by the turnpike road to the same place. The whole movement was executed quietly, and by midnight there was scarcely a Federal soldier in the city, except a few scouts who had been stationed to watch the movements of the Confederates.

The feelings of the Union people of Frederick when it became known that the Federal troops were about to evacuate the city, cannot be described. Hundreds left with the troops in every manner of conveyance, and many on foot. On the withdrawal of the Federal forces many of the Southern sympathizers made their way out the Hagerstown road and communicated the intelligence to the Confederates, who immediately entered the city with cavalry and hoisted their flag over the court-house. The capture was a barren victory, so far as military supplies were concerned, as everything in the way of stores, horses, ammunition, wagons, etc., belonging to the Federal government had been removed long previous to its evacuation. Nearly all the horses of citizens were sent away, and many people had sent their valuables to a point of safety. The banks had made ample arrangements to secure their property. The collector of internal revenue sent over seventy thousand dollars in his possession to Washington, and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company secured all their rolling-stock and motive-power on the road.

On taking possession of Frederick the Confederates appointed a provost-marshal, etc., and on the morning of the 9th addressed the following communications to the authorities of the city:

"FREDERICK CITY, Md., July 9, 1864.

"HON. MAYOR,—I am directed by Lieut.-Gen. Early, commanding, to require of you for the use of his troops—

Mayor Cole called the members of the corporation remaining in the city together, and to save the city from threatened destruction it was decided to ransom it by paying the sum demanded. The amount was accordingly paid in "greenbacks" of various denominations, which were placed in baskets and removed to one of the wagons. When the ransom had been paid the following receipt was given:

"FREDERICK, July 9, 1864.

"Received of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of Frederick the sum of two hundred thousand dollars in legal tender of said sum, which this day was levied and demanded to be paid to the Confederate States Army by said corporation of Frederick.

"J. R. Breathwaite,
"Major and Q. M."

The stores were visited by a number of the cavalrymen, who took what they wanted, in some instances offering Confederate currency in payment, but generally helping themselves without compensation. On Sunday Cole's cavalry had quite a skirmish on Patrick Street, opposite the City Hotel, with a portion of the rear-guard of the Confederates, who were moving out towards the Washington turnpike.

On the 5th of July, Governor Andrew G. Curtin, of Pennsylvania, made an urgent call for twelve thousand troops to repel the Confederate invaders, and volunteers not coming forward with the desired promptitude, he on the next day issued another proclamation, calling for twelve thousand men, in accordance with President Lincoln's proclamation, which required to meet the exigency twelve thousand men each from New York and Pennsylvania, and five thousand from Massachusetts, all to serve one hundred days. Gen. Grant, on learning that Early had crossed the Potomac, also detached the Sixth Corps from the Army of the Potomac and forwarded it by transports to Washington. It happened, too, at this juncture that the Nineteenth Corps under Gen. Emory, which had been ordered from New Orleans after the failure of the Red River expedition, had just arrived in Hampton Roads. Without debarking it was sent to follow the Sixth. The advance division of the Sixth Corps, under Gen. Ricketts, having arrived at Baltimore, Gen. Wallace, with that added to his own force, determined to cover the turnpike road leading to Baltimore and Washington, and to preserve communication with his forces at Harper's Ferry. With this view, after withdrawing his force from Frederick on the evening of the 8th, he took up a strong position on the east side of the Monocacy River, along the crest of a ridge running obliquely to the left from the river. The troops forming Ricketts' division of the Sixth Corps, which had arrived on the ground from the Army of the Potomac, were posted to the left of the railroad crossing the Baltimore turnpike, with their front resting on the Buckeystown road, while the remaining portion of Gen. Wallace's forces were posted to the right of the railroad. Gen. E. B. Tyler, with a small force, defended the turnpike bridge across the Monocacy. In Gen. Wallace's front lay an open field, which he commanded with his artillery, while in the rear ran a valley nearly parallel with the general direction of his lines of battle. About nine o'clock on the morning of the 9th, Gen. McCausland's cavalry brigade (dismounted) advanced and felt Wallace's line, but after considerable skirmishing they were driven back by superior numbers. McCausland occupied the attention of the Federal force until about noon, when the advance of Early's force, which had marched fourteen miles that morning from Middle- town and Jefferson, arrived at the scene of action. Early determined, if possible, to disperse Wallace's command before he moved in the direction of Washing- ton, and as soon as Breckenridge's corps arrived on the field the action began.1

About 2.30 o'clock Maj.-Gen. John B. Gordon received orders to move his division, consisting of about two thousand five hundred men, to the right and cross the Monocacy about one mile below the bridge and ford (on the Georgetown pike), which was then held by the Federals. While he was carrying out this movement, Breckenridge was to occupy Wallace from the front on the opposite side of the river, with a portion of McCausland's cavalry, numbering about five hundred men. Gordon's division rapidly crossed the river, and then filed to the left to the point where McCausland's cavalry had been skirmishing. Gen. Gordon reconnoitered the Federal position, and as soon as he obtained the range of their lines he ordered his skirmishers, under Capt. Keller, of Evans' brigade, to deploy, and directed Evans' brigade, under the protection of a dense woodland about seven hundred yards in front of the Federals' left, to move by the right flank and form so as to overlap them. Gen. York, with the brigades of Hays and Stafford, was ordered to form on the left of Gen. Evans, and Terry's brigade to move in support of the left of Gordon's line. These dispositions having been made, Gordon advanced en echelon by brigades from the right. The troops emerged from the woods in front of the Federal left under a heavy fire of artillery and infantry. This force advanced but a short distance when Gen. Evans was struck down and several of his regimental commanders were killed, which threw his brigade into slight confu- sion. This, however, did not check their advance, for they forced Wallace to change his front under fire.
"At this point," says Gen. Gordon, "the Louisiana brigades, under the command of Brig.-Gen. York, became engaged, and the two brigades (Evans' and York's) moved forward with much spirit, driving back the enemy's first line in confusion upon his second. After a brief halt at the fence from which this first line had been driven, I ordered a charge on the second line, which was equally successful. At this point I discovered a third line, which overlapped both my flanks, and which was posted still more strongly in the deep cuts along the Georgetown road, and behind the crest of the hill near the Monocacy bridge, and at once ordered Brig.-Gen. Terry, who as yet had not been engaged, to attack vigorously that portion of the enemy's line nearest the river, and from which my troops were receiving a severe flank fire. This brigade advanced with great spirit and in excellent order, driving the enemy from his position on a portion of the line. He still held most stubbornly his strong position in front of the other two brigades and upon my right. He also advanced at the same time two fresh lines of troops to retake the position from which he had been driven by Terry's brigade. These were repulsed with heavy loss and in great confusion. Having suffered severe loss in driving back two lines, either of which I believed equal in length to my command, and having discovered the third line longer than either of the others, and protected by the cuts in the road, in order to avoid the great loss it would require to drive the enemy from his position by a front attack, I despatched two staff officers in succession to ask for a brigade to use on the enemy's flank. Ascertaining, however, that a considerable length of time must elapse before these could reach me, I at once ordered Brig.-Gen. Terry to change front, with his brigade to the right, and to attack the enemy's right. This movement, promptly executed, with a simultaneous attack from the front, resulted in the dislodging of this line and the complete rout of the enemy's forces.

The battle though short was severe. I desire in this connection to state a fact of which I was an eyewitness, and which, for its rare occurrence and the evidence it affords of the sanguinary character of the struggle, I consider worthy of official mention. One portion of the enemy's second line extended along a branch, from which he was driven, leaving many dead and wounded in the water and upon its banks. This position was in turn occupied by a portion of Evans' brigade in the attack on the enemy's third line. So profuse was the flow of blood from the killed and wounded of both these forces, that it reddened the stream for more than a hundred yards below."

Gen. Gordon's loss was heavy in both officers and men, amounting in the aggregate, as shown by reports of brigade commanders, to six hundred and ninety-eight. Among the killed were Col. J. H. Lamar, and Lieut.-Col. Von Valkenburg, both of the Sixty-first Georgia Regiment, of Evans' brigade. Lieut.-Col. Hodges, of the Ninth Louisiana Regiment, Hays' brigade, and several other regimental commanders were severely wounded. The Federal loss was about sixteen hundred killed, wounded, and missing. The retreat soon became a perfect rout, and the Confederate cavalry, pursuing closely, secured a large number of prisoners. All the Federal wounded and killed in the latter part of the action were abandoned where they fell. A great number of men, principally slightly wounded, managed to reach the train stationed at New Market, and were immediately sent to Ellicott's Mills, the Confederate cavalry following the retreating column to nearly the same point, at which Wallace made a stand with the remnant of his force the next morning. The following official reports of the battle show the part taken in this engagement by several of the Federal commands:

"Sir,—In pursuance of orders, I have the honor to make the following statement regarding the fight at Frederick and the battle of Monocacy.

"At 11 A.M. Thursday, 7th, I received an order to send a section to Frederick to report to Lieut.-Col. Clendenin, Eighth Illinois Cavalry. Lieut. Leary, of the battery, reported at 4.30 A.M. with his section to Frederick to Lieut.-Col. Clendenin, and advanced at 6 A.M. on the road leading westward to Middletown. The enemy were encountered two miles this side of Middletown, and the section gradually retired towards Frederick. At 11 A.M. of the same day I received orders to go to Lieut. Leary's assistance with another gun and ammunition. I met them at 12.30 P.M., and with Col. Clendenin formed a line of defense on the edge of the town. The enemy opened on us with three guns about 4 P.M. About 6 P.M. we dismounted one gun, and began to silence their artillery fire. Shortly before dark Col. Gilpin, who on his arrival had assumed command, charged and forced back the rebels, and they appeared no more that night.

"On Friday, 8th, the battery was filled by the arrival of the remaining three pieces at 9 A.M. No engagement took place, except slight skirmishing on the Middletown road, but the battery was constantly on the move until 4 A.M. Saturday, 9th, when it returned to the Monocacy, somewhat short of ammunition, as the fire on Thursday had been continuous all day. On Saturday, 9th, at 9 A.M. I was ordered to place three guns on the hill beyond Monocacy towards Frederick, and commenced firing on the enemy as they advanced on both sides of the pike from Frederick. They soon returned with artillery, but with little effect. Finding this they proceeded around towards the left of our position, where the ground gradually rose in the distance, while on our side it sloped away. The other three guns were then placed on the hill on this side of the Monocacy, so as to meet their movement to our left. The enemy brought, as nearly as I can judge, about sixteen guns to bear on us, but, owing to the advantage of the ground, and the infantry preventing them from gaining ground to our left, where they could have commanded the battery, did but little damage, though some of their guns were of heavier calibre. (The guns of the battery are three-inch rifle.) When more guns of the enemy began to appear on our left with infantry, I moved two more guns from the hill on the right to the hill on our left. Finally, about 8.30 a.m., our troops made a charge, and drove them back, and they then uncovered their forces, and came on in about three lines, and forced our troops to retreat. Our ammunition almost gave out about 4 p.m., but the guns were kept in position until the order was given from Gen. Ricketts to retire by the Baltimore road. We moved out along the road at a walk, which led to the Baltimore pike, and I was ordered by Gen. Wallace at New Market to proceed along the road to Baltimore. Two of the guns were left in the rear to assist in guarding the column, though with little ammunition left, and joined the battery at Ellicott’s Mills at 11 a.m., Sunday, July 10th, when I moved to Baltimore, as ordered, for ammunition and supplies. I cannot speak too highly of the conduct of the officers and men of the battery, viz.: Lient. Evans, Lient. Leary, and Lient. Hall. Lient. Alexander was absent as A. A. I. General on Gen. Kenly’s staff. My loss was four men wounded and five horses killed, one caisson-body (empty), and the body of the battery-wagon left behind in order to attach a twenty-four-pounder howitzer, which did not belong to the battery, to the limber. I succeeded in bringing it safely to Baltimore, as also a mountain howitzer which had been used to defend the Monocacy bridge.

"I am, sir, very respectfully,"

REPORT OF BRIG.-GEN. E. B. TYLER.

"HEADQUARTERS FIRST SEPT. BRIG., EIGHTEENTH A. C.,

"RELAY HOUSE, MD., July 14, 1864.

"LIEUT.-COL. SAMUEL B. LAWRENCE,

"ASST. Adjt.-General:

"COLONEL,—I have the honor, sir, to submit the following report of the part taken by my command in the late engagements at Frederick City and Monocacy Junction.

"On Thursday the 7th inst., Lient.-Col. Clendenin, of the Eighth Illinois Cavalry, under the immediate orders of the major-general commanding, drew the enemy from the mountains west of Frederick City, and I reinforced him with three guns of Alexander’s Maryland battery and the Third Regiment, Potomac Home Brigade, Maryland Volunteers, under Col. Charles Gilpin, then at Monocacy Junction. The promptness of these troops soon brought them in front of the enemy, who were occupying a commanding position a short distance west of the city. The action soon became warm and spirited, continuing some five hours, the enemy being handsomely repulsed just as darkness came upon us. The conduct of both officers and men was brave, gallant, and creditable. Col. Gilpin and Lient.-Col. Clendenin conducted themselves in the most gallant manner, deserving great credit for their skill and efficiency from first to last. These officers speak in very high terms of the officers and men under them, and they deserve it all. The three guns of Alexander’s battery were served splendidly under the command of Capt. Alexander, and I do but simple justice when I say that the officers and men are entitled to high esteem and admiration for their skill and bravery exhibited in this action.

"Receiving information that the enemy were being heavily reinforced, I went forward with the regiment, composed of companies of the One Hundred and Forty-fourth and One Hundred and Forty-ninth Ohio National Guards, commanded by Col. Brown, who took possession of the enemy’s deserted lines soon after daylight Friday morning. The most of Friday was spent in cavalry skirmishing with the enemy, under the personal directions of Lient.-Col. Clendenin, and was very efficiently done. I continued to receive reports during the day of the increasing strength of the enemy, which was communicated to the commanding general, who directed me to fall back on Monocacy Junction, which was successfully done during the night, leaving the One Hundred and Forty-ninth Ohio National Guards to hold the stone bridge across the Monocacy on the National or Baltimore pike.

"Saturday morning found us in line of battle, my command forming the right of the line, my left resting on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and connecting with Gen. Ricketts; the One Hundred and Forty-ninth Ohio National Guards and three companies of the One Hundred and Forty-fourth Ohio National Guards holding the extreme right, Col. Gilpin’s Third Regiment, Potomac Home Brigade, Maryland Volunteers, and three companies of the First Maryland, Potomac Home Brigade, under Capt. Barnard, extending along the base of the hill, holding the ford between the stone bridge and junction, and the Eleventh Maryland, Col. Landstreet, completing my line. The enemy appeared directly in my front about 9 a.m., and opened on us with artillery, and attacked in considerable force our skirmish line formed on the west bank of the Monocacy and composed of the troops of the First Maryland, Potomac Home Brigade, under command of Capt. Brown. Three guns of Capt. Alexander’s battery (three having been sent to Gen. Ricketts) and a twenty-four-pounder howitzer soon checked their advancing line, and the action in my front, with the exception of sharpshooters and skirmish firing, was an artillery fight. This at times was quite spirited, continuing until near the close of the action. We maintained our position without serious loss.

"The conduct of Capt. Brown, of First Maryland, Potomac Home Brigade, and his command merits special notice; they successfully maintained their skirmish line against a superior force to the close, and resisted several charges of the enemy.

"Capt. Alexander, with his officers and men, behaved in the most gallant manner, serving their guns with great coolness and effect. I desire particularly to call the commanding general’s attention to their conduct during the three days we were in front of the enemy.

"The One Hundred and Forty-ninth Ohio and three companies of the One Hundred and Forty-fourth Ohio National Guards, under Col. Brown, considering their inexperience, behaved well, successfully resisting several charges of the enemy.

"Col. Gilpin’s regiment, with the three companies of the First Maryland, Potomac Home Brigade, that were assigned him, although serving in detachments along an extended line, fully sustained the enviable reputation they had won on Thursday.

"The Eleventh Maryland was not brought into action, but was exposed for a time to the artillery fire of the enemy.

"The cavalry was placed under the direction of Lient.-Col. Clendenin, who will furnish a separate report; and I would very respectfully call the attention of the major-general to this gallant and valuable officer and the officers and men serving under him. They certainly acquitted themselves with great credit.

"A force of the enemy’s cavalry came down upon me while on the right of the line near the stone bridge, and forced me, Capt. Webb and Lient. Gobleborough, of my staff, into the woods surrounding us, and, with their persistent watchfulness, prevented our following the column for nearly three days.
"To the officers of my staff—Capt. W. H. Wiegel, Capt. F. J. D. Webb, and Lieuts. Goldsborough, George W. Stacyman, and R. E. Smith—I am greatly indebted for their untiring efforts and energy during the whole movement. Capt. Wiegel in the heat of the engagement took command of the twenty-four-pounder howitzer on the bank of the river, serving it with marked courage and ability, and with telling effect upon the enemy. His conduct must have been observed by the commanding general.

I send you herewith a list of the casualties, as far as we are able to obtain them at this time.

Very respectfully submitted.

"E. B. Tyler, Brig.-Gen., Comdg."

REPORT OF CAPT. CHARLES J. BROWN, FIRST MARYLAND, POTOMAC HOME BRIGADE.

"HEADQUARTERS, FORT WORTHINGTON, July 20, 1864.

"Capt. R. H. Oftley, A.A.G. Defenses of Baltimore.

"Captain,—I have the honor to submit the following report of my command at the battle of the Monocacy. My two companies, C and K, First Maryland Regiment, Potomac Home Brigade, were occupying at the commencement of the fight the blockhouse on the west side of the Monocacy, which I, in obedience to orders from the general commanding, evacuated and burned. I was then ordered to hold the bridge over the railroad on the Georgetown pike, one company of the Twelfth Vermont Infantry, and one company of the Ninth New York Heavy Artillery being added to my command. This position I held until the left of our army fell back, when, having received a discretionary order to fall back while I could do so with safety, I left my position, fell back across the railroad bridge, and occupied the rifle-pits on the east side of the Monocacy, covering the retreat of our army for a short time, and then following the line of march until my command was increased by Companies B, G, and H, First Maryland, Potomac Home Brigade, by being added to it at Elliott's Mills, where I was furnished transportation to Baltimore, Sunday, July 19th, and ordered to report to Col. Gilpin, commanding First Separate Brigade, Col. Gilpin being in command of Fort Worthington. On Wednesday, July 13th, Col. Gilpin being ordered elsewhere, I was placed in command of the fort, which I now occupy with Companies B, C, G, H, and K of the First Maryland Regiment, Potomac Home Brigade.

I have the honor to be,

Very respectfully,

"Charles J. Brown,

The loss of the Third Regiment, Potomac Home Brigade, at the battle of Monocacy was two killed, seven wounded, four missing, and ten captured.

After the defeat of Wallace the Confederates had everything their own way. Small parties traversed the country in every direction without opposition, collecting forage, grain, horses, and army supplies of all sorts. Gen. Early, after burying his dead and caring for his wounded at the Monocacy, on the morning of the 10th took up his line of march towards Washington, and made twenty miles that day, camping within four miles of Rockville.

On Sunday afternoon, July 10th, at about three o'clock, the Federal forces, numbering about twelve hundred, passed through Rockville, closely pursued by the Confederate advance, consisting of a brigade of cavalry, numbering some sixteen hundred, under the command of Gen. McCausland. Of this latter force several hundred constituted "pressmen," who scoured the adjacent farms in search of horses, which they appropriated "without money and without price." They made no distinction between citizens on the ground of sympathy.

On Monday, the 11th, Early resumed his march, and appeared before the defenses of Washington on the Seventh Street pike. His force at this time had been reduced to eight thousand infantry, one thousand cavalry, and forty pieces of artillery, manned by about seven hundred men. The rest of his cavalry force had been detached at Frederick on the 9th, under Gen. Bradley T. Johnson, with special orders from Gen. Lee to destroy the communication between Baltimore and the north, threaten Baltimore, break the railroad and cut the telegraph wires between Baltimore and Washington, and thence move on Point Lookout, so as to attack on the morning of the 12th, when an attack was also to be made on the bay side. After releasing the prisoners, some fifteen thousand, Gen. Johnson was to take command of them and rejoin Early at Bladensburg, while that general was in the mean time to attack Washington and carry it by assault. As soon as Early's movements in the neighborhood of Washington were disclosed, however, Gen. Kenly, Gen. Rawlings, and most of the regular troops engaged in the defenses of Baltimore hastened to Washington and manned the fortifications.

Johnson moved his whole force to Cockeysville, and after destroying the bridges there he detached the First and Second Maryland Cavalry under Gilmor, and directed that officer to burn the railroad bridges over the Bush and Gunpowder Rivers. At Texas, Baltimore Co., on the line of the Northern Central Railway, the telegraph wires were cut and poles pulled down; the bridge above Cockeysville was destroyed and a portion of the track torn up; the Hanover bridge was destroyed, and two others south of the junction; the bridge at Ashland was burnt and the telegraph wires cut. After operating with the greatest boldness on the north of Baltimore, the Confederates pushed across the country, cutting the telegraph wires.

1 The damage done in the Medley district of Montgomery was greater than in any other part of the county. About fifteen hundred head of cattle were seized, which in some instances were paid for in Confederate money at the rate of twenty cents a pound. A few farmers saved some of their cattle by driving them into the woods. The merchants in Poolsville suffered heavily.

on the Harford and Philadelphia turnpikes. A small detachment came down Charles Street Avenue and burned the country house of Governor Bradford, five miles from Baltimore, with all his household furniture, valuable library, paintings, etc. This was done in retaliation for Gen. Hunter's destruction of Governor Letter's residence at Lexington, Va., in his movement upon Lynchburg. The main body of the Confederate cavalry passed on by the Joppa road, and struck the Philadelphia Railroad at Magnolia Station, eighteen miles from Baltimore. Here they captured the morning express-train from Baltimore, turned the passengers out, and setting fire to the cars ran the train back upon the bridge over the Gunpowder River. The burning train set fire to the bridge, which was much damaged. In one of the cars Maj.-Gen. William B. Franklin, who was going North from Baltimore, was recognized and taken prisoner; but he afterwards escaped. The Confederates captured a way train, which they also destroyed. In their movements in the neighborhood of Baltimore, they visited Towsontown, Reisterstown, Relay House, Mount Washington, Texas, Randallstown, Union Bridge, and other points, helping themselves to whatever they fancied, especially horses.

In a recent narrative of the Maryland campaign of 1864, Gen. Johnson gives the following account of his subsequent operations:

"While these events were taking place I was pressing in hot haste through Howard and Montgomery Counties. I reached Tredalphia about nine o'clock that night, and unsaddled and fed my horses and let the men get a little sleep. By twelve o'clock I received information that a large force of Federal cavalry had gone into camp since my arrival at Brookeville, only a few miles out. I at once got ready and started to attack them, but on reaching the point found that they, too, had information of our unobserved neighbors and had left. Thence I moved to Beltsville, on the railroad between Baltimore and Washington. There I found about one thousand cavalry of Wilson's division, which had been dismounted in a recent raid in lower Virginia and sent North to reorganize. They were mounted on green horses, and we drove them, after a short affair, down the road towards Bladensburg. It was now the morning of Tuesday, the 12th. I was due that night at Point Lookout, the extreme southeast point of Maryland, in St. Mary's County. It was physically impossible for men to make the ride in the time designated. I determined, however, to come as near it as possible. I sent an officer with a detachment to ride at speed through the country, impressing fresh horses all the way, and inform the people along the route that I was coming. They were unanimously my friends, and I requested them to have their horses on the roadside, so I could exchange my broken-down animals for their fresh ones, and thus borrow them for the occasion. During the preceding day I had been taking horses by flanking on each side of my column, and kept a supply of fresh ones at the rear of each regiment. As soon as a man's horse broke down he fell out of the ranks, walked until the rear of his regiment came up, got a fresh horse, left his old one, and resumed his place. By this means I was enabled to march at a trot, which with a cavalry column is impossible for any length of time without breaking down horses, and broken-down horses speedily break down men. With fresh horses, however, I hoped to make a rapid march and get to Point Lookout early on the morning of the 13th.

"After returning from the pursuit of Wilson's cavalry, I turned the head of the column towards Upper Marlboro', and had proceeded only a short time when I was overtaken by a courier from Gen. Early. He brought me orders to report at once to headquarters at Silver Spring, on the Seventh Street road. I moved down the Washington road to the Agricultural College, and thence along the line of the Federal pickets, marching all night, occasionally driving in a picket, and expecting at any moment to be fired upon from the woods, within range of which I was moving. I reported to Gen. Early after midnight and found the whole army in retreat. I was directed to close up the rear, with Jackson's cavalry brigade behind me. We reached Rockville during the day, where Jackson was pushed by the Second Massachusetts Cavalry, who hung on his rear and rendered things very uncomfortable generally. Finding matters getting disagreeable, I put in a squadron of the First Maryland, under Capt. Wilson G. Nichols and Lieut. Thomas Crew, and charged into the town, scattering our pursuers, who got out of the way with expedition. Their dismounted men, however, stuck to the houses and fences and poured in a galling fire. The dust was so thick that the men in their charge could not see the houses in front of them. The horses of Nichols and Crew were killed, and their riders wounded and taken prisoners. As soon as this loss was discovered, I put in another charge and recaptured Crew, but was unable to retake Nicholas, whom they had mounted on a spare horse and ran off the field.

"During the rest of the 13th our pursuers treated us with more respect. All night long we marched and stopped, and stopped and marched, with that terrible tedious delay and iteration so wearing to men and horses, and it was not until Thursday, the 14th, we reached Poolesville. Here we were obliged to stand and keep back the pursuit while the infantry and artillery were passing over the Potomac. I got my artillery in position and deployed a strong skirmish-line in front of Poolesville, and checked the enemy for several hours. At last, in the afternoon, a wide line of skirmishers could be seen stretching far beyond each end of those we had been engaged with, and which moved steadily forward with a steady alignment very unusual for dismounted cavalry. I sent for Gen. Ramson to come up to my position, that the infantry had arrived, and that it was about time for the cavalry to leave. He soon joined me, and while we were looking at the advancing line through our glasses, which showed their cartridge-boxes and cantoons plainly, puff! puff! puff! went their fire all along the line. There was no mistaking the sound. The wish of the minie-ball was so clear and so evident that it could not possibly come from carbines. We held on nevertheless, making a great show with the artillery and repeated attempts to charge them with cavalry, so that we delayed them until supports could deploy.

"By this time, however, the enemy had become far advanced, and having been notified that everything, including my own ordnance and baggage-train, had crossed, I withdrew comfortably and got into Virginia about sundown. We had been marching, working, and fighting from daybreak, July 9th, until sundown, July 14th, four days and a half, or about one hundred and eight hours. We had unsaddled only twice during that time, with a halt of from four to five hours each time, making nearly one hundred hours of marching. We had isolated Baltimore from the North and cut off Washington from the United States, having made a circuit from Frederick to Cockeysville.
to the east, to Beltsville on the south, and through Rockville and Poolesville towards the west. We had failed in the main object of the expedition, which was to relieve the prisoners at Point Lookout, convert them into a new army, capture Wash-ington, establish our communications across the Potomac by Manassas Junction with Gordonville and Richmond, and by making this a new base of operations force Grant to let go his bold and come to the rescue of Pennsylvania. I have always considered the movement one the audacity of which was its safety, and that no higher military skill was displayed on either side than that shown by Gen. Early in this daring at- tempt to surprise the capital of his enemy with so small a force."

Early had arranged all his plans for an assault upon the defenses of Washington at daylight on the 12th, but during the night received a dispatch from Gen. Johnson informing him that the Sixth and Nine-teenth Federal Corps had reached Baltimore some time before and were moving to the defense of Wash-ington. This caused Gen. Early to defer his contempl-ated assault, and as soon as it was light he rode to the front and found the fortifications lined with troops in every direction. He therefore abandoned his de-sign, and, as has already been stated, immediately sent an order to Gen. Johnson to join him without delay, which he did early the next morning at the house of Francis P. Blair, Sr., Silver Springs, Mont-gomery Co.

During Gen. Early's absence from Virginia, Gen. Hunter had been plundering, burning, and destroying, in his usual style of warfare, without check. The Federal troops had also burned and devastated towns and villages in other parts of the South, and, as far as could be seen, public sentiment at the North approved this mode of conducting the war. Gen. Early therefore determined to follow these examples by way of retaliation. Chambersburg, in Pennsyl-vania, was selected for the sacrifice, and thither Gen. McCausland was ordered to proceed with his cavalry brigade and that of Gen. Bradley T. Johnson and a battery of four guns, and demand of the municipal authorities the sum of one hundred thousand dollars in gold, or five hundred thousand dollars in United States currency, as a compensation for the wanton outrages of Gen. Hunter in the Valley of Virginia, and in default of payment to lay the town in ashes. On the 29th of July, McCausland crossed the Potomac near Clear Spring, above Williamsport, while Vaughan drove a cavalry force from Williamsport and entered Hagerstown, where he captured and destroyed a train of cars loaded with supplies. Several infantry divisions also crossed the Potomac at Shepherdstown, and took positions at Sharpsburg, to be within sup-porting distance. On the 30th of July, McCausland reached Chambersburg, and made the demand as di-rected. It was not complied with, and the greater part of the town was burned.

McCausland then moved in the direction of Cumber-land, but finding it defended by a force under Gen. Kelley, after a slight skirmish at Folke's Mill, about two miles from the town, withdrew towards Hamp-shire County, Va., and crossed the Potomac near the mouth of the South Branch. He then moved to Moorefield, in Hardy County, where he was overtaken by Gen. Averill, who had been in pursuit since he left Chambersburg, and his entire command was routed and his four pieces of artillery captured. The remnants of the command finally made their way to Mount Jackson in great disorder.¹

On Saturday, August 6th, business was still sus-pended in Cumberland, and a feverish uncertainty pervaded the public mind as to the whereabouts and intentions of the Confederates. Official information told, however, that the force which attacked New Creek was retreating towards Moorefield, pursued by the Federals.

The railroad west was intact, trains running regu-larly, and in a day or two trains were expected to run east to Hancock, the road having sustained no damage this side of Sleepy Creek. The residents in the neighborhood of Flintstone had had another scare, caused by a report that the Confederates had again made their appearance at Green Spring, but the new-comers proved to be Federals.

On Sunday, the 7th, the city wore its usual Sab-bath sedateness. The war rumors were numerous. One placed Gen. Breckenridge in strong force at Romney, while a contradictory report said Averill was there; another said Breckenridge was making for Beverly, W. Va.; another asserted that Early had crossed the Potomac and established his headquarters at Hagerstown. On Sunday night a detachment of Averill's and DeFoe's cavalry reached Cumberland from Hancock, bringing fifteen Confederate prisoners. On Monday, the 8th, a new excitement seemed to have possessed a portion of the citizens, who packed up and sent off their goods, under the stimulus of a report that the Confederates had again entered Mary-land.

Monday afternoon the One Hundred and Fifty-second Ohio Regiment, Col. Putnam, paraded the streets, and in the evening a meeting of the citizens was held to make preparations for a demonstration of gratitude to the military for their noble and successful defense of the city on Monday, the 1st. Gen. Kelley having, in compliance with the request of the mass-meeting, designated Thursday as a convenient time for a street parade.

On Tuesday, August 9th, the city was unusually quiet, but some of the merchants continued to ship their goods, feeling that Cumberland was even then a very unsafe place. A train that day went east, loaded with lumber, workmen, and a guard, with a view to repair bridges, etc., along the line. The citizens were greatly elated at the confirmation of the rout of McCausland's and Bradley T. Johnson's forces by Gen. Averill, and the recapture of horses and a large amount of plunder, and were likewise pleased that Gen. Sheridan had been placed in command of the division of the country embracing the departments of West Virginia and Susquehanna and the Middle Department.

Thursday, August 11th, was a day of jubilee in Cumberland. Assurances the day before by telegraph that the Confederates had all left Maryland allayed considerably the fears of the business men, some of whom began to bring back their goods. Flags floated in all directions, and preparations were going on for the grand demonstration of thanks to the military, Gen. Kelley having appointed a parade for the afternoon, at the request of the citizens through their town-meeting held on the 5th.

According to the programme, the troops stationed at the post, and who participated in the late defense of the city, were drawn up in line on the old race-ground. Gen. Kelley having arrived on the ground, the review took place, in which the citizen-soldiers were assigned their position. After passing in review they resumed their position in line; the column was then brought into close column, and the thanks of the people of Cumberland tendered to the brave defenders.

In consequence of the sympathy displayed by certain persons in Frederick County towards the command of Gen. Early and his troops, Gen. Hunter issued the following characteristic order:

"HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT WESTERN VIRGINIA, "HARPERS' FERRY, July 18, 1864." "Maj. John J. Yellott, First Maryland P. R. R. Infantry, "Commanding officer, Frederick, Md.: "Maj.,—Your communication of this date relating to persons in Frederick City, Md., having pointed out to the rebels during their late raid the property of Union citizens, and otherwise manifested their sympathy with the enemy, has been submitted to the major-general commanding the department.

"In reply he directs that you arrest at once all persons who are known by Union citizens to have given such information, and to send them, with their families, to this place under suitable guard, that the males may be sent to the military prison at Wheeling, W. Va., and their families beyond our lines South. You will seize their houses, to be used for hospitals, government offices, and store-houses, and for government purposes generally. Their furniture you will have sold at public auction for the benefit of Union citizens of the town who are known to have suffered loss of property from information given by these persons.

"The major-general commanding further directs that all male secessionists in Frederick, with their families, must be sent here at once. You will make the same disposition of their houses and furniture as has been directed already in this letter for the houses and furniture of those who gave information as to the property of Union men.

"I am, major, very respectfully, "Your obedient servant, "P. G. Den, "Assistant Adjutant-General." "To prevent infliction of such punishment as is specified in the above order, it is ordered that every male citizen of this town, and that portion of Frederick County lying within the limits of the department of West Virginia, shall appear at this office between the hours of eight o'clock A.M. and five o'clock P.M., beginning on the 25th day of July, 1864, and ending on the 30th day of July, 1864, and subscribe to an oath of allegiance to the government of the United States. In default of thus appearing and swearing allegiance to the national government, all persons thus failing will be regarded as secessionists and treated as directed in the above order.

"John J. Yellott, "Major Commanding Post and Provost-Marshal." In pursuance of this order many of the most respectable citizens of Frederick County, male and female, were seized and imprisoned or driven from their houses and sent within the Confederate lines.

It having been alleged that the Confederates during their invasion of the State had destroyed the barn of one Thomas Harris, Gen. Wallace assessed the following persons residing in the Liberty District, Frederick County, for the amounts set opposite their respective names to indemnify him for his loss:

1 Lowdermilk's "History of Cumberland."
With McCausland's raid hostile operations in Western Maryland virtually ceased, and with the exception of a brilliant dash by the Confederates into Cumberland in the winter of 1865, little more of military importance occurred in that section during the remainder of the war.

After the death of Capt. John Hanson McNeill, mortally wounded near Mount Jackson bridge, in the Valley of Virginia, Oct. 4, 1864, in a charge on a company of the Twelfth Pennsylvania Cavalry, his son Jesse, first lieutenant of the company, determined to capture Maj.-Gen. Crook and Kelley, then in command of the Federal forces at Cumberland.

S. S. Lynn, a native of the place, having previously penetrated into the very heart of the city on four different occasions, obtained thorough information as to the number of troops in Cumberland, the location of the various headquarters, pickets, etc., and reported to Maj. Harry Gilmor, stationed at Moorefield, W. Va., John B. Fay and C. Ritchie Hallar, a young Missourian, were sent by McNeill to procure similar information, which they obtained through George Stanton, in the employ of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. With this fund of knowledge they returned and reported the facts to Lieut. McCauley. The command, then in camp ten miles north of Moorefield, was ordered about noon on the 21st of February, 1865, to march rapidly towards Cumberland, a distance of fifty miles. Crossing the South Branch of the Potomac near Romney, and feeding their horses at the house of Boss Herrod, a farmer, the command crossed Middle Ridge and struck the Nobley Mountain road at its base, and crossed the mountain to the North Branch of the Potomac at a point five miles from Cumberland. Here the command was halted almost within pistol-range of a cavalry picket. A portion of the command, composed of Lieut. McNeill, Fay, Lynn, Vandiver, Kuykendall, Dailey, and Nichols, went to the house of S. D. Brady, where a consultation was held. Here it is alleged McNeill's courage failed him, and he proposed to capture the pickets and return, and gave as a reason that he was afraid it was too late to do more than this before daylight.

Fay and Lynn vehemently opposed this, and the command was speedily pushed forward again. Lynn here took the advance alone, with the advance-guard in hailing distance in his rear. Just below the three-mile water-station on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad the first cavalry picket post, composed of three men, was encountered. "Halt! Who comes there?" "Friend, without the countersign, bearing important dispatches to Gen. Kelley," was Lynn's response. "Dismount, advance, and give the countersign." The words hardly escaped the sentinel's lips before Lynn dashed by the astonished picket and reined up where the two in reserve were quietly sleeping, who were ordered to surrender, which they promptly did. Putting a pistol in each boot, the prisoners were halted in the road until the command came up. A pistol-shot fired by McNeill at the first sentinel passed bad but one meaning, which was to retrace their steps; and again the proposition was made, and as promptly repelled by Fay and Lynn. With one voice the whole sixty-five men, composed of Marylanders and Virginians, whispered, "Go ahead; we will follow." At this juncture the command virtually devolved on Fay and Lynn, and the command was ordered forward. Lynn again placed himself in the advance, and at the junction of the river road and the old pike the second picket post was encountered. Again rang out on the frosty air, "Halt! Who comes there?" "Friend, with the countersign." "Dismount, advance, and give the countersign," demanded the sentinel on duty. The countersign having been obtained from the three first pickets, Lynn dismounted, and leading his horse walked to the sentinel and whispered "Bull's Gap" in his ear. "All right," replied the sentinel. Lynn then ordered the advance forward, and quickly the astonished infantry pickets, six in number, were ordered to surrender, which summons they promptly obeyed, and trying the ramrod in each barrel of the guns, it was discovered that every gun was empty, and that the hammer of the pistol of the first sentinel could not be raised. The guns were placed on the comfortable log fire burning in front of their quarters and destroyed, and the command again ordered forward.

Lynn here overheard a conversation between McNeill, Kuykendall, and Vandiver, placing the former in command of a party of ten men to secure Gen. Kelley, and the latter, with ten men, to secure Gen. Crook, the previous arrangement being that Lynn was to capture Kelley, and Fay, Crook, a compensation for services rendered as scouts. Lynn communicated these facts to Fay, who was so incensed at the duplicity practiced that he simply remarked, "I can stand it if he can."

Passing down Green Street, a company of regulars were passed who were encamped in an old brick house on the Potomac, near the present water-works. As the command moved forward an interchange of words passed as to the state of the weather, their destination, etc. Reaching the iron bridge across Will's Creek, Lynn selected John Dailey, Charles Nichols, and Charlyle to accompany him on foot up Baltimore Street. Their horses were led by friends in the command, and hurrying ahead of the command, Lynn and his followers hastened to the St. Nicholas Hotel.

Leaving the men at the steps of Alpheus Beall's, he went alone to the hotel. Here he saw an orderly sergeant leaning against the railing at the entrance of the house. Across George's Street he also discovered the sentinel pacing his beat in front of Gen. Kelley's headquarters at the old Barnum House. How to capture the sergeant without being observed by the sentinel was the question to solve. The thought then flashed into his mind that the advance of the column would naturally attract the sentinel's attention, and he would advance to the entrance to ask questions, etc. So Lynn walked to the curb and awaited results. Soon the tramp of horses was heard, and the sergeant took up his position alongside of Lynn, who, placing his left hand on his shoulder, covered him with his pistol and ordered him to surrender, which he did by saying, "I have no arms."

Lynn told him to lead him to Kelley's room, and being joined by his companions, they proceeded across the street, walked up to the sentinel, disarmed him, and entered the hall leading to the general's room. Ascending the stairway and reaching the top, the sergeant said, "Through this door you will enter Adjutant Thayer Melvin's room, and through a door in his room you will enter the general's." Lynn opened the door, and to the left lay the sleeping form of the adjutant. Stepping to his bedside, Lynn caught him by the shoulder, raised him up, and ordered him to speedily dress, that he was a prisoner in the hands of the Confederates. A guard was left with him, and Lynn then entered the general's room, and found him sound asleep. Rousing him in like manner, the general indignantly demanded what he wanted, Lyn entered himself, and taking in the situation the general made a hasty toilet, and the two were guarded to the pavement below, where both were mounted up behind some of the men.

Meantime a similar scene was being enacted at the Revere House, where General Crook was sleeping in fancied security. James Dailey sent word that he had secured Gen. Crook, soon joined the command, drawn up in line in front of the old Barnum Hotel, and the command was ordered to retrace their steps down Baltimore Street. Lynn mounted his horse, and rode rapidly down the street to the stables near the bridge, where the staff horses were quartered. Riding into the yard he secured the sentinel guarding the stables, and calling to the men, they secured eight of the finest horses, among them Gen. Kelley's horse "Philippi." Taking the tow-path, they encountered about twenty pickets stationed at the dam, whom they captured, throwing their arms into the river. Reaching Wiley's Ford, three miles below town, they were halted by another picket, who was stationed behind a stone wall leading to the bridge across the canal. The fourth time the sentinel called upon the retreating Confederates to halt he called to the sergeant of the guard, and said, "Sergeant, I have halted four times; they won't stop; I am going to shoot." The sergeant then stepped forward and said, "Who are you?" "Gen. Crook's body-guard on a scout; in a hurry; 'reb's' near town." The sergeant replied, "All right; go ahead and give them hell." Passing quickly under the bridge and across the river, orders were given to keep well closed up, and a guard placed in the rear to prevent straggling. Shortly after the departure the alarm was given and a company of mounted men went in pursuit. The fugitives were overtaken near Romney, and a skirmish followed, but the prisoners were beyond recapture. Taking the old Trough Hollow road, the command soon came in sight of Moorefield, where they had hoped to exhibit the prisoners to the people of that hospitable town and procure supplies. Their attention being attracted across the river, it was soon discovered that a force had been sent from New Creek to intercept them and, if possible, recapture the generals. Lynn was ordered to the ford at the river to hold them in check until the command, by a flank movement to the left, gained the mountain and left Moorefield far to the right. The Federals drove Lynn and his men, who kept the road, before them to Moorefield, and thus the recapture of the generals was frustrated. This event caused much excitement throughout the country, and was commented upon largely in every direction. The captured officers were sent to Richmond, and shortly afterwards exchanged.1

The capture of Gen. Crook and Kelley was one of the last exploits of the war. On the 3d of April, 1865, Gen. Lee's lines at Petersburg were broken, and on the 9th the remnant of the Confederate army was surrendered to Gen. Grant at Appomattox Court House. Five days after the surrender of Lee the country was shocked by the intelligence of the assassination of President Lincoln and the attempted murder of members of his cabinet. The news was received in Western Maryland, as it was throughout the land, with a universal feeling of regret and indignation, and men of all parties joined heartily in deploiring the untimely end of the Chief Magistrate of the nation, and in denouncing the crime of which he was the victim.

The excited state of feeling growing out of the assassination of the President and the return of Confederate paroled prisoners led in Baltimore and elsewhere to intemperate measures, and it was therefore considered desirable to define the legal status and rights of those who had recently been serving in the armies of the Confederacy. At the request of the War Department, Attorney-General Speed, on the 24th of April, 1865, gave an opinion in regard to certain paroled Confederate prisoners whose homes before the war had been in the States north of the Potomac. By the terms of the agreement entered into by Gens. Grant and Lee, all the officers and men of Lee's army were to be allowed to return to their homes, and were not to be disturbed by the United States authorities so long as they observed their parole and the laws in force at the place of their residence.

Attorney-General Speed, however, held that this agreement did not apply to Confederate soldiers from Maryland and other States north of the Potomac, and in accordance with this opinion Maj.-Gen. Wallace issued an order directing the commanding officers and provost-marshal in the Middle Department to arrest and hold in confinement all Confederate officers, soldiers, and citizens who had returned to their former homes to await exchange, and to report each case to headquarters for such disposition as might be directed by the government at Washington. In accordance with this order a large number of ex-Confederates were arrested "for coming into this department without authority," and upon taking the oath of allegiance were sent North, where they were tolerated. On the 18th of July, 1865, Gen. Winfield S. Hancock assumed command of the Middle Department, embracing the States of West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, excepting the counties of Anne Arundel, Prince George, Calvert, Charles, and St. Mary's. On the 2d of August, Gen. Hancock issued an order requiring "paroled prisoners of the late rebel armies who have not been pardoned by the President of the United States," upon arriving within the limits of the department, to report their presence and residence immediately to the nearest provost-marshal and register their names, and announcing that paroled prisoners non-residents of the department would not be allowed to remain in it without the sanction of the department commander or higher authority.

On the 12th of January, 1866, another military order was issued, in which it was announced that,—

"The provost-marshal's office will cease to exist in this command on the 31st of January. Brevet Brig.

Gen. John Woolley, United States Volunteers, provost-marshal, will take measures to close the books and records pertaining to his office upon that date, and turn them over to the adjutant-general of the department." In accordance with this order all the books, papers, and records of the office of the provost-marshal-general of the Middle Department of the Eighth Army Corps were turned over on the 31st of January, 1866, to Adam E. King, brevet colonel, adjutant-general of the Middle Military Department. The closing of the provost-marshal's department in Baltimore closed the reign of the military commanders in Maryland. President Johnson had, on June 23, 1865, rescinded the blockade proclamations issued April 15 and 17, 1861; on Aug. 29, 1865, he had removed further restrictions, and on the 1st of December following he annulled the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, and finally, on the 2d of April, 1866, formally announced by proclamation that the Rebellion had ended.

CHAPTER XV.

RECORD OF MARYLAND VOLUNTEERS IN THE UNION ARMY IN THE WAR OF 1861-65.

General Statistics.—From the beginning to the close of the late civil strife the number of organizations put into the service of the United States by the State of Maryland was three regiments, two battalions, and one independent company of cavalry, six batteries of light artillery, and nineteen regiments and one independent company of infantry. There were also three incomplete regiments,—viz.: the Baltimore (or Dix) Light Infantry, Fourth Potomac Home Brigade, and the original Fourth Infantry, or German Riflemen,—which having failed to perfect an organization were consolidated with other commands.

This entire force, with the respective original commanders and the term of service for which mustered, is thus enumerated:

Three Years.
First Cavalry, Col. Andrew G. Miller.
First Cavalry (Potomac Home Brigade), Col. Henry A. Cole.
Third Cavalry (Bradford Dragoons), Col. C. Carroll Tevis.
Independent Company Cavalry, Capt. G. W. P. Smith.
Battery D, Light Artillery, Capt. John M. Bruce.

First Infantry, Col. John R. Kent.
The Fourth, Seventh, Ninth, Nineteenth, Thirtieth, and Thirty-ninth United States Colored Infantry Regiments and Battery B of the Second Light Artillery were wholly recruited in Maryland. Besides these, many men enlisted in the State were assigned to regiments raised elsewhere. The regiments thus receiving recruits from Maryland were the First and Second Cavalry, First, Second, Sixth, Eighth, Tenth, Twenty-third, Twenty-eighth, Twenty-ninth, Thirty-first, Thirty-sixth, Thirty-eighth, Forty-first, Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, One Hundred and Second, One Hundred and Ninth, One Hundred and Fourteenth, One Hundred and Fifteenth, and One Hundred and Sixteenth Infantry. In the Twenty-eighth, Twenty-ninth, and Thirty-eighth Regiments Maryland was largely represented.

These organizations were mustered directly into the service of the United States, and were commanded by officers acting under the authority of the general government, and not of any particular State. But few Marylanders held commissions in this branch of the service.

The credits allowed for men furnished under the different calls were as follows:

1 In the compilation of this summary of battles, etc., it was found impracticable in many instances to designate with exactness the particular companies or detachments where such only were engaged, therefore the whole command has uniformly been given credit for the action. HISTORICAL OUTLINES.

INFANTRY.

First Regiment of Infantry.— Under the President's call of May 3, 1861, the Hon. James Cooper, of Frederick City, was appointed a brigadier-general, and assigned by the Secretary of War to the duty of raising and organizing the volunteers from Maryland. Recruiting-offices were immediately opened in Baltimore City and elsewhere, and vigorous measures instituted for the enlistment of men.

The first company (A) was enrolled by Capt. John C. McConnell at Baltimore. This officer is unquestionably entitled to the credit of having opened the first recruiting-office for three years' volunteers in the State of Maryland.

Company B was recruited by Capt. F. G. F. Waltemeyer at Baltimore; C, by Capt. George Smith at Baltimore; D, by Capt. Charles W. Wright at Baltimore; E, by Capt. Thomas R. Evans at Baltimore; F, by Capt. Robert W. Reynolds at Ellict's Mills; G, by Capt. John W. Wilson, chiefly at Cockeysville.

Company H, commanded by Capt. Benjamin H. Schley, was formed by the consolidation of two detachments of about equal strength, one raised by Capt. Schley at Frederick, and the other by Capt. William H. Taylor at Baltimore.

Company I was organized by Capt. Lemuel Z. Lyon at Baltimore, and K, commanded by Capt. T. S. J. Johnson, was composed principally of Germans, recruited in Baltimore and Washington.

By the 28th of May a sufficient number of men for one regiment had been enrolled, and on that date the organization of the First Infantry was completed at Elkridge Landing (the place of general rendezvous, whither all the companies had been previously ordered) by its acceptance into the service of the United States for three years unless sooner discharged.

The muster in of the several companies dated as follows: A, May 10th; B and C, May 11th; D, May 16; E, May 20th; F, G, H, and I, May 27th; and K, May 28th.

On the 11th of June the field-officers of the regiment were appointed by the President.

The colonelcy was bestowed on John R. Kenly, a lawyer of Baltimore, who had seen active field service in Mexico, and at this time held a commission as brigadier-general of Maryland militia. Nathan T. Dushane, of Baltimore, was commissioned as lieutenant-colonel, and George Chorpenning, of Pennsylvania, as major. Dr. Thomas E. Mitchell, of Ellict's Mills, was appointed surgeon, and Dr. Edward R. Baer, of Baltimore, assistant surgeon.

The company officers as originally mustered in were as follows:

- Company A.—Capt. John C. McConnell, Lieuts. George W. Kulger and David C. Huxford.
- Company D.—Capt. Charles W. Wright, Lieuts. Fredk. C. Tarr (regimental adjutant) and Christopher C. Gillingham.
- Company E.—Capt. Thos. R. Evans, Lieuts. Robert A. Morris (regimental quartermaster) and Wm. T. Hillyard.
- Company K.—Capt. Thos. S. J. Johnson, Lieuts. N. G. Sturkweather and Julius Veidt.

Col. Kenly was promoted to brigadier-general Aug. 22, 1862, for gallant conduct at Front Royal. His successors were Nathan T. Dushane, who was killed at the battle of the Weldon Railroad, Aug. 21, 1864; John W. Wilson, killed in action at Dabney's Mill, Va., Feb. 6, 1865, and David L. Stanton, mustered out with the regiment. The latter rose from the ranks, having entered the service in May, 1861, as first sergeant of Company A.

During the winter of 1863 and 1864 a large majority of the original members re-enlisted as veterans, by which act the organization of the regiment was preserved till the end of the war.

The following is a list of the actions in which the regiment, as a whole or in part, was engaged:

2. Skirmish at Shepherdstown, Va., Sept. 9, 1861.
The regiment served in the Department of Annapolis and Department of the Shenandoah from its muster in to Aug. 17, 1861; Banks' division, Army of the Potomac, to Feb. 18, 1862; Third Brigade, Banks' division, Army of the Potomac, to March, 1862; First Brigade, First Division, Fifth Army Corps, to June 8, 1862; Middle Department, Eighth Army Corps, to July 11, 1863; Third Brigade, Third Division, First Army Corps, to January, 1864; Second Brigade, Third Division, First Army Corps, to March 23, 1864; Third Brigade, Second Division, Fifth Army Corps, to June 6, 1864; Second Brigade, Second Division, Fifth Army Corps, to June, 1865; and First Brigade, Second Division, Fifth Army Corps, to July 2, 1865.

After four years of arduous campaigning in Western Maryland and Western Virginia, in the Shenandoah Valley, and with the Army of the Potomac in Virginia, up to the surrender at Appomattox, the regiment finally took up its line of march homeward, leaving the scenes and employments of war for those of peace.

On the 2d day of July, 1865, it was mustered out of service at its camp on Arlington Heights, near Alexandria, Va. The next day it proceeded to Camp Bradford, near Baltimore, where final payments were received, and with an earnest "Well done, good and faithful servants," from the hearts of a grateful people, the officers and men repaired to their homes, once more to join their fellow-citizens in cultivating the arts of peace.

From first to last the regiment had within its ranks 2317 officers and men. Of this number 86 were killed or mortally wounded, 118 died of disease, and 255 received wounds which did not prove fatal.

No regiment from the State won a prouder name or made a more honorable record than the old veteran First. Along the banks of the Upper Potomac, in the Valley of the Shenandoah, and wherever the old Army of the Potomac met the Confederates subsequent to their bloody repulse on the rocky heights of Gettysburg, there lie its dead.

Second Regiment of Infantry.—This regiment, like the First, was raised under the President's call of May 3, 1861. A few of the companies were mustered into the United States service in June, but the recruiting of several other regiments at the same time somewhat delayed the completion of the organization, and it was not until the month of September that the tenth company was mustered in. The dates of the muster in of the several companies were as follows: A, June 13th; B, June 18th; C, July 9th; D, July 10th; E, July 23d; F, August 8th; G, August 9th; H, I, and K, September 18th; all at Camp Carroll, Baltimore. Both officers and men were mainly from Baltimore City.

On the 8th of October, 1861, the field-officers were appointed by the President. John Summer, of Townsontown, a soldier of the Mexican war, was commissioned as colonel; J. Eugene Duryee, of New York, lieutenant-colonel; and David P. De Witt, of New York, as major. Lieut.-Col. Duryee had already seen some service as a company officer in the Fifth New York Zouave Regiment, and Maj. De Witt was a graduate of the West Point Military Academy.

The company officers, as originally constituted, were as follows:

- Company A.—Capt. Henry Howard, Jr., Lieuts. W. O. Bigelow (regimental adjutant) and James D. Spangler.
- Company E.—Capt. J. D. Stinchcomb, Lieuts. James A. Martin and James Cooper, Jr.

Edwin F. Morony was the surgeon, Joseph E. Beatty assistant surgeon, and Robert S. Hitchcock the chaplain.

Col. Sumner held his position until April 21, 1862, when he resigned, and was succeeded by Thomas B. Allard, of Baltimore, formerly lieutenant-colonel of the Dix Light Infantry, who also resigned Jan. 19, 1864. Subsequent to this the regiment had no colonel, its numerical strength, greatly reduced by hard service, not being sufficient, under the rules of the War Department, to entitle it to an officer of that grade. Lieut.-Col. Henry Howard was therefore the ranking officer of the regiment until July 30, 1864, when he was mortally wounded at the battle of "The Crater." He was succeeded by Benjamin F. Taylor, originally an enlisted man of Company B, who had risen step by step to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. This officer was promoted colonel, but not mustered as such.

In the spring of 1862 the Second joined the command of Gen. Burnside in North Carolina, and from that time forward it shared in all the operations of the Ninth Corps.

Its list of battles, skirmishes, etc., comprises the following:

Skirmish at Pollockville, N. C., May 16, 1862.
Skirmish at Clark's Mountain, Va., Aug. 18, 1862.
Skirmish at Kelly's Ford, Va., Aug. 21, 1862.

Storming of Petersburg, Va., April 2, 1865.
Surrender at Appomattox, Va., April 9, 1865.

The regiment served in Dix's division, Army of the Potomac, from muster in to March 26, 1862; First Brigade, Second Division, Department of North Carolina, July 22, 1862; First Brigade, Second Division, Ninth Army Corps, to April, 1863; First Division, Twenty-third Army Corps, to August, 1863; First Brigade, Second Division, Ninth Army Corps, to January, 1864; Second Brigade, Second Division, Ninth Army Corps, to May, 1864; and Second Brigade, Third Division, Ninth Army Corps, to July 17, 1865.

By the re-enlistment of three hundred and ten of the original members in the winter of 1863-64, the regiment secured its continuance in service as a veteran organization until the termination of hostilities.

After the surrender at Appomattox the Second turned its steps homeward, and was mustered out of service July 17, 1865, near Alexandria, Va. Thence it was transported to Baltimore, and there paid off and disbanded on the 25th of July, 1865.

Nothing can be found in the history of the Second Maryland which need cause any of its members to feel ashamed of the regiment in which they served. On the contrary, it has an imperishable record of gallant deeds and heroic sacrifices equal to any and second to none of its sister regiments, and of which every true soldier may well be proud.

Third Regiment of Infantry.—The organization of this regiment was commenced at Baltimore in August, 1861, by Col. John C. McConnell, under special authority from the Secretary of War. Five companies were raised and officered as follows:

On the 16th of February, 1862, four companies organized at Williamsport, Md., in the summer and autumn of 1861 for the First Virginia Union Volunteers, Col. Ward H. Lamon commanding, and containing many refugees from Jefferson and Berkeley Counties, Va., were assigned to the Third Regiment and designated as Companies A, B, C, and I. In consequence of this consolidation the original Companies A, B, C, and D became Companies D, E, F, and G respectively. The companies thus added to the regiment were originally officered as follows:

On the 11th of May, 1862, the companies bearing the designation of E, F, H, and I were broken up and the men distributed among Companies A, B, C, D, and G. These discontinued companies were replaced by four companies, comprising the members of the Fourth Maryland Infantry (German Rifles) and the Baltimore (or Dix) Light Infantry, both of which had failed to perfect their organization. The companies transferred from the Fourth Infantry were styled E and H, and those from the Dix Light Infantry, I and K.

As now constituted the regiment numbered nine companies, viz.: A, B, C, D, E, G, H, I, and K. A tenth company (F), composed of nine-months' drafted men, organized Oct. 15, 1862, at Easton, Talbot Co., was assigned in February, 1863. This company was mustered out of service Sept. 2, 1863.

Capt. John C. McConnell, of the First Maryland, was promoted colonel of the Third, Aug. 5, 1861, and served therewith until Feb. 18, 1862, when he was discharged.

Up to this time no other field-officers had been appointed. On the 29th of March, 1862, David P. De Witt, who had served as major of the Second Maryland, was commissioned colonel, and on the 7th of May, 1862, Joseph M. Sudsbury, the senior captain of the Fourth Maryland, was made lieutenant-colonel, and Capt. William B. Kennedy, of Company A, was promoted major.

At the date of Col. De Witt's appointment the staff-officers of the regiment stood as follows: Quartermaster, Richard F. Gardner; Adjutant, George H. Dobson; Surgeon, Alphonso A. White; Assistant Surgeon, James H. Currey; Chaplain, Samuel Kramer.

Col. De Witt was discharged Oct. 8, 1862, to accept the colonelcy of the One Hundred and Forty-third New York Volunteers, whereupon Lieut.-Col. Sudsbury was advanced to the colonelcy of the Third. He was mustered out June 24, 1864, in consequence of his command becoming reduced below the minimum standard of strength. Subsequently the ranking officer of the command was Lieut.-Col. Gilbert P. Robinson.

On the 24th of May, 1862, the Third abandoned Camp Belger and its associations for active field service, and proceeded to Harper's Ferry, Va., then endangered by the advance of "Stonewall" Jackson's army down the Shenandoah Valley. Here it became a part of Gen. Banks' command, subsequently better known as the Twelfth Army Corps, with which it performed most gallant and meritorious service in Maryland, Virginia, Tennessee, and Alabama, until the termination of its veteran furlough in April, 1864, when it joined the Ninth Army Corps, in the Army of the Potomac, and continued therewith to the close of the war. Two-thirds of the original members having enlisted as veterans after two years' service, its organization was maintained throughout the war and until the government had no further use for its services.

On the 24th of June, 1864, by reason of its greatly-reduced strength, the Third was consolidated into a battalion of four companies.—A, B, C, and D.

The command participated in the following engagements, etc.:

Skirmishes at Dam No. 5, Md., and Back Creek, Va., Dec. 6, 1861.

Skirmishes at Dam No. 5, Md., and Faulkwell's Ferry, Md., Dec. 7 and 8, 1861.

Defense of Harper's Ferry, Va., May 29 and 30, 1862.

Battle of Cedar Mountain, Va., Aug. 9, 1862.

Skirmish at Beverly Ford, Va., Aug. 20 and 21, 1862.

Battle of Antietam, Md., Sept. 17, 1862.

Reconnoissance from Lound Heights to Lovettsville, Va., Oct. 21 and 22, 1862.

Reconnoissance from Bolivar Heights to Rippon, Va., Nov. 9, 1862.

Reconnoissances from Bolivar Heights to Charlestown, Va., Nov. 26, 1862.

Battle of Gettysburg, Pa., July 1-3, 1863.

Battle of the Wilderness, Va., May 5-7, 1864.

Battle of Spotsylvania, Va., May 10-20, 1864.

Battle of Cold Harbor, June 1-3, 1864.

Assault on Petersburg, Va., June 17, 1864.

Siege of Petersburg, Va., 1864-65.

Battle of Poplar Spring Church, Va., Sept. 30, 1864.

Raid to Hicksford, Va., Dec. 8-12, 1864.

Engagement at Fort Stedman, Va., March 25, 1865.

Capture of Petersburg, Va., April 3, 1865.

The regiment served in Dix's division, Army of the Potomac, from muster in to March, 1862; Middle Department, Eighth Army Corps, to May 24, 1862; First Brigade, Sigel's division, Department of the Shenandoah, to July, 1862; First Brigade, Second Division, Second Corps, Army of Virginia, to August, 1862; Second Brigade, Second Division, Second Corps, Army of Virginia, to September, 1862; Second Brigade, Second Division, Twelfth Army Corps, to March, 1863; Second Brigade, First Division, Twelfth Army Corps, to May, 1863; First Brigade, First Division, Twelfth Army Corps, to April 25, 1864; Second Brigade, First Division, Ninth Army Corps, to Sept. 1, 1864; and Third Brigade, First Division, Ninth Army Corps, to July 31, 1865.

The final muster out of the veteran battalion took place July 31, 1865, on Arlington Heights, Va., and it immediately proceeded to Baltimore, where it was paid off and disbanded. The Third Maryland earned for itself an honorable name in the struggle for the Union, and is justly entitled to the gratitude of the State and nation.

Fourth Regiment of Infantry (German Rifles).—The organization of this regiment was begun at Camp Carroll, Baltimore, during the winter of 1861-62, in accordance with the authority embodied in the following communication:

"WAR DEPARTMENT.
"WASHINGTON, Nov. 5, 1861.
"BRIG.-GEN. JAMES COOPER, Washington, D. C.:
"Sir,—You are hereby authorized to raise and organize in the State of Maryland a regiment of infantry, as the fourth regiment from that State, to serve for three years or during the war. This authority is with the distinct understanding that this Department will revoke the commissions of all officers who may be found incompetent for the proper discharge of their duties.
"Your men will be mustered into the service of the United States in accordance with General Orders No. 58, 61, and 70, herewith inclosed.

"Very respectfully,
"THOMAS A. SCOTT,
"Assistant Secretary of War."

Failing to secure the requisite complement of men for a regimental organization, those who had been enlisted were transferred to the Third Infantry, May 7, 1862, and became Companies E and H of that regiment. Some of the officers were provided with positions in the Third, and the remainder were mustered out of service.

The officers engaged in organizing the regiment are embraced in the following list. Those who went into the Third Regiment are indicated by an asterisk:

Captain,—*Joseph M. Sadburg, George Hoffmann, Albert Lonyi, C.James M. Schad, and Louis Beyer.
Second Lieutenants,—Lewis Binder, George Ruths, Charles M. Stacks, Julienne Pelliot, and Henry Kiringsky.
Assistant Surgeon,—John M. P. Pannetti.

On the 24 of July, 1862, the President issued a call for three hundred thousand volunteers for three years. The adjutant-general of the State immediately published the following order:

"State of Maryland,
"Adjutant-General's Office,
"Annapolis, July 19, 1862.

"Four regiments of infantry being required of this State by the War Department, and to be raised as soon as practicable, as a part of Maryland's quota of the three hundred thousand men lately called for by the President, the Governor is authorized by a recent order of the Department to commission immediately a second lieutenant to each company of said regiments, who will act as the recruiting and mustering in officer of his company.

"These officers are now being appointed, and will be assigned to duty, as they are appointed, in the city of Baltimore and all the principal towns in the State.

"Other persons desiring to fill company offices can also receive authority to recruit, and will be selected from those forwarding their testimonials to the Governor.

"When the half of a company is recruited and mustered in the first lieutenant will be commissioned, and the captain when the whole company is mustered in; and in issuing these commissions regard will be had to the wishes of the company and the efficiency and promptness exhibited by those thus employed in recruiting. Corps of remissives for these several regiments, which will be respectively designated the Fourth, Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Regiments, will be established at Baltimore, and the cost of transportation from the place of muster to the place of remissives will be paid by the quartermaster at the latter place.

"By a recent order of the War Department recruits for the new regiments are entitled to a premium of $2, to be paid when they are inspected by the surgeon and mustered into service, and which payment may be made either to the person bringing the recruit or to the recruit in person, in ease he presents himself."

"A further advance of $23 will be paid to every recruit (on account of the $100 bounty to which he is entitled at the end of his service), which advance will be paid when his company is organized and mustered in.

"In addition to these advances of premium and bounty, a month's pay in advance will be made to each recruit, under such regulations as the paymaster-general may establish. Any further information may be obtained by application to this office, or to Col. Schley, superintendent of recruiting, Baltimore.

"By order of the Governor,
"X. BREWER, of John.
"Adjt.-General of Maryland."

Fourth Regiment of Infantry.—By authority from Governor Bradford the organization of a regiment of infantry, to be styled the Fourth, was begun at Baltimore about the time the original Fourth (German Rifles) was merged into the Third, by Maj. Joseph P. Warner, of the Baltimore City Guard Battalion. Maj. Warner, who was to have been the colonel of the new regiment, commenced recruiting in the latter part of May, 1862, but died before much progress had been made, and the organization of the regiment was then carried forward under the President's call of July 2d and the Governor's order of July 19th, already cited. With the exception of Company E, raised in Carroll County, the entire regiment was almost wholly from the city of Baltimore.

The several companies were mustered into the United States service as follows:

A, June 28; B, July 17; C and D, July 31; E, Aug. 14; F, Aug. 15; G, Aug. 20; H, Aug. 29; and J, Oct. 4, 1862. Throughout its term of service the regiment consisted of but nine companies.

The original field and staff-officers were: Colonel, W. J. L. Nicodemus, a graduate of the West Point Military Academy, and captain of the Twelfth United States Infantry; Lieutenant-Colonel, Richard N. Bowerman, formerly a captain in the Eleventh New York Volunteers, or First Fire Zouaves, and the Seventy-third New York, or Fourth Excelsior, and who had also previously served in the ranks of the celebrated Seventh New York State National Guards; Major, Henry P. Brooks, a lawyer of Baltimore; Adjutant, John A. Thompson, Jr., who had recently resigned from the Second Maryland; Quartermaster, William T. Adreon; Surgeon, Wm. W. Valk; Assistant Surgeons, Henry W. Owings and John C. Carter; Chaplain, Edwin R. Hera.

As originally composed the following were the company officers:

Col. Nicodemus resigned Nov. 17, 1862, and was succeeded by Col. Bowerman. The latter was mustered out with the regiment.

TheFourth served in the Middle Department, Eighth Army Corps, from muster in to July 11, 1863; Third Brigade, Third Division, First Army Corps, to January, 1864; Second Brigade, Third Division, First Army Corps, to March 23, 1864; Third Brigade, Second Division, Fifth Army Corps, to June 6, 1864; and Second Brigade, Second Division, Fifth Army Corps, to May 31, 1865.

The war having ended and their services being no longer required by the government, the members of the regiment whose term of service expired prior to Oct. 1, 1865, were mustered out at Arlington Heights, Va., May 31, 1865, and the residue (thirty-one enlisted men) were transferred to the First Maryland.

The Fourth experienced much hard service, made long and fatiguing marches, and fought bravely on many hotly-contested battle-fields. Its record is as imperishable as it is splendid. In its various encounters with the enemy the regiment suffered a loss of three officers and twenty-six enlisted men killed, ten officers and eighty-eight men wounded, and two officers and thirty-nine men captured.

Fifth Regiment of Infantry.—In the latter part of August, 1861, William Louis Schley, a lawyer of Baltimore, who had served with credit in the war with Mexico, received verbal authority directly from the War Department at Washington to raise a regiment of infantry, to be known as the “Public Guard Regiment,” whose specific duties were to be the guarding of railroad lines and the protection of government property. On the 4th of September, 1861, the regiment was conditionally accepted into the service of the United States, as will be seen by the following communications:
HISTORY OF WESTERN MARYLAND.

STATE OF MARYLAND,
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
ANAPOLIS, Sept. 9, 1861.

HON. H. W. HOFFMAN:

Dear Sir,—Please find enclosed authority from War Department to Col. William Louis Schley to form and report his regiment.

Your obedient servant,

THOS. H. HICKS.

[Inclosure.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, Sept. 4, 1861.

COL. WILLIAM LOUIS SCHLEY.

Care of Henry W. Hoffman, Esq., Baltimore, Md.:—

Sir,—The regiment of infantry which you offer is accepted for three years or during the war, provided you have it ready for marching orders in thirty days. This acceptance is with the distinct understanding that the Department will revoke the commissions of all officers who may be found incompetent for the proper discharge of their duties.

You will be mustered into the service of the United States in accordance with General Orders Nos. 55 and 61, herewith enclosed.

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS A. SCOTT,
Asst. Secretary of War.

The rendezvous of the regiment was established at Lafayette Square, situated in the northwestern section of the city of Baltimore. Commodious barracks were erected and known as Camp Hoffman, having been so named in compliment to the Hon. Henry W. Hoffman, of Allegany County, then collector of the port of Baltimore.

John C. Holland, of Catonsville, was selected as lieutenant-colonel, and Leopold Blumenberg of Baltimore, as major.

The original staff-officers were Judson Gilman, surgeon; William H. Norris, assistant surgeon; James M. Stephens, adjutant; James H. Cook, quartermaster; and John W. Bull, chaplain.

The organization was speedily completed, and the regiment mustered into the United States service for three years from the 19th of September, 1861, with one thousand officers and men.

Company A (Maffit Guards) was organized at North East, Cecil Co., with the following officers: Captain, C. Davis Irelan; Lieutenants, Samuel Ford and George W. Benjamin.

Company B (Bradford Guards) was raised in Baltimore City, and officered as follows: Captain, Wm. W. Bamberger; Lieutenants, Salome Marsh and Wm. H. Irving.

Company C (Montgomery Blair Guards) was enrolled in Baltimore City. Its officers were: Captain, Nicholas Ganster; Lieutenants, Edward M. Koch and Magnus Moltke. This company was raised by Capt. Blumenberg, who upon being appointed major was succeeded in the captaincy by the first lieutenant, Ganster.

Company D (Hoffman Guards) was enlisted in Baltimore City, and had for its officers: Captain, Charles A. Holton; Lieutenants, Bruff W. Tall and Edwin C. Kirkwood.

Company E (McClellan Guards), recruited in Frederick County and Baltimore City, was officered by Capt. Alfred Schley, Lieuts. John P. Gleeson and Wm. H. Walters.

Company F (Schley Guards) was enrolled in Baltimore City. Its officers were Capt. John W. Horn, Lieuts. William A. Noel and Joseph M. Rothrock.

Company G (Steuben Guards) was raised in Baltimore City, and had for its officers Capt. John C. Sahr, Lieuts. Uriah Garber and William L. Adkisson.

Company H (Ellsworth Guards) was enlisted in Baltimore City, and officered by Capt. Frederick Memmert, Lieuts. William H. Chaaney and Nicholas B. Talbott.

Company I (Elkton Guards) hailed from Elkton, Cecil Co., and had in its ranks a number of men from Wilmington, Del., with some from Baltimore City. Its officers were Capt. E. F. M. Fachty, Lieuts. Evan W. Thomas and John Carroll.

Company K (John A. Dix Guards) was organized in Baltimore City, and had for its officers Capt. Christian Bitter, Lieuts. Edward Stein and Joseph Sachs.

On the 28th of October, 1861, the several companies voted unanimously to offer their services to the government for duty anywhere, and to be called and known from that date as the Fifth Regiment Maryland Volunteers. This proposition was submitted to and approved by the War Department.

The Fifth left Camp Hoffman March 11, 1862, for the seat of war in Virginia, and during its subsequent history was identified with Gen. Dix's command in the vicinity of Fort Monroe, the Army of the Potomac under McClellan, the Eighth Army Corps under Schenck, and the Army of the James under Butler and Ord. A large number of its original members re-enlisted as veteran volunteers.

The battle list of the regiment is as follows:

Battle of Anietam, Md., Sept. 17, 1862.
Reconnoissance from Harper's Ferry to Charletown, Va., Oct. 16 and 17, 1862.
Battle of Winchester, Va., June 13 and 15, 1863.
Siege of Petersburg, Va., June to September, 1864.
Siege of Richmond, Va., October, 1864, to April, 1865.
Occupation of Richmond, Va., April 3, 1865.

The regiment was mustered out of service at Fredericksburg, Va., Sept. 1, 1865, and at once repaired to Baltimore City, where it was paid off and disbanded. As an organization the Fifth Maryland thus ceased to exist, but its record still remains. Some other regiments from the State may have participated in more engagements and lost a greater number of men, but none ever fought more gallantly, endured hardships with greater fortitude, or performed every duty imposed upon them more faithfully.

Sixth Regiment of Infantry.—This regiment was raised under the President’s call of July 2, 1862. Its rendezvous was established at Baltimore City. The companies were organized at the following-named places, and mustered into the United States service on the dates affixed thereto.

- A, Carroll County, Aug. 12, 1862; B, Cecil County, Aug. 20, 1862; C, Carroll County, Aug. 23, 1862; D, Frederick County, Aug. 23, 1862; E, Cecil County, Aug. 27, 1862; F, Baltimore City, Sept. 8, 1862; G, Cecil County, Aug. 28, 1862; H, Washington County, Sept. 5, 1862; I, Baltimore City, Aug. 25, 1862; and K, Queen Anne’s County, Sept. 2, 1862.

The original field, staff, and company officers were as follows:

- Company C.—Capt. George Webster, Lieuts. J. L. Beaver and Ira Tyler.

Col. Howard resigned May 5, 1863, and was succeeded by Lieut.-Col. Horn, promoted in his stead. Col. Horn resigned Feb. 4, 1865, when the command devolved upon Lieut.-Col. Joseph C. Hill. This officer was commissioned as colonel, but owing to the reduced numbers of the regiment was not mustered into that grade.

The Sixth left Baltimore Sept. 20, 1862, for the front, and proceeded via Frederick City to Williamsport, Md., where it united with the other regiments of the Maryland Brigade, which had gone to that place by way of Harrisburg, Pa.

It was attached to the Maryland Brigade, Eighth Army Corps, from muster in to March 28, 1863; Third Brigade, Second Division, Eighth Army Corps, to June 16, 1863; First Brigade, Second Division, Eighth Army Corps, to July 9, 1863; Second Brigade, Third Division, Third Army Corps, to March 23, 1864; and Second Brigade, Third Division, Sixth Army Corps, to June 20, 1865.

The Sixth took part in the following engagements, etc.:

- Skirmish at Berryville, Va., June 15, 1865.
- Skirmish at the Opequon, Va., June 15, 1865.
- Battle of Winchester, Va., June 14 and 15, 1863.
- Skirmish at Brandy Station, Va., Nov. 8, 1863.
- Battle of Mine Run (Locust Grove), Va., Nov. 29, 1863.
- Reconnaissance to Mitchell’s Station, Va., Feb. 6 and 7, 1864.
- Battle of the Wilderness, Va., May 5-7, 1864.
- Battle of Spottsylvania, Va., May 9-20, 1864.
- Battle of Cold Harbor, Va., June 1-3, 1864.
- Siege of Petersburg, Va., June 19 to July 6, 1864, and Dec. 7, 1864, to April 2, 1865.
- Skirmish at Charleston, Va., Aug. 26, 1864.
- Battle of Winchester, Va., Sept. 19, 1864.
- Battle of Cedar Creek, Va., Oct. 19, 1864.
- Reconnaissance to Vaughan Road, Va., Dec. 7-10, 1864.
- Assault on Petersburg, Va., April 2, 1865.
- Battle of Sailor’s Creek, Va., April 6, 1865.
- Surrender at Appomattox Court-House, Va., April 9, 1865.

The loss among the enlisted men of the regiment in these actions was seventy-eight killed and two hundred and thirty-three wounded. Of the latter, thirty-six died from the effects of their wounds, making a total of one hundred and fourteen slain.

On the 20th of June, 1865, the regiment, as an organization, was mustered out of service near Washington, D. C. (the recruits, forty in number, whose terms expired subsequent to Oct. 1, 1865, being transferred to the First Maryland), and returned to Baltimore, where the officers and men received their pay, spoke their final adieux, and dispersed to their homes.

By its undaunted courage, remarkable coolness, unwavering persistence, and sturdy reliability on trying occasions the Sixth Maryland won a reputation that was always recognized and appreciated by its commanding generals. Associate regiments from other States also acknowledged its worth, and the services herein recorded fully sustain the reputation it gained.

Seventh Regiment of Infantry.—This regiment was organized and mustered into the United States service at Baltimore City in August and September, 1862, under the President's call of July 2, 1862. Its rendezvous, styled Camp Harford, was located upon a spot now included within the limits of Druid Hill Park.

The regiment originally consisted of nine companies, enlisted as follows: A, Hagerstown, Washington Co.; B, Frederick City; C, Belair, Harford Co.; D, Towson, Baltimore Co.; E, Frederick City; F, Carroll County; G, Middletown, Frederick Co.; H, Havre de Grace, Harford Co.; and I, Boonsboro', Washington Co.

Pressing exigencies of the service hurried it into the field before it had received its tenth company, the men recruited for which being mustered into other regiments. Company K was added in April, 1864, and was composed of the re-enlisted men of the Tenth Maryland, a six-months' organization.

The following were the original field, staff, and company officers:

Company E - Capt. David T. Bennett, Lieuts. Isaiah Devil- biss and John Howard.

Col. Webster was a resident of Harford County who had served as a member of the State Senate from 1855 to 1859, as Presidential elector on the Fillmore and Donelson ticket in 1856, and at the time of entering the Army was a representative in Congress.

Lient.-Col. Phelps, a prominent lawyer of Baltimore, had been a member of the City Council in 1860, and at the outset of the war held the position of mayor in the "Maryland Guard," a thoroughly drilled volunteer militia organization, but resigned this commission April 19, 1861, rather than obey an order that he deemed inconsistent with his oath to support the constitution of the United States.

Maj. Dallam had been for many years the State's attorney of Harford County.

The captains of companies were all well-known and highly respected citizens of their several counties. Capt. Rinehart, of Carroll County, was a brother of the sculptor.

Col. Webster resigned his commission Nov. 6, 1863, consequent upon his re-election to Congress. He was succeeded by Col. Phelps, who also resigned Sept. 9, 1864, on account of disability from wounds received at the battle of Spottsylvania. The command then devolved upon Maj. Edward M. Mobley, who in turn was succeeded by Lieut.-Col. David T. Bennett.

The Seventh left Baltimore Sept. 18, 1862, and formed a part of the Maryland Brigade, Eighth Army Corps, to July 11, 1863; Third Brigade, Third Division, First Army Corps, to January, 1864; Second Brigade, Third Division, First Army Corps, to March 23, 1864; Third Brigade, Second Division, Fifth Army Corps, to June 6, 1864; Second Brigade, Second Division, Fifth Army Corps, to May 31, 1865.

With the exception of Company K, and the recruits of other companies whose terms of service expired subsequent to Oct. 1, 1865, and who were transferred to the First Maryland, the regiment was mustered out of service May 31, 1865, at Arlington Heights, Va.

Thus, after nearly three years of arduous and honorable service, the Seventh Maryland ceased to exist as a body, and its war-worn members returned to their peaceful avocations. To say that throughout the whole of this time the Seventh sustained its reputation for bravery and heroic endurance would be but faint praise for the gallant deeds performed. May a grateful country do them justice, written history never can.

Eighth Regiment of Infantry.—This regiment was organized at Baltimore City under the call of July 2, 1862. It originally consisted of seven companies, raised as follows: A in Cecil County, B, C, D, F, and G at Baltimore, and E in Frederick County. These companies were mustered into the United States service at different dates between Aug. 13 and Oct. 28, 1862, to serve for three years. Companies H, I, and K, composed of nine-months' drafted men and substitutes, were mustered in from December, 1862, to April, 1863. These companies were mustered out as their terms of service expired. The veterans and recruits of Companies B and C, Purnell Cavalry (dismounted), were transferred to the regiment Nov. 17, 1864, and designated as Companies H and I.

Andrew W. Denison, who had been prominently identified with the volunteer militia organizations of Baltimore City, was commissioned as colonel, and held the position until the final muster out of the regiment.
John G. Johannes, of Baltimore, was promoted to the lieutenant-colonelcy from the captaincy of Company D, and Ernest F. M. Fachtz, who had served as captain in the Fifth Infantry, was appointed major.

The latter became lieutenant-colonel upon the promotion of Lieut.-Col. Johannes to the colonelcy of the Eleventh Infantry, Feb. 25, 1865.

The original company officers were as follows:

Company A.—Capt. C. Davis Irelan, Lieuts. Louis R. Casard and John W. Simpers.

Company B.—Capt. Frederick W. Simon, Lieuts. David F.
Hulett and James Fay.

Murray and Richard L. Gross.

and James R. Hosmer.

Goldsborough and William W. Roderick.

Company F.—Capt. Beal D. Riddle, Lieuts. William E.
Andrews and Bowie F. Johnson.

Company G.—Capt. Richard F. Gardner, Lieuts. Louis Cheney
and F. C. Garmanbe."u2014 Company H.—Capt. David F. Hullett (promoted from first lieutenant of Company B), Lieuts. B. E. Greaser and Wallace

A. Bowie.

Company I.—Capt. Stephen P. Heath, Lieuts. William P.
Cole and William J. Biays.

Company K.—Capt. George W. Shriver, Lieuts. Thomas
Latchford and McKenzie C. Furlong.

Alphonso A. White was appointed surgeon; William B.
Wheeler, assistant surgeon; William B. Norman, adjutant;
Christopher C. Adron, quartermaster; and John J. Suman, chaplain.

The regiment took the field Sept. 18, 1862, and was attached to the Maryland Brigade, Eighth Army Corps, until July 11, 1863; Third Brigade, Third Division, First Army Corps, to January, 1864; Second Brigade, Third Division, First Army Corps, to March 23, 1864; Third Brigade, Second Division, Fifth Army Corps, to June 6, 1864; Second Brigade,
Second Division, Fifth Army Corps, to May 31, 1865.

It participated with credit in the following engagements, etc.: Skirmish at Maryland Heights, Md., July 7, 1863.

Skirmish at Funkstown, Md., July 12, 1863.

Reconnaissance from Culpeper to Raccoon Ford, Va., Feb., 6-7, 1864.

Battle of the Wilderness, Va., May 5-7, 1864.

Battle of Laurel Hill, Va., May 8, 1864.

Battle of Spottsylvania, Va., May 9-26, 1864.

Battle of Harris' Farm, Va., May 19, 1864.

Battle of Shady Grove, Va., May 30, 1864.

Battle of Bethesda Church, Va., May 31 to June 1, 1864.

Battle of Cold Harbor, Va., June 2-5, 1864.

Assault on Petersburg, Va., June 17-18, 1864.

Siege of Petersburg, Va., 1864-65.

Battle of Weldon Railroad, Va., Aug. 18-21, 1864.

Battle of Poplar Spring Church, Va., Sept. 30, 1864.

Battle of Peeble's Farm, Va., Oct. 7, 1864.

Battle of Hatcher's Run, Va., Oct. 27, 1864.

Raid to HICKS, Va., Dec. 7-12, 1864.

Battle of Dabney's Mill, Va., Feb. 6, 1865.

Battle of White Oak Road, Va., March 31, 1865.

Battle of Five Forks, Va., April 1, 1865.

Surrender at Appomattox, Va., April 9, 1865.

In these actions the regiment sustained a loss of three officers and thirty-seven enlisted men killed, ten officers and two hundred and one enlisted men wounded, and forty-five enlisted men missing. Of the missing only eight returned, whilst of the wounded five officers and eighty-eight enlisted men never recovered sufficiently to resume duty.

The regiment was mustered out of service at Arlington Heights, Va., May 31, 1865. The members whose terms of service expired subsequent to Oct. 1, 1865, were transferred to the First Infantry.

The services of the Eighth cannot be reviewed by its surviving members without the proud consciousness that the command upon every occasion did its whole duty, and as an organization reflected honor upon the State and the cause for which it fought.

Ninth Regiment of Infantry.—This regiment was organized at Baltimore City in June and July, 1863, to serve for a period of six months, in accordance with the President's proclamation of June 15, 1863, calling for an additional military force to repel the invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania by the enemy under Lee. It had its nucleus in the "Independent Grays," a well-known and thoroughly-drilled volunteer militia organization, which became Company
A. All the companies (except I from Baltimore County) were raised in Baltimore City.

Benjamin L. Simpson, of Baltimore City, who had already served as lieutenant-colonel of the Purnell Legion, was appointed colonel; Thomas Clowdsley, a former captain in the Tenth New York Volunteers, was commissioned lieutenant-colonel; and Royal W. Church, of Baltimore City, major. Charles H. Richardson received the appointment of adjutant; John Turner, quartermaster; Wilbur P. Morgan, surgeon; Henry C. Kemp, assistant surgeon; and G. Farring Gray, chaplain.

As originally constituted the company officers were as follows:

Company C.—Capt. Thomas Clowdsley (promoted lieutenant-colonel), Lieuts. George L. Sellers and Harman F. Meyer.

Company F.—Capt. Martin Callahan (promoted from first lieutenant of Company A), Lieuts. Horace Noble and George W. Moore.

Company I.—Capt. J. Marche McComas, Lieuts. Alfred S. Cooper and Hanson P. Jordan.

On the 6th of July, before its organization was completed, the command left Baltimore and proceeded by rail to Sandy Hook, Md., where it joined the troops under Gen. French and took part in the re-occupation of Maryland Heights. It subsequently crossed the Potomac at Harper’s Ferry and encamped on London Heights. Company B was stationed at Duffield’s Station, and C at Brown’s Crossing, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Afterwards Company B was relieved at Duffield’s by Company A, the former being detailed as provost-guard in Harper’s Ferry. About the middle of August Companies D, E, F, G, H, and I were moved forward to Charleston, Va., where they had an engagement with the enemy on the 18th of October, but being surrounded by over-powering numbers and unsupported were forced to surrender. Only about one-half of those that were captured lived to return to their homes. Some of them were held as prisoners of war until hostilities ceased.

Companies A, B, and C continued on duty in the vicinity of Harper’s Ferry until February, 1864.

Its term of service having expired, the regiment was mustered out at Baltimore Feb. 23, 1864. A number of the officers and men immediately re-entered the service for three years, and were assigned to the Third Infantry.

The Ninth was composed of excellent material, and had a better opportunity been afforded, none can doubt but that it would have won for itself a brilliant record on the field of battle.

Tenth Regiment of Infantry.—This regiment, like the Ninth, was organized at Baltimore City in June and July, 1863, under the President’s proclamation of June 15, 1863. It had its nucleus in the Baltimore City Guard Battalion, an independent militia organization, which had its origin in 1830.

The original officers of the regiment were as follows:

William H. Revere, Jr., colonel; William E. W. Ross, lieutenant-colonel; J. Townsend Daniel, major; Edmund Simon, adjutant; Abram G. Smith, quartermaster; D. W. Onderdonk, surgeon; and William T. Uriel and Edward Borch, Jr., assistant surgeons.

Company B.—Capt. William P. Rogers, Lieuts. George W. James and John A. Brownell.

Company D.—Capt. Thomas W. Webster, Lieuts. John B. Richardson and John H. Torney.

Company G.—Capt. George N. Holloway, Lieuts. L. P. Stone and John M. Palmer.

Companies H and I were raised as Companies A and B of the Eleventh Maryland, another six-months’ regiment, which was to have been commanded by Col. Herman Ryter, but failing to complete the regimental organization, these companies were, by order of Governor Bradford, assigned to the Tenth.

The regiment was mustered out of service at Baltimore, Jan. 29, 1864. A portion of the regiment, consisting of one company of eighty-seven men and three officers and a squad of fifty-seven men with one officer, having re-enlisted for three years, was assigned to the Seventh Infantry, April 11, 1864.

The esprit de corps of the Tenth was second to none in the service, and every duty devolving upon it was most cheerfully and faithfully discharged.
Eleventh Regiment of Infantry (One Hundred Days).—On the 13th of May, 1864, the Secretary of War telegraphed Governor Bradford as follows:

"In the present juncture it might be of great service if you would call out two thousand of your State militia, to take charge of the works in Baltimore and relieve the same number of other troops, for the period of one hundred days, and upon the same terms as were agreed upon by the President and the Governors of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Wisconsin. Our army now appears to be victorious, and a helping hand at the present moment from you might contribute greatly to the speedy restoration of peace. Will you do this? Please answer immediately."

The Governor promptly replied,—

"I have no doubt that a volunteer militia force of two or three regiments could be at once organized in Baltimore if they could be furnished immediately with eligible arms. Gen. Wallace promised me several days ago to communicate with you on that subject. I will go to Baltimore this afternoon and confer with him again. Please communicate to the general or myself at that city whether you can supply the arms and equipments as soon as organized."

Satisfactory arrangements for the necessary supply of arms having been made, recruiting was begun in the city of Baltimore, and on the 15th and 16th of June, 1864, the Eleventh Regiment was mustered into the United States service at Camp Bradford.

William T. Landstreet, Thomas Sewell, Jr., and William E. George, all of Baltimore City, were commissioned respectively as colonel, lieutenant-colonel, and major. The latter had been previously connected with the First Infantry. Jacob Norris was appointed adjutant; Richard C. Cushing, quartermaster; and Harvey Buhrman, assistant surgeon.

The company officers were as follows:

Company E.—Capt. Samuel J. Syford, Lieuts. Jacob Fox and Joshua N. Richardson.

Leaving Baltimore July 1, 1864, the regiment moved by way of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to Monocacy Junction, where it participated in the engagement with the enemy on the 9th of July.

Falling back to Baltimore, it subsequently performed guard duty at Monrovia and Mount Airy, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

Before the expiration of its term of service a large number of the men re-enlisted for one year, forming the nucleus of another regiment bearing the same numerical designation.

Returning to Baltimore, the remaining members of the several companies were mustered out as follows: E and G, September 28th; B, C, and D, September 29th; F, September 30th; and A, H, I, and K, with the field and staff, Oct. 1, 1864.

Although but once engaged with the enemy, the duties performed by the regiment were valuable, from the fact that it took the place of veteran soldiers, who were thus permitted to reinforce the army operating against Richmond.

Eleventh Regiment of Infantry (One Year).—Companies A, B, and C of this regiment were composed principally of the re-enlisted men of the Eleventh (100 days) Regiment. In January, 1865, seven companies from the First Eastern Shore were added, thus making the regimental organization complete.

John G. Johannes, James C. Mulliken, and Martin Suter were commissioned severally colonel, lieutenant-colonel, and major. The first named had already seen service in the Purnell Legion and Eighth Infantry, and the two latter with the First Eastern Shore.

Company C did duty at the Relay House, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad; I in Baltimore City, and the residue at Fort Delaware.

The regiment was mustered out of service at Baltimore, June 15, 1865. All members whose term of service expired subsequent to Oct. 1, 1865, were transferred to the Second Infantry.

Twelfth Regiment of Infantry.—This regiment, consisting of five companies, was organized at Camp Bradford, Baltimore, in the summer of 1864, pursuant to orders from the War Department, dated May 13, 1864, for one hundred days. All the companies were mustered into the United States service July 30, 1864.

John L. Bishop, of Baltimore City, a former captain in the Fourth Infantry, was commissioned as lieutenant-colonel. No other field-officers were assigned to the regiment, its numerical strength being insufficient to warrant such appointments.

The company officers were as follows:

HISTORY OF WESTERN MARYLAND.

During its term of service the regiment performed guard duty at various points along the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad between Baltimore and Kearneysville, Va. It was mustered out at Baltimore, Nov. 6, 1864. A number of the men who, prior to the muster out of the regiment, had re-enlisted for one year were assigned to the First Eastern Shore Regiment.

Potomac Home Brigade.—Hon. Francis Thomas, of Frederick County, a member of the United States House of Representatives, and ex-Governor of the State of Maryland, was the father of the Potomac Home Brigade. He obtained from the Secretary of War the following letters authorizing its formation:

"WAR DEPARTMENT,
"WASHINGTON, July 19, 1861.

"HON. FRANCIS THOMAS:
"You are hereby authorized to provide for the organization of four regiments of the loyal citizen sons on both sides of the Potomac River from the Monocacy to the western boundary of Maryland, for the protection of the canal and of the property and persons of loyal citizens of the neighborhood, and to be stationed in the vicinity whilst in the service.

"The men will be permitted to elect their own company officers, the field-officers to be appointed by the President. Arms will be forwarded as soon as practicable.

"Respectfully,
"Your obedient servant,
"SIMON CAMERON, Sec'y of War.
"The Secretary of War has my approval to sign this letter.
"A. LINCOLN."

"WAR DEPARTMENT,
"WASHINGTON, July 26, 1861.

"HON. FRANCIS THOMAS, Frederick, Md.:
"Sir,—The four companies of cavalry offered by you, one to be attached to each of the four regiments of infantry heretofore accepted, are accepted for three years or the war.

"This acceptance is with the distinct understanding that the Department will revoke the commissions of all officers who may be found incompetent for the proper discharge of their duties.

"You will advise Adj.-Gen. Thomas, at Washington, the date at which the men will be ready for mustering, and he will detail an officer for that purpose.

"By order of the Secretary of War.

"JAMES LESLEY, Jr., Chief Clerk."

By the terms of the Secretary’s letter of July 19, 1861, it will be observed these troops were to be organized for a specific duty and a restricted field of operations, but it is perhaps proper to remark that whenever called upon to perform duty outside the prescribed limits they promptly and cheerfully responded, and rendered good service, both in Pennsylvania and Virginia.

From the very beginning the war was waged on their immediate border, at times in their very midst, and they stood a trusty bulwark of defense between the foe and the homes of soldiers from sister States frequently in danger of invasion and harm.

First Regiment of Infantry, Potomac Home Brigade.—Companies A, B, D, and I of this regiment were recruited in Frederick County; C, in Baltimore City; E, F, and H, in Washington County; G, in Baltimore, Carroll, and Frederick Counties; and K, in Baltimore City and Frederick County. All were mustered into the United States service at Frederick City during the summer and fall of 1861.

The original field-officers were William P. Maulsby, Sr., colonel; George R. Dennis, lieutenant-colonel; and John A. Steiner, major, all of whom were residents of Frederick City.

Jerningham Boone was appointed surgeon; Jacob Baer, acting surgeon; George T. Castle, adjutant (succeeded, Nov. 30, 1861, by William P. Maulsby, Jr.); Thomas M. Wolfe, quartermaster; and William G. Ferguson, chaplain.

The company officers were:

The battle list of the regiment embraces the following:

Skirmish at Loudon Heights, Va., May 27, 1862.
Skirmish at Monocacy Aqueduct, Md., Sept. 4, 1862.
Skirmish at Poolesville, Md., Sept. 5, 1862.
Action at Maryland Heights, Md., Sept. 13, 1862.
Defense of Harper’s Ferry, Va., September 14 and 15, 1862.

Skirmish at Dufferd’s Station, Va., June 29, 1864.
Battle of Monocacy, Md., July 8, 1864.

The commands to which the regiment was attached are as follows: Banks’ division, from muster in to 1 Designation changed to the Thirteenth Maryland Infantry, April 8, 1865.

April 4, 1862; Middle Department, to July 2, 1863; Twelfth Army Corps, to July 17, 1863; Department of the Susquehanna, to Aug. 3, 1863; and Department of West Virginia, to May 29, 1865.

On the expiration of its term of service the original members (except veterans) were mustered out, and the organization, composed of veterans and recruits, retained in service until May 29, 1865, when the entire command was discharged, leaving behind them a record for valor of which this State and the United States may well be proud.

Second Regiment of Infantry, Potomac Home Brigade.—This regiment was organized at Cumberland, from August to October, 1861.

The companies were mainly recruited as follows: A, at Lonaconing; B, at Old Town; C, at Frostburg; D, at Piedmont, Va.; E, H, and K, at Cumberland; F, near Hancecock; G, at Mount Savage; and I, in Allegany County at large.

The original field-officers were: Colonel, Thomas Johns; Lieutenant-Colonel, Robert Bruce; and Major, J. Ellis Porter. The two former were citizens of Cumberland, the latter of Lonaconing.

Orlando D. Robbins was appointed adjutant; Kennedy H. Butler, quartermaster; Samuel P. Smith, surgeon; Patrick A. Healey, assistant surgeon; and John H. Symmes, chaplain.

The officers of the line were:

Company F.—Capt. Lewis Dyeche, Lieuts. George D. Summers and Norval McKinley.

The regiment entered upon active duty in Western Maryland and Virginia as soon as organized, and stands credited with the following engagements, etc.:

Skirmish at Springfield, Va., Aug. 23, 1861.
Skirmish at Blue's House, Va., Aug. 26, 1861.
Skirmish at South Branch Bridge, Va., Oct. 26, 1861.

Skirmish near Darlington, Va., Nov. 16, 1863.
Affair at Biggsville, Va., Jan. 4, 1864.
Affair at Moorefield Junction, Va., Jan. 8, 1864.
Affair at Molley, Va., Jan. 29, 1864.
Engagement at Lynneburg, Va., June 18, 1864.
Engagement at Snicker's Gap, Va., July 18, 1864.

It served with the following commands: Kelley's division, to January, 1862; Landers' division, to March 11, 1862; Mountain Department, to June 26, 1862; Middle Department, to Sept. 19, 1862; Department of the Ohio, to December, 1862; Middle Department, to June, 1863; and Department of West Virginia, to May 29, 1865.

On the expiration of its term of service the original members (except veterans) were mustered out, and the veterans and recruits consolidated into a battalion of three companies.—A, B, and C. A new company, raised in March, 1865, to serve one year, was assigned to the battalion as Company D.

The organization was mustered out of service May 29, 1865.

That the Second Potomac Home Brigade fully sustained the reputation of Maryland soldiers for bravery and fidelity will never be questioned.

Third Regiment of Infantry, Potomac Home Brigade.—The organization of this regiment was begun at Cumberland in the fall of 1861, and before midwinter three full and two partially-filled companies had been mustered into the service of the United States. These companies (except B) were raised principally at Cumberland and other localities in Allegany County. Company B hailed from Warfordsburg, Pa.

The officers of these companies at muster in were as follows:

Company B.—Capt. Wm. F. Cardiff, Lieuts. Wm. B. Hipley and Moses Whittle.
Company E.—First Lieut. Wm. A. Falkenstine.

On the 11th of August, 1862, three companies raised for the Fourth Regiment, Potomac Home Brigade, were transferred to the Third, as Companies E, F, and G, the designation of the original Company E being thereby changed to I. About the same time a company organized at Oakland by Capt. Michael Fallon, with John M. Armstrong and Joseph L. Forsyth as lieutenants, joined the regiment and took the place of Company D, whose designation was changed to I. This company was broken up Jan. 23, 1863, and the men transferred to Company C. In the spring of 1864 two new companies (I and K) were organized with the following officers:

Company I.—Capt. N. M. Ambrose, Lieuts. Gustave Valvis and Augustine Robinett.

Company K.—Capt. John W. Dodson, Lieuts. Wm. J. Donoghue and Wm. H. Foroeman.

The first colonel of the regiment, Stephen W. Downey, of Cumberland, resigned Nov. 6, 1862, and was succeeded by Charles Gilpin, of the same city. Col. Gilpin was mustered out on expiration of term of service, Jan. 2, 1865. Thereafter the command devolved on Lieut.-Col. Henry C. Rizer.

The original staff-officers consisted of N. M. Ambrose, adjutant; John Matthews, quartermaster; Henry C. Stewart, assistant surgeon.

In detachments or as a whole the regiment participated in the following actions:

- Skirmish at Franklin, Va., May 12, 1862.

It served with the following commands: Lander's division, to March 11, 1862; Mountain Department, to June 26, 1862; Middle Department, to August, 1864; and Department of West Virginia, to May 29, 1865.

The original members (except veterans) being mustered out as their terms of service expired, the organization, composed of veterans and recruits, was retained in service until May 29, 1865.

That the services of this regiment were fully appreciated its favorable mention by superior commanders will attest.

Fourth Regiment of Infantry, Potomac Home Brigade.—During the winter of 1861-62, Lieut.-Col. George R. Dennis, of the First Potomac Home Brigade, undertook the organization of a fourth regiment of the brigade, but the effort did not succeed. Three companies were raised, one (A) at Hagerstown, one (B) at Baltimore, and one (C) in Frederick County.

These companies were officered as follows:

Company B.—Capt. Jacob Sarbaugh, Lieuts. Henry B. McCoy and John W. Dodson.

James Realky was appointed quartermaster.

The battalion performed guard duty in Western Maryland, and on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad between Harper's Ferry and Martinsburg, until Aug. 11, 1862, when it was consolidated with the Third Infantry, Potomac Home Brigade.

First Regiment of Eastern Shore Infantry.—Upon the recommendation of Governor Hicks, approved by President Lincoln, the Secretary of War authorized the organization of this regiment for special service on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. This authority was contained in the following communication:

"War Department, Aug. 16, 1861.

"Col. James Wallace, Cambridge, Md.:

"Sir,—The regiment of infantry you offer is accepted for three years, or during the war, provided you have it ready for marching orders in sixty days. In accordance with the letter of Governor Hicks of the 10th inst., you will be mustered into the service of the United States to act as a home guard, to be stationed on the Eastern Shore of Maryland.

"By order of the Secretary of War.

"James Lesley, Jr., Chief Clerk."

The formation of the companies which made up the regiment began at once, under the personal supervision of Col. Wallace, and within the time specified the regimental organization was completed and the command mustered into the service of the United States.

Companies A, B, and C were organized, respectively, at Cambridge, Strait's District, and Church Creek, in Dorchester County; D, E, F, and G, respectively, at Greensboro', Preston, Denton, and Federalsburg, in Caroline County; H, at Trappe, in Talbot County; I, at Baltimore City; and K, at Annamesse, in Somerset County.

Upon organization the roster of officers was as follows:

James Wallace, of Cambridge, colonel; William H. Comegys, of Greensboro', lieutenant-colonel; William Kirby, of Cambridge, major; John E. Bostall, adjutant; William H. Gootee, quartermaster; Francis P. Phelps, jr., surgeon; Granville B. Lecompte, assistant surgeon; and Thomas L. Poulson, chaplain.

Company E.—Capt. Andrew Stafford, Lieuts. James R. Hooper and Jesse W. Blaide.

Company F.—Capt. Thomas Numbers, Lieuts. James B. Austin and Robert J. W. Garry.

Company G.—Capt. William H. Watkins, Lieuts. L. Shanley Davis and John E. Mabry.

The regiment served in Dix's division from muster in to April 4, 1862; Middle Department, to July 2, 1863; Twelfth Army Corps, to July 17, 1863; Department of the Susquehanna, to Aug. 3, 1863; and Middle Department, to Feb. 23, 1865.

Company A was mustered out of service Aug. 16, 1862. On the expiration of their terms of service the original members (except veterans) of the other companies were mustered out at Baltimore City, and the organization, composed of veterans and recruits, together with the veterans and recruits of the Second Eastern Shore Regiment (consolidated with the First, Jan. 23, 1865), was reestablished in service until Feb. 23, 1865, when it was consolidated with the Eleventh Infantry.

The First Eastern Shore was not brought face to face with the enemy, except on the field of Gettysburg, where it bore an honorable and gallant part, and again in a skirmish near Fairplay, Md., during Lee's retreat towards Virginia. But it performed valuable, onerous, and oftentimes most disagreeable duties. A detachment of the regiment accompanied Gen. Logan's expedition to Accomac and Northampton Counties, Va., in November, 1861. Much of its time was spent on the Eastern Shore of Maryland and Virginia, where it assisted materially in the efforts of the government to suppress the illicit trade carried on between the Eastern Shore counties and the insurgent district west of the Chesapeake Bay.

Second Regiment of Eastern Shore Infantry.—Authority to organize this regiment was given by the Secretary of War in the following communication:

"War Department, Sept. 14, 1861.

Col. Edward Wilkins, Chestertown, Md.:

Sir,—You are authorized to raise and organize a regiment of infantry to serve for three years, or during the war, with the understanding that it is for service in the State of Maryland, unless special necessity shall require their presence elsewhere, of which the Department will determine.

Very respectfully,

"Your obedient servant,

"THOMAS A. SCOTT,

"Asst. Secretary of War."

The rendezvous for organization was established at Chestertown, whither the companies repaired and were mustered into the service of the United States during the fall and winter of 1861.

The men of Companies A, B, C, D, and E came chiefly from Kent County; F, from Baltimore City; and G and H, from Harford County. A small detachment, recruited for Company I, was transferred to Company H, March 19, 1862.

But eight companies were raised for the regiment. Edward Wilkins, of Chestertown, was commissioned colonel; Elijah E. Massey, of Queen Anne's County, lieutenant-colonel; Robert S. Rogers, of Havre de Grace, major; Alfred C. Wortley, adjutant; John N. McDaniel, quartermaster; William W. Valk, surgeon; Robert K. Robinson, assistant surgeon; and William B. Watson, chaplain.

The line-officers at this time were:

The actions in which the regiment participated are as follows:

Falling Waters, Md., July 14, 1863.

Piedmont, Va., June 5, 1864.

Lynchburg, Va., June 18, 1864.

Snicker's Ford, Va., July 18, 1864.

Winchester, Va., July 24, 1864.

Berryville, Va., Sept. 3, 1864.

The regiment served in Dix's division from organization to April 4, 1862; Middle Department, to July 8, 1863; Twelfth Army Corps, to July 17, 1863; Department of the Susquehanna, to Aug. 3, 1863; Middle Department, to November, 1863; and Department of West Virginia, to January, 1865.

Like its companion regiment, the Second Eastern Shore was mostly employed in the performance of arduous guard and garrison duty. Though it is true that it was not called to the more illustrous fields of strife, yet it is nevertheless the fact that its history is a record of faithful and meritorious service.

On the expiration of its term the original members (except veterans) were mustered out, and the organization, composed of veterans and recruits, retained in service until Jan. 23, 1865, when it was consolidated with the First Eastern Shore Infantry.

Purnell Legion.—On the 10th of August, 1861, Hon. William H. Purnell, postmaster of Baltimore, obtained permission from the Secretary of War to raise a regiment of infantry, two batteries of artillery, and two companies of cavalry, to serve for three years.

Pikesville Arsenal, near Baltimore, was selected as the place of rendezvous, and during the fall and early winter of 1861 nine companies of infantry, two batteries of artillery, and two companies of cavalry were mustered into the United States service. Companies A, B, C, H, and K of the infantry were recruited at Baltimore City; D, in Somerset County and Baltimore City; E, in Cecil Co., Md., and Chester Co., Pa.; F, in Baltimore County; and G, in Somerset and Worcester Counties.

Battery A of the artillery came from Baltimore City, and B from Cecil County. Company A of the cavalry was raised in Harford County, and B in Anne Arundel and Cecil Counties.

The field and staff-officers were Wm. H. Purnell, of Worcester County, colonel; John G. Johannes, of Baltimore City, lieutenant-colonel; Wm. J. Taylor, of Somerset County, major of infantry, and Edward R. Petherbridge, of Baltimore City, major of artillery; Josiah S. Hubbell, adjutant of infantry, and John Bigelow, adjutant of artillery; John T. Graham, quartermaster; John T. Hall, surgeon; Charles W. Cadden, assistant surgeon of infantry, James H. Jarrett of cavalry, and James S. O'Donnell of artillery; Vaughan Smith, chaplain.

The line-officers of infantry were:

Company K.—Capt. Wm. R. Patterson, Lieuts. Wm. H. Watkins and Thomas P. Hammitt.

Of the artillery—

Of the cavalry—

Upon the resignation of Col. Purnell, in February, 1862, the "Legion" organization of mixed arms was discontinued, and the infantry, cavalry, and artillery were made independent of each other.

The two batteries of artillery continued to serve as a battalion under Maj. Petherbridge until he resigned, in July, 1862, after which they were regarded as separate organizations.

The infantry participated in the following engagements:

Action at Catlet's Station, Va., Aug. 22, 1862.

Battle of Antietam, Md., Sept. 17, 1862.

Skirmish at Harper's Ferry, Va., July 27, 1863.

Battle of Shady Grove, Va., May 30, 1864.

Battle of Bethesda Church, Va., May 31 and June 1, 1864.

Battle of Cold Harbor, Va., June 2-3, 1864.

Assault on Petersburg, Va., June 18, 1864.

Siege of Petersburg, Va., June 18-Sept. 24, 1864.

Battle of Weldon Railroad, Va., Aug. 18-21, 1864.

Battle of Poplar Spring Church, Va., Sept. 30, 1864.

Battle of Peeble's Farm, Va., Oct. 7-8, 1864.

The regiment served in Dix's division, Army of the Potomac, to March, 1862; Middle Department, Eighth Army Corps, to May 25, 1862; Second Brigade, Second Division, Second Corps, Army of Virginia, to September, 1862; Third Brigade, Second Division, Twelfth Corps, Army of the Potomac, to October, 1862; Second Brigade, Second Division, Twelfth Corps, to December, 1862; Middle Department, Eighth Army Corps, to May 26, 1864; Second Brigade, Second Division, Fifth Corps, Army of the Potomac, to October, 1864.

The original members (except veterans) were mustered out Oct. 24, 1864, and the veterans and recruits transferred to the First Infantry.

By bravery displayed on the field of battle the Purnell Legion earned for itself a high and lasting reputation.

Baltimore, or Dix Light Infantry.—In the summer of 1861, Gen. John A. Dix, who commanded the Department of Maryland, with headquarters at Baltimore, proposed to the Secretary of War to raise and arm a regiment of eight hundred and fifty picked men in Baltimore.

This proposal was accepted by the authorities at Washington, and Gen. Dix was authorized, on the 27th of July, "to organize and equip a regiment as suggested." Recruiting was soon commenced under the personal supervision of Dr. George W. Wayson, a prominent physician of Baltimore. Failing, however, to effect a regimental organization, five companies only being raised, the men were consolidated into two companies and transferred to the Third Infantry,
May 7, 1862, forming Companies I and K of that regiment.

All of these officers were discharged the service by reason of the consolidation except Capt. Roff and Crocker, First Lieuts. Lee, McNelly, and Leary, and Second Lieut. Downs, who were transferred to the Third Infantry.

Patapsco Guards.—On the 3d of September, 1861, Capt. Thomas S. McGowan, of Ellicott’s Mills, was authorized by the War Department to raise an independent company of infantry, to be styled the Patapsco Guards.

The organization of the company was completed by Oct. 11, 1861, with the following officers: Captain, Thomas S. McGowan; First Lieutenant, Jacob Timanus; and Second Lieutenant, Lemuel Bewley.

Much of the company’s time was passed in the performance of ordinary guard and provost duty at Ellicott’s Mills, Md., and York, Harrisburg, and Chambersburg, Pa. During the Gettysburg campaign it took part in a skirmish with the enemy at Wrightsville, Pa., June 28, 1863, and again during McCausland’s raid, near Chambersburg, Pa., July 30, 1864.

The original members were mustered out Oct. 17, 1864, and the company, composed of veterans and recruits, retained in service until Aug. 17, 1865, when it was mustered out.

Company C, Second Delaware Infantry.—Besides the troops regularly enrolled within the State of Maryland and credited to its quota was a company of infantry organized at Elkton, Cecil Co., and mustered into the service of the United States at Wilmington, Del., June 19, 1861, as Company C, Second Delaware Volunteers.

Benj. Ricketts was captain, with William F. A. Torbert and John G. Simpers lieutenants.

The company served with its regiment in the Army of the Potomac, and participated in all the memorable campaigns of that army.

The battle list comprises White Oak Swamp, Malvern Hill, Antietam, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Auburn, Mine Run, Spottsylvania, Cold Harbor, and Petersburg.

The company was mustered out of service June 23, 1864, John G. Simpers, the original second lieutenant, being then the captain. He re-entered the service Sept. 2, 1864, as captain of Company K, Sixth Maryland, to which he brought forty-eight recruits, thirty of whom had served three years in his old company.

CAVALRY.

First Regiment of Cavalry.—The formation of this regiment was commenced in the summer of 1861, under the first call of the President for three-years' men.

Companies A, B, C, D, and E were recruited in Baltimore City; F, at Baltimore and Cockeysville; G and K, at Pittsburgh, Pa.; H and I, in Allegany and Washington Counties; and L and M, at Washington, D. C. Companies G, H, I, and K were organized for the First Virginia Cavalry, attached to Ward H. Lamon’s brigade, but by order of Gen. McClellan, dated Jan. 28, 1862, they were assigned to this regiment. Companies L and M, organized as independent companies District of Columbia Cavalry, were attached to the regiment in April, 1862, and December, 1863, respectively.

On the 20th of December, 1861, Andrew G. Miller, of Wisconsin, was appointed lieutenant-colonel, and James M. Deems, of Baltimore, major.

On the 1st of May, 1862, Miller was commissioned colonel, and Capt. Charles Wetschky, of Company B, lieutenant-colonel. The original staff-officers consisted of Burr H. Grover, adjutant; David C. Steiner, quartermaster; J. Edward Warner, surgeon; Charles C. Lee, assistant surgeon; and Arthur O. Brickman, chaplain.

The line-officers at original organization of the several companies were as follows:

The original members were mustered out as their terms of service expired, and the organization, composed of veterans and recruits, was retained in service until Aug. 8, 1865, when it was mustered out.

History alone can do full justice to the brave men who composed this regiment. Suffice it here to say that the First Maryland Cavalry maintained a reputation for fidelity and bravery second to no other cavalry regiment.

First Regiment, Potomac Home Brigade Cavalry.—This regiment had its nucleus in a battalion recruited chiefly in Frederick and Washington Counties during the summer of 1861, in accordance with the authority granted Hon. Francis Thomas to organize the Potomac Home Brigade, and was familiarly known as Cole's cavalry.

The four companies constituting the battalion were raised as independent organizations, and served as such until June, 1862, when they were consolidated under the command of the senior captain, Henry A. Cole, who was promoted major Aug. 1, 1862.

Company B did not formally unite with the battalion until March 21, 1863, when the four companies were first brought together at Kearneysville, Va.

The original officers of these companies were:

In the spring of 1864 the battalion was increased to a full regiment of twelve companies.

While in process of augmentation Maj. Cole was advanced to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and Capt. Vernon, of Company A, to that of major.

Upon the completion of the regimental organization its roster of officers stood as follows:

RECORD OF MARYLAND VOLUNTEERS IN THE UNION ARMY. 323

Of the additional companies, E, F, and I were organized mainly at Baltimore City; G, H, and L, at Frederick City; and K and M, at large.

Company D having become reduced below the minimum standard, an independent company, organized at Cumberland in the summer of 1864 by Capt. Tappan W. Kelly, with Henry A. Bier and Columbus F. Benchoff as lieutenants, was assigned in its stead Jan. 30, 1865.

In the capacity of independent companies, or as a battalion and regiment, the services of this command were of the most active and efficient character. It took over one thousand prisoners, and captured or destroyed an immense amount of the enemy's property. Its engagements were numerous, and its marches continuous and severe. From 1861, when it first entered upon the arduous labors peculiar to the cavalry branch of the service, until peace dawned upon the land, Cole’s cavalry was always ready for any duty, and in its performance gained for itself a well-merited reputation, and did honor to the State that sent it into the field. Although generally employed only upon the border of their own State, the service performed by these troops was none the less honorable than that performed by others on more glorious and renowned fields. Their duties in some instances were more perilous and arduous, and if fewer laurels were gained, the consciousness of important services performed is their best reward.

The regiment was mustered out of service June 28, 1865.

Second Regiment of Cavalry.—Under the President's proclamation of June 15, 1863, calling for six-months' volunteers, an effort was made to organize a regiment of cavalry, to be styled the Second. Five companies only were raised,—A, B, and E, at Baltimore; C, in Howard County and at Baltimore; and D, at Washington, D. C., and at Baltimore.

Soon after its organization the battalion, under command of Capt. Bragg, moved from Baltimore to Annapolis, and was employed at various points in Anne Arundel and Calvert Counties, with part of one company on provost duty in the city of Annapolis.

Companies A and B were mustered out of service Jan. 26, 1864; C and D, Feb. 6, 1864; and E, Jan. 31, 1864.

Before the expiration of their terms about seventy men re-enlisted for three years, and, with Lieut. J. F. Lewis, went into Company K of the Third Maryland Cavalry. Some of the other officers and men also re-entered the service in the First Potomac Home Brigade Cavalry.

Third Regiment of Cavalry.3—This regiment, consisting of ten companies, was organized at Baltimore City in the summer and fall of 1863. Companies A, B, C, H, I, and K were recruited at Baltimore. Companies D, E, F, and G were composed of men enrolled at Fort Delaware from among Confederate prisoners of war who had taken the oath of allegiance. In Company I were some men from Frederick County, and a portion of Company K consisted of men re-enlisted from the Second Cavalry.

C. Carroll Tevis, a graduate of the West Point Military Academy, was appointed colonel; Byron Kirby, lieutenant-colonel; William Kesley and Henry E. Clark, majors; William M. Crossland, adjutant; Stillman Williams, quartermaster; John M. Stevenson, surgeon; Edward Borek, Jr., and Joseph S. Claridge, assistant surgeons.

The line-officers were:

Capture of Spanish Fort, Ala., April 9, 1865.

Capture of Fort Blakely, Ala., April 9, 1865.

The regiment was consolidated into six companies Dec. 14, 1864, by the transfer of A to B, C to I, D to F, and G to F, H, and K.

Much reduced in numbers, the battalion was mustered out at Vicksburg, Miss., Sept. 7, 1865. Its service in Louisiana, Alabama, Florida, and Mississippi had sadly thinned its ranks.

Purnell Cavalry.—Two companies of cavalry (A and B) were organized in the fall of 1861, as a part of the Purnell Legion, from which they were permanently detached in the spring of 1862.

The roster of officers of these companies, as it stood at the date of organization, is given in the outline sketch of the Purnell Legion.

Company A left Pikesville Arsenal Jan. 6, 1862, and proceeded to the fair-gounds near Baltimore, afterwards known as Camp Bradford. It was subsequently stationed at Eastville, Franktown, Drummondtown, and Pungoteague, on the Eastern Shore of Virginia, and in St. Mary's County, Md. It also took part in the Gettysburg campaign, being present at the battle fought on the 2d and 3d of July, 1863, and was in frequent skirmishes during the retreat of the enemy towards Virginia. In the fall of 1863 it had a spirited skirmish with some pirates or guerrillas at Cape Charles, Va. It was mustered out of service July 28, 1865.

Company B moved from Pikesville Arsenal to the fair-grounds, near Baltimore, on the 6th of January, 1862, and subsequently did duty at Camp Carroll, Camp Parole, Baltimore City, Smyrna, Del., Bryantown, Monocacy Junction, and with the Army of the Potomac in front of Petersburg.

From Oct. 14, 1862, to Jan. 27, 1863, it was on duty at the State capital, under the orders of Governor Bradford. It was dismounted and equipped as infantry May 28, 1864, and joined the Army of the Potomac June 7, 1864, when it was temporarily attached to the Purnell Legion Infantry.

With this regiment it participated in the following engagements:

- Assault on Petersburg, Va., June 18, 1864.
- Siege of Petersburg, Va., June-October, 1864.
- Battle of Weldon Railroad, Va., Aug. 18-21, 1864.
- Battle of Poplar Spring Church, Va., Sept. 30, 1864.
- Battle of Chapel House, Va., Oct. 1-5, 1864.
- Battle of Peeble's Farm, Va., Oct. 7-8, 1864.

The original members (except veterans) were mustered out Oct. 26, 1864, and the veterans and recruits transferred to Company C, which was subsequently transferred to the Eighth Maryland.

Company C was organized at Baltimore City in September, 1862, with Theodore Clayton as captain, and Charles W. Palmer (promoted from second lieutenant of Company B) and Washington I. Purnell as lieutenants. It was stationed at Camp Bradford to Feb. 5, 1863, when it moved to Harper's Ferry, Va., thence to Drummondtown, Va., thence to Wilmington, Del., and finally, in June, 1864, to the Army of the Potomac in front of Petersburg, where it was assigned temporarily to the Purnell Legion Infantry. With this regiment it bore a part in the same engagements, etc., enumerated in the list of Company B.

The veterans and recruits of Company B were transferred to this company Oct. 26, 1864, and the consolidated force was transferred to the Eighth Maryland, Nov. 17, 1864.

In point of intelligence, courage, and endurance, these companies were not excelled by any in the service, and eminently deserve honorable mention.

Smith's Independent Company of Cavalry.

This company was organized at Snow Hill, Md., in September, 1862, in accordance with authority granted Col. George W. P. Smith by the Secretary of War "to raise a company of cavalry for special duty in Worcester County, unless the exigency of the service should require it to be attached to some regiment for general service."

The company was originally officered by George W. P. Smith, captain; Arthur J. Wallis, first lieutenant; and Charles F. Foster, second lieutenant.

During its term of service the company was stationed at Snow Hill, Newtown, Point Lookout, Eastville, Drummondtown, Salisbury, Relay House, Barnesville, etc.

It was mustered out of service June 30, 1865.

ARTILLERY.

Maryland furnished six batteries to the artillery arm of the service. Two of them were formed in the early part of the war, and performed distinguished services in many of the most important campaigns of the Army of the Potomac.

- Battery A, originally attached to the Purnell Legion, was enrolled at Baltimore City in the fall of 1861. Its first complement of officers consisted of Capt. John W. Wolcott, who had served as a lieutenant in Nims' Massachusetts battery; First Lieuts. James H. Rigby and Thomas Binyon, Second Lieuts. Edgar G. Taylor and Lowell A. Chamberlain. It was engaged with the enemy at
  - Malvern Hill, Va., July 1, 1862.
  - Antietam, Md., Sept. 17, 1862.
  - Fredericksburg, Va., Dec. 13, 1862.
  - Marye's Heights, Va., May 3, 1863.
  - Salem Heights, Va., May 3-4, 1863.
  - Gettysburg, Pa., July 2-3, 1863.

In all its campaigns the battery won the commendation of its superior officers and the admiration of the commands with which it served. On the expiration of its term of service the original members (except veterans) were mustered out, and the organization, composed of veterans and recruits, retained in service until March 11, 1865, when it was consolidated with Battery B.

- Battery B was recruited in Cecil County in the fall of 1861, and was at first attached to the Purnell Legion. The officers at date of organization were Capt. Alonzo Snow, First Lieuts. Lucius A. C. Gerry and T. J. Vanneman, Second Lieuts. James H. Kidd and John M. Bullock.

Its battle list comprises the following:
It was mustered out of service June 24, 1865.

Battery A (Second), otherwise known as the Junior Artillery, was organized at Baltimore in July, 1863, under the President's proclamation of June 15, 1863, calling for six-months' men.

The duties this battery performed were strictly of a local character.

It was mustered out of service Jan. 19, 1864.

Battery B (Second), better known as the Eagle Artillery, was organized at Baltimore in July, 1863, under the President's proclamation of June 15, 1863.

It was mustered out of service Jan. 16, 1864.

CHAPTER XVI

RECORD OF MARYLAND COMMANDS IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY DURING THE CIVIL WAR OF 1861-65.

The First Maryland Infantry.—During the session of the General Assembly at Frederick, in April and May, 1861, it was waited upon by Hon. James M. Mason, formerly United States senator from Virginia, as commissioner from that State, authorized to negotiate a treaty of alliance offensive and defensive with Maryland on her behalf. While in Frederick upon this business, Capt. Bradley T. Johnson, a native of that place, procured from Mr. Mason authority to raise troops for the Confederate service, on the pledge of Mr. Mason that all such troops would be welcomed there. Armed with this inforrmation, Capt. Johnson visited Col. Jackson, then in command of the Virginia troops at Harper's Ferry, and obtained from him permission to rendezvous his troops at the Point of Rocks. Accordingly, on May 8, 1861, Capt. Johnson marched his company out of Frederick to the Point of Rocks and crossed to the Virginia side. On the 9th of May he was joined by Capt. C. C. Edelin with a company from Baltimore. Other skeleton companies were rapidly formed at Harper's Ferry under Capts. James R. Herbert, William G. Nichols, Harry McCoy, Holbrook, Price, and Wellmore. By the 15th of May eight companies had been organized, and Capt. George H. Stewart, of the regular cavalry of the Confederate army, was placed in command of them as lieutenant-colonel by Col. Jackson. Lieut. Col. Stewart had been a captain in the First Regiment United States Cavalry, and being a Marylander, was placed in command of the First

On the 21st and 22d of May the battalion was regularly mustered into the Confederate service by Lieut.-Col. George Deas, assistant inspector-general Confederate States army. In the mean time other Maryland commands were being organized at Richmond, among them four companies commanded by Capts. J. Lyle Clark, E. R. Dorsey, William H. Murray, and M. S. Robertson. Capt. Clark elected to unite his company with the Twenty-first Virginia. The other three companies were united with the battalion at Harper's Ferry, the companies of which were reorganized, and the First Maryland Regiment formed, with Arnold Elzey, late captain of artillery, United States army, colonel; George H. The regiment numbered over seven hundred men at the time of its organization. Company A was brought by Capt. Johnson from Frederick; Companies B, C, E, and F were composed of Baltimoreans; Company D, of men from Prince George's, Anne Arundel, Baltimore, and other counties; Company G, of men from Baltimore City and County, Pikesville and its vicinity; Company I, of men from Charles and St. Mary's; and Company H, of men drawn from all parts of the State. The regiment performed gallant service at the battle of Manassas, where Col. Elzey was made brigadier-general on the field. The casualties in the First Maryland at the battle of Manassas were Corp. John Berryman and Private W. H. Codd, of Company C, badly wounded, and John Swisher, of Company A, mortally wounded, the latter being the first Marylander killed in battle. Capt. E. R. Dorsey, of Company C, was promoted major, 21st of July, 1861, and subsequently made lieutenant-colonel. First Lieut. S. Hunter Stewart, of the same company, was appointed assistant quartermaster, with rank of captain, and Second Lieut. R. Carter Smith was elected captain of Company C in 1861. About the same time Lieut.-Col. Steuart was promoted to the colonelcy, and Maj. Bradley T. Johnson was made lieutenant-colonel. After the battle of Manassas the regiment was ordered to Fairfax Court-House, where it remained about two weeks, when it rejoined the brigade at their camp near Fairfax Station. Here it stayed until the 19th of October, when it withdrew to Centreville, and late in November removed to a pine forest near Manassas, where it went into winter quarters. On the first day of 1862 the "furlough and bounty law" went into effect, and in accordance with its terms, two companies of the First Maryland, A and B, being twelve-months' men, re-enlisted, and received furloughs of from thirty to sixty days. Companies C, H, and I, which had also enlisted for twelve months, did not re-enlist for the war, preferring to enter some other branch of the service. The other four companies had originally enlisted for the war. In the early part of 1862, Lieut.-Col. Bradley T. Johnson was made colonel, and Maj. Edward R. Dorsey lieutenant-colonel of the regiment, which had been detached from Elzey's brigade to form, with the Baltimore Light Artillery, the nucleus of a Maryland brigade under the command of Gen. George H. Steuart, who was promoted to a brigadier-generalcy on the 6th of March. On the 19th of May, 1862, the term of enlistment of Company C expired, and the men were discharged. All, with but two or three exceptions, re-enlisted in the cavalry or artillery. Company C was composed mainly of former members of two crack Baltimore military organizations,—the Baltimore City Guards and the Maryland Guards. At its organization at Harper’s Ferry it had four commissioned and eight non-commissioned officers and sixty-five privates. The discharge of these men naturally revived the question of discharge in reference to Companies H and I, which were also enlisted for twelve months. Some of the companies “in for the war” also contained twelve-months’ men, who had been assigned to them from Companies C and H when the latter, in the reorganization at Winchester in June, 1861, were broken up. All these men claimed their right to a discharge at the expiration of their term of service, or at least an admission on the part of the military authorities of their right to enter other branches of the service. The dispute grew so warm that it was found necessary to put many of the men under arrest. Jackson’s Valley campaign was then in progress, and the discontent was at its height when, on the 20th of May, 1862, Ewell, to whose division the First Maryland was then attached, joined his forces with those of Jackson at New Market. The difficulties were still unsettled when, on the morning of the 23d, Col. Johnson received an order from Gen. Jackson directing him to move the First Maryland to the front, and attack the Federals at Front Royal. The order was obeyed with alacrity, the regiment acquitting itself with great gallantry in the action which followed. Through the efforts of Adjt. Frank X. Ward and others, the men agreed to submit their grievances to the Secretary of War. The regiment distinguished itself in all the battles of Jackson’s famous Valley campaign, and after their defeat of the Pennsylvania “Bucktails,” near Harrisonburg, were complimented with the following order:

"Headquarters Third Division.

"General Orders No. 30.

"In commemoration of the gallant conduct of the First Maryland Regiment on the 6th of June, when, led by Col. Bradley T. Johnson, they drove back with loss the ‘Pennsylvania Bucktail Rifles’ in the engagement near Harrisonburg, Rockingham Co., Va., authority is given to have one of the captured ‘bucktails’ (the insignia of the Federal regiment) appended to the color-staff of the First Maryland Regiment.

"By order of Maj.-Gen. Ewell.”

The First Regiment fully sustained its enviable reputation in the terrible battles around Richmond which followed Jackson’s junction with Gen. Lee, and after the campaign was over returned to Richmond and encamped on the Central Railroad, about three miles from the city. Shortly afterwards it removed to Charlottesville to recruit, arriving there on the 15th of July. The severe service of the last few months had so diminished its numbers that it scarcely mustered two hundred men, and but little progress was made in filling up its ranks. On the 4th of August, 1862, the regiment was ordered to Gordonsville, and here an order to disband was received from the Secretary of War. This was considered the readiest and best means of settling all disputes as to the length of time for which the men had enlisted. It was about the 16th of August that Col. Johnson drew the regiment up in line for the last time, and after a few remarks read the Secretary’s order, and it was with no little sorrow that the men parted from each other and from the flag presented them by the ladies of Baltimore on the day of the first battle of Manassas.

The Second Maryland Battalion.—In anticipation of the disbandment of the First Maryland Battalion, Capt. William H. Murray, of Company H, early in the summer of 1862 secured from the War Department authority to raise a new company. With such of his old company as had re-enlisted "for the war" and desired to remain with him, he opened a recruiting rendezvous at the fair-grounds, near Richmond, and soon filled up his company from among the Marylanders who were then coming South in large numbers.

About the same time Capt. J. Parran Crane, of St. Mary’s County, undertook the organization of a company, to be composed mainly of recruits from Southern Maryland. His company and Murray’s were filled up about the same time, and were mustered in the service at Richmond on Aug. 27, 1862, as Companies A and B, with the following officers:

Company A.—Captain, William H. Murray, of Baltimore; First Lieutenant, George Thomas, of St. Mary’s; Second Lieutenant, Clapham Murray, of Baltimore; Junior Second Lieutenant, William P. Zollinger, of Baltimore.

Company B.—Captain, J. Parran Crane, of St. Mary’s; First Lieutenant, John H. Stone, of Charles County; Second Lieutenant, Charles B. Wise, of St. Mary’s County; Junior Second Lieutenant, James H. Wilson, of St. Mary’s County.

Company A was composed of men drawn from Baltimore City, Anne Arundel, the Eastern Shore, and the southern part of the State. Company B was made up of St. Mary’s and Charles County men.

Capt. Murray having been chosen commander of the battalion, Lieut. George Thomas, of Company A, was designated as acting adjutant, and J. Winder Laird, of Company A, as sergeant-major. On the 12th of September the battalion left Camp Maryland, beyond Winder Hospital, for Charlottesville, Va., where Gen. George H. Steuart was endeavoring to organize a force of Marylanders of all arms, to be known as the Maryland Line. At Winchester the command was joined on the 28th of September by Companies C, D, and E, commanded respectively by Capts. Herbert, McAleer, and Torsch. These companies had been rapidly organized, and contained a strong infusion of the old battalion, though in the main composed of new recruits.

Company C was mustered in on the 11th of September, 1862, with the following officers: Captain, James R. Herbert; First Lieutenant, Ferdinand Duvall; Second Lieutenant, Charles W. Hodges; Junior Second Lieutenant, Joseph W. Barber.

Company E was mainly raised by John W. Torsch, who had served during the first year of the war as lieutenant in Zarvona's Zouaves. His new company was mustered into service about the 14th of September, and was composed of men from Baltimore and the Eastern Shore, some having members of the old First Maryland Battalion, some members of his former command, and some of them new recruits. The men of Capt. McAleer's company, which was mustered in shortly after Capt. Torsch's command, were largely from Western Maryland, with a few from Baltimore and Anne Arundel County.

The officers of Companies D and E were as follows: Company D.—Captain, Joseph L. McAleer, from Frederick; First Lieutenant, James S. Franklin, Annapolis; Second Lieutenant, J. T. Bussey, Baltimore; Junior Second Lieutenant, S. T. McCullough, Annapolis.

While at Winchester Company F was organized, from material drawn mostly from Southern Maryland, and was officered as follows: Captain, Andrew J. Gwinn, Prince George's; First Lieutenant, John W. Polk, Eastern Shore; Second Lieutenant, John G. Hyland, of the same section; Junior Second Lieutenant, Joseph Forrest, of Prince George's County.

Company G was added to the battalion on the 2d of January, 1863, it having been mustered into the service at Richmond on the 20th of December previous. The men were principally from Southern Maryland and the Eastern Shore, and were officered as follows: Captain, W. W. Goldsborough, Baltimore; First Lieutenant, Thomas R. Stewart, of Talbot County; Second Lieutenant, James Davis, of the same county; Junior Second Lieutenant, W. W. Wrightson, of the Eastern Shore.

Near the close of September, 1862, an election was held for field and staff-officers, which resulted in the choice of Capt. Herbert as major; and upon the addition of Company F the battalion had the number of companies requisite to entitle it to two field-officers; whereupon Maj. Herbert, on the 26th of January, 1863, was elected to the lieutenant-colonelcy, and not long afterwards Capt. Goldsborough was promoted to the majority. The battalion organization now became what it continued to be to the close of the war:

Field and Staff.—Lieutenant-Colonel, James R. Herbert, of Baltimore; Major, W. W. Goldsborough, of the same place; Acting Adjutant, Lieut. George Thomas, of St. Mary's; Quartermaster and Commissary, Capt. John Eager Howard, Baltimore; Surgeon, Dr. Wilton Snowden, Prince George's.

Non-Commissioned Staff.—Sergeant-Major, J. Winder Laird, Cambridge; Color-Sergeant, Cole Moore, Talbot County; Quartermaster-Sergeant, Edward S. Judge, Baltimore; Commissary-Sergeant, Edwin James, Washington County; Hospital Steward, John W. McDaniel, Baltimore; Drum Corps; Drum-Major, Michael Quinn; Drummers, William Gannon, Joseph E. Smith, Tobias Aubrey, Charles Drewry.

To fill the vacancies occasioned in Companies C and G, caused by the promotion of their commanding officers, Lieut. Ferdinand Duvall was elected to the command of Company C, and Lieut. Thomas R. Stewart to the command of Company G. “At this time,” Maj. Goldsborough says, “I think, without any exception, that the Second Maryland was the most perfect command, in matters of drill and discipline, that was or had ever been in the Confederate army.”

On June 16, 1863, the battalion was formally attached to Gen. George H. Steuart's brigade, which was then composed of the First and Third North Carolina, the Tenth, Twenty-third, and Thirty-seventh Virginia. Steuart's brigade was then the Third Brigade of the Third (Johnson's) Division of the Second (Ewell's) Army Corps. At the battle of Gettysburg the Second Maryland Battalion lost on Culp's Hill over two-thirds of the command, the estimate being about two hundred and forty-five killed and wounded. It was here that the brave and chivalrous Capt. Murray fell, pierced through the neck, as he was waving his sword as a signal to his men to retire from their assault on the second line of the enemy's works. Among the seriously wounded were

On the 1st of November, 1863, the battalion was transferred from Stuart's brigade to the Maryland Line. This name was given to a command consisting of the First Maryland Cavalry, Second Maryland Infantry, and the Baltimore Light Artillery, to be commanded by Gen. George H. Steuart, of Baltimore. The intention was to make it, if possible, the nucleus of a much larger force,—a division perhaps,—which should consist wholly of Marylanders. There were, it is supposed, at this time more than twenty thousand men from Maryland in the Confederate service, and it was thought desirable, for the name and fame of their native State, that they should be collected under one command. Hitherto the credit of their services had fallen to other States, in whose regiments they had been enrolled. Gathered into one body sufficiently large to play a separate part in action and gain an individual character, they would develop the esprit de corps for which Maryland troops have always been so distinguished, and accomplish all that could be expected of men of their superior intelligence and gallantry.

But the effort to organize such a body never wholly succeeded. The men preferred the associations they had already formed, and were loath to leave them. According to the new arrangement, the infantry, cavalry, and artillery were to rendezvous at Hanover Junction, where they would be under the command of Col. Bradley T. Johnson.

The movement began on the 2d of November, 1863, and by the end of April, 1864, Col. Johnson found himself in command of the First Maryland, Chesapeake, and Baltimore Light Artillery, in addition to the Second Maryland Infantry and the First Maryland Cavalry. About the 1st of April, Gen. Arnold Elzey, of Maryland, by a general order was placed in command, and fixing his headquarters at Staunton, proceeded to take such steps as were thought to be most likely to lead to the desired result. Permission was accorded to every Marylander throughout the Confederacy to receive a transfer from the command in which he was enrolled, and Capt. Torsch was sent on a recruiting expedition to Charleston, S. C., where there was a considerable body of Marylanders, who went South about the time of the first bombardment of Fort Sumter. While some additions were made to the Line from various sources, the same result attended all the efforts to recruit the Maryland Line to the dimensions of a division, or a brigade at least. The attempt to augment the Line and give it a permanent organization was therefore abandoned. Col. B. T. Johnson was promoted to brigadier-general for saving Richmond from the attacks of Gen. Kilpatrick and Dohgren, and placed in command of a brigade of cavalry, under Early, in the Valley, and took the First Maryland Cavalry with him. The Second Maryland Infantry was attached to Breckenridge's division till after Cold Harbor, when it was transferred to Walker's (subsequently McComb's) brigade. Finally the artillery also, early in June, was sent to the Valley; and so the Line was broken up, never again to be reunited.

On the 20th of May, 1864, the Second Maryland Battalion joined Breckenridge at Hanover Junction, and on the last of the month fought under him at the second battle of Cold Harbor. In this engagement the battalion won from Gen. Breckenridge the expression, "What could not be done with a hundred thousand such men!" In a letter to the author Gen. Breckenridge thus speaks of the Marylanders who served under him:

"Lexington, Ky., Jan. 6, 1874.

"My dear Sir,—Since September last I have, until very recently, been hindered by sickness from attending to my correspondence, and I offer this as an apology for the delay in not answering your letter of Nov. 30, 1873. You desire me to tell you something of a Maryland regiment that was in my command toward the close of the war, with a view to use the information in your proposed 'History of Baltimore.' When I crossed over from the Shenandoah Valley in May, 1864, and joined Gen. Lee on the North Anna, near Hanover Junction, a battalion of Maryland infantry was sent to me, and it remained under my command until I returned to the Valley in the following month. It had seen rough service, and I think all the field-officers were absent from disabling wounds. While with me it was commanded by Capt. Crane. I had occasion to observe this battalion along the North Anna, at the Tolopotomy, and in a series of other engagements of greater or less importance, ending with the battle of Cold Harbor early in June, and I take pleasure in saying that its conduct throughout was not merely creditable, but distinguished. Not being incorporated into any brigade, it came more frequently under my eye, and I presently fell into the habit of holding it in hand for occasions of special need. For an instance, at Cold Harbor, where a point in my line was very weak, and was actually broken for a time by Gen. Hancock's troops, the Maryland battalion and Emancig's Florida brigade (the latter borrowed from Gen. Hoke for the occasion) aided decisively to restore the situation, and behaved with the greatest intrepidity. During their brief sojourn with me I was very favorably impressed by these Marylanders. Not in courage only, but also in discipline, tone, and all soldierly qualities they were quite equal to any troops I saw during the war. After my return to the Valley I did not see them any more, yet I never think of them but with admiration and affection. Some Maryland cavalry and artillery under the command of Col. (afterwards Brig.-Gen.) Bradley Johnson reported to me for a few days after my arrival at Hanover Junction. They seemed to be fine troops and well instructed, but I cannot speak of them more particularly.

"With good wishes, I am yours truly,

"John C. Breckenridge.

"Col. J. Thomas Sharp, Baltimore, Md."
The following is what "a Virginian" says, in the Richmond Sentinel, of the part taken by the Marylanders in the second battle of Cold Harbor:

"NEAR RICHMOND, June 6, 1864.

"Mr. Edston.—The public have already been informed, through the columns of the public journals, of the great results of the late engagements between the forces of Geo. Lee and Gen. Grant. But they have not yet learned the particulars, which are always most interesting, and in some instances, owing to the confusion which generally attends large battles, they have been misinformed on some points. It is now known by the public that the enemy were momentarily successful in one of their assaults on the lines held by Maj.-Gen. Breckenridge's division, which might have resulted in disaster to our cause. It will be interesting to all to know what turned disaster into victory, and converted a triumphant column into a flying rabble. The successful assault of the enemy was made under cover of darkness, before the morning star had bid the light of the sun. They came gallantly forward in spite of a severe fire from Gen. Echols' brigade, and in spite of the loss of many of their men, who tell like autumn leaves, until the ground was almost blue and red with their uniforms and their blood. They rushed in heavy mass over our breastworks. Our men, confounded by the suddenness of the charge, and borne down by the rush of the enemy, retreated, and all now seemed to be lost. At this juncture the Second Maryland Infantry, of Col. Bradley T. Johnson's command, now in charge of Capt. J. P. Crane, were rushed from their sleep. Sprunging to their arms they formed in a moment, and rushing gallantly forward, poured a deadly fire into the enemy and then charged bayonets. The enemy were in turn surprised at the suddenness and vim of this assault. They gave back, they became confused, and Gen. Finnegan's forces coming up, they took to flight, but not until nearly a hundred men were stretched on the plain from the fire of the Second Maryland Infantry, and many others captured. Lieut. Charles B. Wise, of Company B, now took possession of the guns which had been abandoned by our forces, and with the assistance of some of his own men and some of Gen. Finnegan's command, poured a deadly fire into the retreating column of the enemy. Thus was the tide of battle turned, and this disaster converted into a success. I am informed that the whole force of the enemy which came within our lines would have been captured had it not been for the mistake of an officer who took the enemy for our own men, and thus checked for a few moments the charge of the Second Maryland Infantry. I take pleasure in narrating these deeds of our Maryland brethren, and doubt not you will join in the feeling.

A VIRGINIAN."

At the battle of Ream's Station, on the Weldon Railroad, on the 19th of August, the Second Maryland Battalion again proved of what material it was made. A contemporaneous writer said,—

"Disdaining to retreat without the command, when all others were seeking safety in flight, they stood to their post to the last. Again and again were they assaulted, but again and again they drove their assailants back with heavy loss. At length in overwhelming numbers the enemy came upon them and reached the breastworks. But there that little band remained for a time as firm as the rock of Gibraltar. But the enemy crossed the breastworks, and the struggle was hand to hand. Desperately the bayonet was thrust, and the butts of muskets crashed through human skulls. But this unequal struggle could not be of long duration, and surrounded and overwhelmed, the survivors fought their way out. Many succeeded, but one-third of that gallant band lay dead and wounded or were prisoners in the hands of the foe."

On the 30th of September, at the battle of Peeble's Farm, the Second Maryland Confederate Infantry took a conspicuous part in that desperate engagement, losing fearfully in killed and wounded. Out of one hundred and forty-nine men that went into the fight, forty-three were killed and wounded. On the next day, October 1st, they again encountered the enemy on the Squirrel Level road, and repulsed them after a sharp engagement with severe loss. For a long while after the battle of Squirrel Level road the Second Marylanders remained in the trenches or were engaged in picketing along their front. It had been reduced to about one hundred men, and still these men were compelled to do the duty of a battalion. So numerous were the desertions in the brigade to which they belonged that it at last became necessary to keep the Marylanders almost constantly on picket, for as sure as this duty was intrusted to other troops just so sure were they to find deserted posts in the morning. And still these brave men never complained of what was imposed upon them. Throughout that dreary fall and the long cold winter, nearly naked and hardly half fed, they silently did their duty, whilst thousands were proving recreant to the cause. Elegant and refined gentlemen, who at home never knew what it was to want for a single comfort, were in rags and tatters, sleeping in mud and filth; and when the bleak winds of December pierced many a rent in their wretched garments, they only drew their sorry blankets the closer around their gaunt and shivering limbs, and cheerfully responded to the call for any duty.

The remnant of this gallant band, under Capt. John W. Torsch, continued steadfast to the last, and bore uncomplainingly the many privations that were imposed upon them. The crisis, however, was approaching when they would cease to exist as a military organization. On the 9th of April, 1865, Capt. Torsch surrendered with the Army of Northern Virginia, sixty-three officers and men, the survivors of a battalion conspicuously marked by unsurpassed courage and fortitude.

At the time of the surrender the Second Maryland Battalion was in McCombs' brigade, and that officer upon taking leave of his favorite battalion gave Capt. Torsch, its commander, the following very complimentary letter:

"RICHMOND, Va., April 26, 1865.

"CAPTAIN,—I leave the city this morning. I hope we may meet again under more favorable circumstances. If not, I will commend you to any country to which you may elect to go as a true and gallant officer."
Words cannot express the high esteem I have for the brave and gallant officers and enlisted men in your command. They have proven themselves in every battle in which they have participated brave as the bravest in the Army of Northern Virginia.

I am, with much respect,
Your Obd't Sert,
Wm. M. McComb
Brig.-Gen. C.S.A.

To Capt. John W. Torisch, Second Maryland Infantry.
McComb's Brigade,
Heth's Division,
Third Corps, A. V. N."

In the same connection, after the war, Jefferson Davis sent the author the following letter:

MEMPHIS, August 28, 1873.

Col. J. Thomas Scharf, Baltimore, Md.:

Dear Sir,—Yours of the 22d inst. received, and I am glad to know that you are about to make a durable record of the services of the Baltimoreans in the great struggle for the assertion of State rights and the preservation of constitutional government. The world will accord to them peculiar credit, as it has always done to those who leave their hearthstones to fight for principle in the land of others. I am glad that your old commander, so distinguished for skill and gallantry, survives to bear testimony to the individual merit of the members of his company. Wishing you long life, prosperity, and happiness,

"I remain very respectfully and truly yours,

JEFFERSON DAVIS."

Zarvona's Zouaves.—About the 15th of June, 1861, Richard Thomas, of St. Mary's County, whose name was afterwards changed by the Legislature of Virginia to Zarvona, and who had served under Garibaldi in his Sicilian campaign, with George W. Alexander, who had recently resigned from the United States navy, went to Baltimore and enlisted sixty-two men for the Confederate service. They were taken on the steamers of the Weems's Patuxent Line to Millstone Landing, St. Mary's County, but soon after crossed the Potomac into Virginia, where it organized as a Zouave company with the following officers: Captain, Richard Thomas; First Lieutenant, George W. Alexander; Second Lieutenant, J. W. Torisch; Third Lieutenant, Frank Parsons.

In June, 1861, Capt. Thomas conceived the idea of capturing the steamer "St. Nicholas," running between Baltimore and Washington, in which he was successful. About ten days after this bold exploit Capt. Thomas, or the "French Lady," as he was called, from the disguise he assumed in his first enterprise, was captured on his return to Baltimore and incarcerated in Forts McHenry and Lafayette. About the same time Lieut. Alexander was captured on the Eastern Shore, and was also confined in Fort McHenry, from which, by the aid of his devoted wife, he managed to escape. From close confinement the mind of Capt. Thomas became impaired, and after his release he went to France to live, but returned to this country shortly after the war, where he died. Lieut. Alexander after his release was made provost-marshal of the Eastern District of Virginia. After Capt. Thomas was permanently detached from his command, William Waters was elected captain. The company remained for some weeks on the Rappahannock, and was then assigned as Company H to the Forty-seventh Virginia Regiment. It remained with the Forty-seventh till October, when it was detached to the batteries at Evansport, to aid in blockading the Potomac during the winter of 1861-62. Upon the evacuation of Evansport, Lieut. John W. Torisch with eight men was left to finish blowing up the magazines. The company joined its command at Fredericksburg, and participated in the campaign on the Peninsula. At the reorganization of the army the company was transferred to the Second Arkansas Battalion, under the command of Maj. Brenan, consisting of three companies, and remained with it until about the 10th of June, 1862, when, its term of service having expired, the company was disbanded.

The Maryland Guard, or Company B, Twenty-first Virginia Regiment, was mustered into the Confederate service at Richmond, Va., for one year on the 24th of May, 1861, numbering one hundred and nine commissioned and non-commissioned officers and privates. The larger portion of its members formerly belonged to the Maryland Guards, a volunteer militia organization, formed in Baltimore in 1860, and nearly all were Baltimoreans. The commissioned officers were as follows:

Captain, J. Lyle Clarke; First Lieutenant, R. Curzon Hoffman; Second Lieutenant, W. Stewart Symington; Third Lieutenant, Joseph Selby.

On the 29th of May, 1861, the company was ordered to the south side of the James River at Petersburg. After a brief campaign in this locality the company was attached to Col. Gillam's Twenty-first Virginia Regiment, becoming Company B. About the 15th of July, 1861, Col. Gillam's regiment left Richmond to join Gen. Lee in his operations in Northwestern Virginia, and participated in that severe campaign. The last battle at which the Maryland Guard were present was that at Front Royal, on May 23, 1862. Its term of service having expired on the 24th, it was put in charge of the prisoners captured in that battle and sent to Richmond, where it was mustered out of service. The command almost unanimously joined other Maryland organizations which were then in service or forming in Richmond. J. Lyle Clarke, the first commander of the Maryland Guard, was commissioned captain in the Confederate States army, May 24, 1861; promoted to major in February; and commissioned May 1, 1862, to serve as assistant adjutant-general to Maj.-Gen. W. W. Loring; promoted to lieutenant-colonel Oct. 5, 1862, to command the Thirtieth Virginia Battalion of Sharpshooters. He was disabled near Staunton, on Early's march to Maryland, in 1864. R. Curzon Hoffman was commissioned first lieutenant May 24, 1861; promoted to captain April 3, 1862; appointed captain of Company E, Thirtieth Virginia Battalion of Sharpshooters, Oct. 5, 1862. W. Stewart Symington was commissioned second lieutenant May 24, 1861; promoted to first lieutenant April 3, 1862; afterwards promoted to captain and major on Gen. George E. Pickett's staff. Joseph Selby was commissioned third lieutenant May 24, 1861; promoted to second lieutenant April 3, 1862; appointed first lieutenant Company E, Thirtieth Virginia Battalion of Sharpshooters, Oct. 5, 1862. James Adams was second lieutenant of this company, and Wm. T. Iglehart was third lieutenant.

First Maryland Artillery.—In April, 1861, R. Snowden Andrews, of Baltimore, received authority of Governor Letcher, of Virginia, to organize a company of light artillery, to be known as the First Maryland Artillery. With the aid of the Virginia Ordnance Department, then under the charge of Col. Dimock, Mr. Andrews proceeded with that industry and energy for which he has always been remarkable to instruct and equip with guns, caissons, horses and harness, as well as enroll, organize, and drill the men for his company. From designs of his own, the first three brass twelve-pound Napoleon guns made in the Confederate States and three twelve-pound brass howitzers were cast by Col. Dimock. These were the models for all other Napoleon cast in the Confederacy. While constructing the battery and equipments, Mr. Andrews enlisted and organized one hundred and forty-seven Marylanders, by whom he was elected captain, with William T. Dement, of Charles County, first lieutenant; Charles Snowden Contee, of Prince George's, junior first lieutenant; Frederick Dabney, of Mississippi, second lieutenant; and Dr. DeWilton Snowden, orderly sergeant. The company was mustered into the Virginia service in June, 1861, and the next day transferred with the other Virginia forces to the Confederate army. The company was mustered into the Virginia service by the request of Governor Letcher, in order that he might supply the Marylanders with their celebrated battery. These guns were cast at the Tredegar Works in June and July, 1861, and used in all the battles of the Army of Northern Virginia, and by their great success induced the Confederate authorities to recast all of their six-and twelve-pound howitzers into Napoleon guns of Andrews' pattern. The first service of this celebrated battery was in the blockade of the Potomac at Evansport, Va. From Evansport it was transferred to Magruder's line at Yorktown, and took part in all the engagements from Yorktown to the relief of Richmond from the army of McClellan. At the battle of Mechanicsville the First Maryland Artillery, under Capt. Andrews, had the honor of firing the "first gun," and during the engagement he was wounded in the leg. For the gallantry displayed by Capt. Andrews during the Seven Days' fights around Richmond, at the recommendation of Gen. Lee, he was promoted to major, and subsequently rose to the high rank of lieutenant-colonel of artillery.

Upon the promotion of Capt. Andrews to major, Lieut. Dement became captain of the company. Lieut. Dabney having received a higher appointment in the Engineer Corps, he was transferred to the Southwestern army, where he subsequently acquired great distinction. To fill the vacancies in the company, Charles Contee was promoted to first lieutenant; John Gale, of Somerset County, to junior first lieutenant; William J. Hill, of Prince George's, second lieutenant; J. Harris Stonestreet, of Charles, junior second lieutenant. The company participated in all the engagements in which the Army of Northern Virginia was engaged up to the battle of Winchester, where it was particularly distinguished. In the report of Gen. Ewell of his summer campaign of 1863 he says,—

"Lieut.-Col. Andrews, of the artillery, not fully recovered from his serious wound at Cedar Run, was again wounded at Winchester, and while suffering from his wounds appeared on the field at Hagerstown and reported for duty. At Winchester, Lieut. Charles S. Contee's section of Dement's (First Maryland) battery was placed in short musket-range of the enemy on the 15th of June, and maintained its position till thirteen of the sixteen men in the two detachments were killed or wounded, when Lieut. John A. Morgan, of the First North Carolina Regiment, and Lieut. R. H. McKim, A. D. C. to Brig.-Gen. George H. Steuart, volunteered and helped to work the guns till the surrender of the enemy. The following are the names of the gallant men belonging to the section: Lieut. C. S. Contee, A. J. Albert, Jr., John Kester, William Hill, B. W. Owens, John Glasscock, John Harris, William Wooden, C. C. Pease, Frederick Frayer, — Duvall, William Compton, John Yates, William Brown, William H. Gorman, Thomas Moore, Robert B. Chew. Col. Brown, chief of artillery, recommends Lieut. Contee for promotion to the captnay of the Chesapeake (Maryland) Artillery, ever Capt. W. D. Brown, a most gallant and valuable officer, killed at Gettysburg."

During Mahone's attack along the line of the Weldon Railroad, on June 22, 1864, the First Maryland Artillery silenced a battery that was annoying the Confederate infantry. The men left their guns, and with the horses rushed forward to the Federal battery, hastily by hand worked the four pieces (three-inch steel Dahlgren rifles) over the breastworks, and brought them into the Confederate lines. The absolute capture of a battery by another was so rare in the annals of warfare that it created a great furor in the army, and the Marylanders received great praise the following day from Gen. Mahone in his congratulatory address. From this time to the springing of the Crater mine the First Maryland had no part in any general engagement. After this event the company was sent to Drury's Bluff, and occupied quarters there until its evacuation, April 2d. The men of the First Maryland, who had stood by their guns during the whole of the war and had never lost one, were now ordered to spike their guns and leave them in the pits, as there were no horses to remove them, and take muskets and follow the retreating army. On Sunday following, April 9th, the surrender took place, and thus ended the career of a company that won a proud name in an army distinguished for every soldierly virtue.

The Baltimore Light Artillery, or Second Battery, was organized early in the war by Capt. J. B. Brockenborough. Its officers at various times during the war were as follows: Capt. Brockenborough, promoted to major; First Lieut. W. H. Griffin, promoted to captain; Second Lieut. W. B. Bean, promoted to first lieutenant; Junior Second Lieut. J. W. Goodman; Third Lieut. John McNulty, promoted to captain and major. Non-commissioned officers: Orderly Sergeant, W. Wirt Robinson; Quartermaster-Sergeant, James Smith; Commissary-Sergeant, Louis Claus; Ordnance Sergeant, William Quinn; First Sergeant, G. W. Poindexter; Second, Joseph Bean; Third, Harry Marston; Fourth, James Morrison; First Corporal, John A. Watter; Second, Christopher Pohlman; Third, George Pilleto; Fourth, James F. Owens. This company served with distinguished gallantry during the entire war in the Army of Northern Virginia.

The Third Maryland Artillery was recruited at Richmond, Va., in October, 1861, by Henry B. Latrobe, eldest son of John H. B. Latrobe, of Baltimore, John B. Rowan, William L. Ritter, and other Marylanders. The first rendezvous was at Ashland; from thence on the 4th of November it was ordered to Camp Dimock for instruction. On the 4th of December it was ordered into winter quarters at Camp Lee, on the fair-grounds, two miles from Richmond, and on Jan. 14, 1862, the battery was mustered into the Confederate service as "Third Maryland Artillery," with the following officers:

Captain, Henry B. Latrobe, of Baltimore; Senior First Lieutenant, Ferdinand O. Claiborne, of New Orleans; Junior First Lieutenant, John B. Rowan, of Elkton, Md.; Second Lieutenant, William Thompson Patten, of Port Deposit, Md.; Orderly Sergeant, William L. Ritter, of Carroll County, Md.; Quartermaster's Sergeant, Albert T. Emory, of Queen Anne's County, Md.; First Battery Sergeant, James M. Buchanan, Jr., Baltimore County; Second Battery Sergeant, John P. Hooper, of Cambridge, Md.; Third Battery Sergeant, Edward H. Langley, of Georgia; Fourth Battery Sergeant, Thomas D. Giles, of Delaware; Battery Surgeon, Dr. J. W. Franklin, of Virginia.

The company was composed of ninety-two men, exclusive of commissioned officers. Of the former about twenty were from Maryland, and ten from Washington City or its vicinity. The battery consisted of two six-pounders, smooth-bore, twelve-pounder howitzers, and received afterwards two three-inch iron rifled pieces.

On the 4th of February, 1862, the company was ordered to report at Knoxville, Tenn., and arrived there on the 11th. During the remainder of the war the battery played an important part in the Southwestern Department of the Confederate army, and performed gallant service in the Confederate operations at Vicksburg and on the Mississippi River, in the mountains of East Tennessee and the open fields of Kentucky.

On May 1, 1862, it was made a six-gun battery, and Holmes Erwin, of Nashville, Tenn., was appointed junior second lieutenant. On March 1, 1863, Capt. Henry B. Latrobe left the service and Lieut. Holmes Erwin resigned; at the same time Lieut. F. O. Claiborne was promoted to captain to fill the vacancy. On the 17th of March, 1863, Orderly Sergt. William L. Ritter was elected junior second lieutenant, and on the 21st of the same month was promoted to senior second lieutenant, and Sergt. Thomas D. Giles elected to fill the vacancy. April 14, 1863, Lieut. William T. Patten was killed aboard the "Queen of the West," on Grand Lake, and on the 22d of June following Capt. Ferdinand O. Claiborne was killed at Vicksburg, Miss. On the 30th of June, 1863, Lieut. John B. Rowan was promoted to captain, and J. W. Doncaster elected junior second lieutenant. Dec. 16, 1864, Capt. John B. Rowan was killed before Nashville, Tenn., and Lieut. William L. Ritter was promoted captain to fill the vacancy. The battery, after displaying conspicuous gallantry on many hard-fought fields, surrendered at Meridian, Miss., May 4, 1865, and on the 12th the men were paroled.
The Fourth Maryland, or Chesapeake Artillery, was organized at Camp Lee, Richmond, Va. The following were the officers: Captain, Wm. Brown, of Baltimore; Senior First Lieutenant, John Plater, of Baltimore; Junior First Lieutenant, Walter Chew, of Washington, D. C.; Senior Second Lieutenant, John Grayson, of Queen Anne’s County. The office of junior second lieutenant was left vacant and afterwards filled by Lieut. Roberts, of St. Mary’s County. Orderly Sergeant, Martin L. Harvey; First Sergeant, Thomas Le Compt; Second, Robert Crowley; Third, Philip Brown; Fourth, James Wall; Corporals, Thomas Coubray, Bey Hopkins, Henry C. Buckmaster, Daniel Dougherty; Commissary-Sergeant, John P. Hickey; Quartermaster, George McCubbin; Bugler, Henry Wilkinson; Blacksmith, Thomas Brady.

The Fourth Maryland Artillery participated in nearly all the engagements in which the Army of Northern Virginia was engaged. At the battle of Chancellorsville, Lieut. Grayson, Corp. Hopkins, and Private Graham were killed, and a large number of others severely wounded. At Gettysburg the battery lost heavily. Capt. Brown, Lieut. Roberts, Sergt. Brown, Corp. Dougherty, and several others were killed, besides a large number wounded. The command took a prominent part in the gallant defense of Fort Gregg, near Petersburg, and surrendered with the rest of the Army of Northern Virginia.

The First Maryland Cavalry.—The nucleus of this gallant command was a body of eighteen men, who at Richmond on the 15th of May, 1862, organized Company A. They had belonged to Capt. Gaither’s company, then connected with the First Virginia Cavalry. The new organization was officered as follows: Captain, Ridgely Brown, of Montgomery County; First Lieutenant, Frank A. Bond, of Anne Arundel County; Second Lieutenant, Thomas Griffith, of Montgomery County; Third Lieutenant, James A. V. Pue, of Frederick County.

The command being recruited to a full company, it was speedily mustered into service, and joined Jackson in the Valley, and participated in all the engagements in which that distinguished officer was engaged. After the return of Lee’s army from the Maryland campaign of 1862, Company A was joined in Virginia by three companies of Marylanders, organized by Capt. Emack, R. C. Smith, and Warner Welsh. On the 25th of November, 1862, the battalion was organized with the following field and staff-officers:

Major, Ridgely Brown; Adjutant, Lieut. George W. Booth; Quartermaster, Ignatius Dorsey; Surgeon, Wilmer McKnew.

Company A.—Captain, Frank A. Bond; Lieutenants, Thomas Griffith, J. A. V. Pue, Edward Beatty.

Company B.—Captain, George W. Emack; Lieutenants, M. E. McKnew, Adolphus Cook, Henry Blackston.

Company D.—Captain, Warner E. Welsh; Lieutenants, W. H. Dorsey, Stephen D. Lawrence, Milton Welsh.

The battalion, as thus organized, was afterwards augmented by the addition of other companies.

Company E.—Captain, W. I. Raisin; Lieutenants, John B. Burroughs, Nathaniel Chapman, Joseph K. Roberts.

In July, 1864, the company of Capt. Dorsey, which had up to that time served with distinction in the First Virginia Cavalry, joined the battalion. Its third lieutenant, Randolphs Cecil, was killed during the company’s connection with the Virginia regiment. At the time it joined the Maryland battalion Company H was officered by Capt. Gustavus W. Dorsey and Lieuts. N. C. Hobbs and Edward Pugh. Maj. Brown was then elected lieutenant-colonel of the battalion, and Capt. R. C. Smith was promoted to major to fill the vacancy.

In the campaign of 1864 the First Maryland Cavalry saved the city of Richmond from being destroyed by Gen. Dahlgren’s raiders, and on June 1, 1864, the brave Lieut.-Col. Ridgely Brown lost his life in battle near Dabney’s Ferry on the South Anna. Maj. R. C. Smith received a disabling wound at Greenland Gap, in Western Virginia, and was retired, no one being appointed to fill the vacancy. After the death of Lieut.-Col. Brown, however, Capt. Dorsey was promoted to a lieutenant-colonelcy and put in command of the battalion. On the last day of the existence of the Army of Northern Virginia, while the articles of capitulation were being prepared, the First Maryland Cavalry broke through the Federal lines and escaped to Lynchburg, where the command remained about ten days, and then took up the line of march for Gen. Johnston’s army. At Cloverdale, Botetourt Co., Va., on April 28, 1865, the command learned from Gen. M. unford that Gen. Johnston had surrendered. The general being sick, he sent his favorite battalion the following complimentary letter:
“CLOVERDALE, BOTETOURT COUNTY, Va.,
April 29, 1865.

LIEUT.-COL. DORSEY, commanding First Maryland Cavalry:

I have just learned from Capt. Ensmack that your gallant band was moving up the Valley in response to my call. I am deeply pained to say that our army cannot be reached, as I have learned that it has capitulated. It is sad, indeed, to think that our country is all shrouded in gloom. But for you and your command there is the consolation of having faithfully done your duty. Three years ago the chivalric Brown joined my old regiment with twenty-three Maryland volunteers, with light hearts and full of fight. I soon learned to admire, respect, and love them for all those qualities which endure soldiers to their officers. They recruited rapidly, and as they increased in numbers so did their reputation and friends increase, and they were soon able to form a command and take a position of their own.

Need I say, when I see that position so high and almost alone among soldiers, that my heart swells with pride to think that a record so bright and glorious is in some part linked with mine? Would that I could see the mothers and sisters of every member of your battalion, that I might tell them how nobly you have represented your State and maintained our cause. But you will not be forgotten. The fame you have won will be guarded by Virginia with all the pride she feels in her own true sons, and the ties which have linked us together memory will preserve. You who struck the first blow in Baltimore, and the last in Virginia, have done all that could be asked of you; and had the rest of our officers and men adhered to our cause with the same devotion, to-day we would have been free from Yankee thraldom. I have ordered the brigade to return to their homes, and it behooves us now to separate. With my warmest wishes for your welfare, and a hearty God bless you, I bid you farewell.

THOMAS T. MUNFORD,
Brigadier-General Commanding Division.”

Company B of White’s (Thirty-fifth Virginia Battalion of Partisan) Rangers was composed almost exclusively of Marylanders, drawn from Poolesville and its vicinity. It began to be organized under George W. Chiswell, at Charlottesville, Va., towards the close of June, 1862, though it appears an organization was effected some time before in Maryland. On the 12th of September, 1862, the company was completely organized and serving under Capt. White, who at that time had but two companies under his command, being engaged in scouting in the neighborhood of Harper’s Ferry, on the Maryland and Virginia side of the Potomac. The command soon grew to six companies, and a battalion was organized and mustered into the Confederate service on the 28th of October, 1862. Capt. White, of Company A, was made major, and selected Lieut. Crown, of Company B, as his adjutant. At this time the Maryland company (B) was officered as follows: Captain, George W. Chiswell; First Lieutenant, Joshua R. Crown; Second Lieutenant, Nicholas W. Dorsey; Third Lieutenant, Edward J. Chiswell. About the middle of December, 1862, the battalion made a raid to Poolesville, Md., and captured a large amount of property, including sixty horses. In June, 1863, the command took part in the engagement at Brandy Station, where Capt. Chiswell was so badly wounded in a charge upon a Federal battery that he was disabled the service. By an effective charge made at Parker’s Store, Nov. 29, 1863, the battalion won the name given to it by Gen. Rosser,—the “Comanches.” After this time the “Comanches” shared in the fortunes of the cavalry of the Army of Northern Virginia, and at Appomattox Court-House did not surrender, but broke through the lines to Lynchburg. Here subsequently they went by twos and threes to the Federal officers and were paroled.

Company G of the Seventh Virginia Cavalry Regiment was formed in Romney, Hampshire Co., W. Va., June 17, 1861. A few months later an election of officers was held at Morgan Springs, near Shepherdstown, Jefferson Co., W. Va., which resulted as follows: Captain, Frank Mason, of Virginia; First Lieutenant, T. Sturgis Davis, of Towson, Baltimore Co., Md.; Second Lieutenant, Thadeus Thrasher, of Frederick County, Md. (killed at Kerns, March 22, 1862). At the close of the first year T. S. Davis was elected captain; Benjamin P. Crampton, of Frederick County, Md., first lieutenant; Rodney Howell, of the same county, second lieutenant; and Blanchard Philpot, of the same county, third lieutenant. Harry Gilmor, who afterwards became distinguished as a cavalry leader, was at the first election a private in this company, which was a favorite with Col. Turner Ashby. Company G never lost its identity as a Maryland command, and did as effective, service as any other cavalry company in the Confederate army.

Besides the foregoing exhibit, Maryland had in various other commands a large number of men in the Confederate army. There was a company of infantry in the Thirteenth Virginia Infantry, under the command of Capt. Clayton Hill; a battalion of six companies of cavalry, under Maj. Harry Gilmor, of Baltimore, who has published a very thrilling narrative of its adventures on the border; the Howard County Dragoons, commanded by Capt. G. R. Gaither, and attached till July, 1864, to the First Virginia Cavalry, after which date it became the seventh company in the First Maryland; Company D of Mosby’s battalion of partisan rangers, commanded by Capt. R. P. Mountjoy (of Mississippi) and Lieuts. C. E. Grogan, W. Trunnel, and D. Briscoe, the latter all Marylanders. There were many other Marylanders in the cavalry commands of Mosby, White, and McNeal; a large number served as staff-officers, and in various positions requiring special intelligence and skill. Two-thirds of “Stuart’s horse artillery” (Breathed’s battery) were Marylanders, and much the larger part of Purcell’s battery was of the same material. In general officers Maryland made an excellent showing: Arnold Elzy, appointed Aug. 28, 1861, promoted major-general Dec. 4, 1862; Gen. Isaac Trimble, appointed Aug. 9, 1861, promoted major-general Jan. 17, 1863; Mansfield Lovell, promoted major-general Oct. 7, 1861; Bradley T. Johnson, appointed June 28, 1864; W. W. Mackall, appointed March 6, 1862; George H. Steuart, appointed March 8, 1862; Charles S. Winder, appointed March 7, 1862; John H. Winder, appointed March 7, 1861. Marylanders held important commands in the Confederate navy. Among those who attained special prominence were Admiral Raphael Semmes, Admiral Franklin Buchanan, Capt. George N. Hollins, Capt. Isaac S. Sterett, Commander C. H. McBlair, Commander R. F. Pinkney, Commander J. E. Barney, and Commander Frederick Chatard.

CHAPTER XVII.

POLITICAL PROGRESS.

Under the charter of Maryland the legislative power was lodged in the hands of the proprietary, with the proviso that it should be exercised “by and with the advice, assent, and approbation of the freemen, or of the delegates or deputies,” the right being reserved to him of selecting the mode in which they should be assembled. The warrants for convening the Assemblies issued by the Governors at the foundation of the province determined whether they should be convened in person or by deputies; or if by deputies, the number of deputies to which each county should be entitled and the manner in which they should be elected. From the first Assembly of the province until the government passed into the hands of Cromwell’s commissioners there was no settled or uniform mode of convening Assemblies. At that time the elective franchise was not highly appreciated, and there are several instances showing that the inconvenience of personal attendance and the obligation to defray the expense of delegates occasionally caused it to be considered a grievance. “Until 1650 the delegates were elected for hundreds or settlements, and the warrant for each Assembly specified the number to be elected for each hundred. There was no regular delegate system before this period, and perhaps this arose from the existence of the right then generally conceded to the freemen of appearing in the Assembly in person or by proxy. It was not until 1659, when the Lower House was made to consist only of delegates, that its organization became regular. At the session of 1659 four delegates were called from each county, and from this period until 1681, with one exception, the summons permitted the election of two, three, or four delegates in each, at the option of the people. In the latter year the number was reduced to two by the proprietor’s ordinance; but in 1692, after the establishment of the royal government, the constitution of the Lower House was regulated by law, and four delegates were again allotted to each county. The right of representation thus established upon the basis of equality among the counties existed without alteration until the American Revolution.” Thus it appears that from the colonization until 1659 the right of representation had no regular character. Sometimes the Assemblies had the nature of the “Ecclesia” of the Athenians. They were assemblies of the freemen generally rather than of representatives. Every freeman had a right to be personally present, and this right being a personal privilege, like that of a member of the English House of Peers, he might either appear in person or by proxy. When the Assemblies were so constituted the government was a pure democracy, being administered by the people in person. At other times the freemen were permitted to appear only by delegates or deputies, elected in the manner prescribed by the warrants of election. The three sessions of 1640, and those of July, 1641, and 1642, were of the latter character; the other sessions were of the former, which was the prevailing character. After the commotions of the civil war in England had ceased, and the government was restored to the proprietary by Cromwell’s commissioners, viz., from 1659, the Assembly consisted only of delegates, and from that period the right of appointing proxies or appearing personally wholly ceased. Yet it was not until 1681 that any restrictions appear to have been imposed upon the people in the choice of delegates. It was the disposition of both the proprietary and the people to extend rather than to abridge the right, and it was not until it was esteemed a privilege that restrictions were imposed. By the proprietary’s ordinance of the 6th of September, 1681, the same qualifications were required for delegates as for voters, and these qualifications were continued as to both until the Revolution. This ordinance confined the privilege of being delegates to all freemen having a freehold of fifty acres, or residents having a visible personal estate of £40 within the county. The qualifications were re-established by law in 1692, and continued by the successive acts of 1704, 1708, 1715, and 1716 until the beginning of the Revolution, and they were then preserved by the provisional government. When Maryland joined in the Declaration of Independence, in 1776, a new constitution was adopted, by which it was provided that the House of Delegates should be chosen in the following manner: "All freemen above twenty-one years of age, having a freehold of fifty acres of land in the county in which they offer to vote and residing therein, and all freemen having property in this State above the value of £30 current money, and having resided in the county in which they offer to vote one whole year next preceding the election, shall have a right of suffrage in the election of delegates for such county. These provisions were continued without alteration until 1802, when the property qualification for voters was entirely abolished, and the elective franchise was placed under new regulations applicable as well to elections in Western Maryland as in other parts of the State. These regulations excluded persons of color, previously enjoying the right of franchise when free and possessing the necessary property qualifications, and conferred the right to vote exclusively upon "free white persons, citizens of the State, above the age of twenty-one, and having a residence of twelve months next preceding the election in the city or county in which they offered to vote." Elections by viva voce vote and the property qualifications were still required "in persons to be appointed or holding offices of profit or trust;" but in November, 1809, John Hanson Thomas, of Frederick County, introduced a bill in the Assembly by which all such clauses of the constitution were repealed, and in the following year the act was confirmed. Under the constitution of 1776 the qualifications of a member of the House of Delegates included, besides the other requisites of a voter, the possession of an estate of £500. The time of election was the first Monday of October in each year; the mode was viva voce; the judges of elections in the counties were the sheriffs; in Annapolis the municipal authorities; and in Baltimore, at first its commissioners, but after its erection into a city the mayor and Second Branch of the City Council, with whom it remained until 1799. Until that year "there had been but one place for holding the elections in Baltimore as well as in the counties, but a new system was then adopted for both."

Before 1776 Baltimore had enjoyed no separate representation in the Assemblies; but under the constitution of that year it was allowed two representatives in the House of Delegates. The Senate consisted of fifteen members, taken indiscriminately from any part of the State, with the sole restriction that nine of them were to be residents of the west and six of the east side of Chesapeake Bay. Their term of office was five years, and they were chosen by an electoral college, composed of two electors from each of the counties, and one each from Annapolis and Baltimore. The electors were required to possess the qualifications necessary for delegates, and met at Annapolis on the third Monday in September after their election, to proceed to the election of a Senate. The qualifications of a senator were that he should be above the age of twenty-five, should have resided in the State for the three years next preceding his election, and should have real or personal property above the value of £1000.

After the conclusion of the Revolution political sentiment in the State was divided between those who favored the enlargement of the powers delegated to the Federal Congress and those who, fearing that such an enlargement would imperil the independence and sovereignty of the States, insisted that these powers should be strictly confined within the original limits. After the adoption of the Federal Constitution in 1787, and its subsequent ratification by the States, a struggle for supremacy at once began between these two parties, which was nowhere more earnestly conducted than in Western Maryland. The depth and intensity of public feeling was manifested in the State and Federal elections of the day, and a degree of bitterness developed scarcely exceeded in the political agitations of any subsequent period.

In compliance with a resolution of Congress, the General Assembly of Maryland, on the 22d of December, 1788, passed "an act directing the time, places, and manner of holding elections of representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States, and for appointing electors on the part of the State for choosing a President and Vice-President of the United States, and for the regulation of the said elections. 1 By this law the State was divided into six districts, which were numbered from one to six. The first district was composed of St. Mary's, Charles, and Calvert Counties; the second of Kent, Talbot, Cecil, and Queen Anne's Counties; the third of Anne Arundel (including Annapolis) and Prince George's Counties; the fourth of Baltimore (including Baltimore Town) and Harford Counties; the fifth of Somerset, Dorchester, Worcester, and Caroline Counties; the sixth of Frederick, Washington, and Montgomery Counties.

It was provided that the first election should be held on the first Wednesday in January, but after this on the first Monday of October in every second year thereafter. The electors were to consist of eight persons, five to be residents of the Western Shore and three of the Eastern Shore. There were to be six representatives, who were to be residents of the district they were to represent, but every person coming to vote for such representative "shall have a right to vote for six persons," thereby giving each voter the right to vote for the general ticket. The elections to be free and made ex aequo. The mode of electing senators to represent Maryland in the United States Senate at this time engaged the attention of the public, and after considerable discussion the State Senate proposed to the House of Delegates, and it agreed, "that the two Senators to represent this State should be elected by a joint ballot of both houses; and that no person should be elected a senator from this State unless by a majority of the attending members of both houses."

Tuesday, Dec. 9, 1788, being the day appointed for the election, thirteen members of the Senate and seventy of the House of Delegates attended in joint convention, when a resolution was adopted declaring "that one senator should be a resident of the Western and the other of the Eastern Shore." Hon. Charles Carroll of Carrollton and Uriah Forrest, of Montgomery County, were put in nomination for the Western Shore, and Hon. John Henry and George Gale for the Eastern Shore, and upon counting the ballots Henry received 41, Gale 41, Forrest 41, and Carroll 49. There being 83 ballots cast and neither of the candidates receiving a majority, a second ballot was taken with the following result: Henry 42, Gale 40, Carroll 41, and Forrest 41. Mr. Henry receiving a majority, was declared elected United States senator, after which the Legislature adjourned until the next day, when Mr. Carroll was elected by 42 to 39. The first constitutional election for representatives in Congress and electors for President and Vice-President took place in January, 1789, and resulted in the triumph of the Federal ticket. The successful Presidential electors in Maryland were Chancellor John Rogers, Col. George Plater, Col. Wm. Tilghman, Wm. Richardson, Alexander C. Hanson, Robert Smith, Dr. Philip Thomas, and Dr. Wm. Matthews. The highest vote cast in Frederick County was 790, the highest in Washington 1164, and in Montgomery 320. Political excitement ran high at this election, and in Baltimore and other sections of the State the anti-Federalists made a strong fight. Western Maryland, however, was almost solid for the Federal electors, the highest number of votes for the opposition ticket in Montgomery County being 44, in Frederick County being 3, while in Washington County every vote was cast for the Federal candidates. A German farmer in Washington County, writing to a gentleman in Baltimore, Jan. 11, 1789, says, "We had pain when we heard of the people in your district that they were wrong, and we thought it right to call the friends of the new government to give in their votes at the court-house, so we made out so many as 1164 for the Federal ticket, and no man said against it. The last day you would wonder to see so much people together, two or three thousand, may be, and not one 'anti.' An ox roasted whole, hoof and horn, was divided into morsels, and every one would taste a bit. How foolish people are when so many are together and all good-natured! They were so happy to get a piece of Federal ox as ever superstitious Christians or anti-Christians were to get relics from Jerusalem."

When the Constitution of the United States went into operation, Maryland, as has been said, was divided into six districts for the election of representatives to Congress, and one member assigned to each, but all the members were voted for by general ticket throughout the State. At this election in 1789, when there was nothing particularly or locally interesting to Baltimore, she cast a comparatively small vote, which was divided almost equally between the two sets of candidates. From some unknown cause Baltimore afterwards became dissatisfied with five of the members then elected, and at the next election it was determined to leave them out. Accordingly a short time before the election of 1790 a caucus was held, and Philip Key, Joseph Sney, William Pinkney, Samuel Sterett, William Vans Murray, and Upton Sheridene were nominated as candidates. Upon the announcement of this ticket the counties became alarmed at the supposed assumption of power and influence on the part of Baltimore, and immediately called a convention of deputies in Baltimore, on the 23d of September, 1790, who were authorized to nominate candidates. On the day appointed the counties' deputies nominated as their candidates Michael Jenifer Stone, Benjamin Contee, George Gale, and Daniel Carroll, four of the old members, and James Tilghman, of James, and Samuel Sterett.\(^1\)

When the election came off Baltimore cast upwards of three thousand votes for her own ticket, while six votes was the highest number which any one of the county candidates received. In the counties the vote was very much divided between the two tickets, and as a consequence Baltimore elected her ticket by a large majority, and thereby took control of the politics of the State.\(^2\)

The counties now regarded the plan of electing members of Congress by general ticket as "destructive of their influence and interests," and at the next session of the Legislature, on the 19th of December, 1790, the law was changed, so that the elector only voted for a candidate in his own district, it being enacted "that every person entitled and offering to vote for representatives for this State in the Congress of the United States shall have a right to vote for one person being a resident of his district at the time of his election." This change of the law confined the direct influence of Baltimore to the election of its own ticket, as at present, and the counties were restored to their "proper station, dignity, and independence." The electors of President and Vice-President were still to be chosen by general ticket, but five of them were to be residents of the Western Shore and three of the Eastern Shore.

In 1815 considerable discussion arose in the larger counties and in the city of Baltimore over the fact that the minority of the people of the State were governing the majority. Under the constitution, as it then existed, the delegates were the representatives of the counties of the State and not of the people, thereby giving one man as much political weight in some of these counties as ten men in others. Annapolis had at this period from two hundred and thirty to two hundred and sixty voters, while Baltimore had from five to six thousand; but each under the existing constitution were equal.

At the election of 1815 seven counties and two cities, notwithstanding they had a majority of nearly nine thousand votes cast in the State, were only entitled under this system to thirty-two members, while twelve counties which were in the minority sent forty-eight members. This question was discussed with great animation during subsequent campaigns; and in 1816 the political writers declared the attack of the "Baltimore Jacobins" the "most daring upon the rights of the people that ever was conceived in a country professing to be free to increase representatives." The election in September of that year is described as the most bitter that ever transpired in Maryland. Not only had the Federal party to encounter the arts and zelous operations of the Democrats of the State, but the general government lent the aid of its influence in the election. The contest was opened early in the winter by transporting voters from places where they could be spared, where the Federal majority was usually not very large. This the Federalists soon discovered and counteracted. A number of United States soldiers were ordered from Baltimore to man the condemned works at Annapolis, but with the greater object in view to endeavor to vote through the expected acquiescence of the corporation officers. This scheme failed on account of the tardiness of their motions, as they did not reach the city more than six months before the election. Great quantities of money, and false and licentious papers, almost outraging shame itself, were poured forth everywhere by both parties. Truth and probability were set at defiance; the most virtuous private characters were aspersed and acriminated; nothing was left unessay'd, however nefarious, which might conduco to gain success for either party.\(^3\)

Such was the force of prejudice in Maryland that until 1826 no Israelite could hold any office, civic or military, in the State government. The subject was brought before the Legislature in 1818 and at each succeeding session until 1822, when a bill removing these disabilities was passed, mainly through the efforts of Thomas Kennedy, of Washington County, and R. B. Taney, of Frederick, but, in accordance with the constitution of the State, before it could become a law it was necessary that it should be confirmed by the Legislature of 1823. The measure was very unpopular with the people, and its passage created an extraordinary influence on their minds, so much so that in the election of members for the Legislature of 1823, out of forty members that voted in favor of the \(^{3}\) At the State election held in October, 1818, the soldiers stationed at Fort McHenry and the sailors and marines on board the United States vessel "Nonsuch" were mustered, furnished with ballots, marched to the polls and voted. The soldiers themselves said that their ballots were dealt out to them by a sergeant on parade, that they were then marched to the polls and ordered to vote the tickets with which they had been furnished.

of the legislative powers the counties of Kent and Calvert, with a population of nineteen thousand four hundred and one, were at this time allowed as many representatives in the senatorial electoral college and the House of Delegates as the counties of Frederick and Washington, with a population of seventy-one thousand and fifty-six, and Kent and Calvert each had double the number of delegates allowed to the city of Baltimore, with a population of eighty thousand six hundred and twenty-five. The executive department was the creature of the Legislature, being elected thereby, and most of the civil officers received their appointment from the executive, so that a minority of one-fourth of the people, having a right to elect a majority of the members of the Legislature, controlled all the departments of the government.

Since the adoption of the State constitution in 1776 the resources of the western counties had greatly developed, and their population had largely increased, so that the operation of the system as originally established was no longer just and equal. The lower counties, however, refused to recognize the changed conditions or to grant the reasonable and just rights of the people of the western section of the State. Arranging themselves behind the strict letter of the constitution, they disregarded the great principles upon which it was originally based, and its inadequacy to the wants of the people at this time. They forgot the great change the State had undergone in point of population, commerce, and trade in the course of sixty years, and that a constitution which was republican at an earlier date in our history in consequence of that change had grown antirepublican. The mode of electing the Senate was particularly objected to, and the small number of representatives allowed Baltimore City. As early as 1807 a strong effort had been made to change the system by electing one senator from each county by the people; and in the bill which passed the House for that purpose an attempt was made to engratn a provision regulating the number of delegates for each county in proportion to its population. The bill, however, was defeated in the Senate, and a similar one met with a like fate in the ensuing year.

Year after year repeated and earnest petitions were presented to the Legislature, asking, praying for redress of these gross grievances of which the majority of the people had long complained. These petitions and memorials were again and again rejected. The smaller counties, which had ruled for nearly half a century the majority of the people, declined to surrender the undue share of power they possessed. At length the representatives of both political parties in the larger counties and the city of Baltimore united and proposed that a convention of reformers, without distinction of party, should be held in Baltimore to agree upon such measures as would insure success.

On the 6th of June, 1836, the Reform Convention, composed of delegates from Cecil, Harford, Baltimore, Frederick, Montgomery, and Washington Counties and Baltimore City, assembled and adopted resolutions recommending the people of the State to elect at the next October election delegates pledged to introduce and support a bill providing for taking the sense of the people on the question of reforming the constitution of the State on the first Monday in May, 1837; and in the event of a majority of the people declaring themselves in favor of such reform, providing in the same bill for the calling of a convention for that object. It was further resolved that the members of the convention should be distributed equally among the several congressional districts with the exception of the Fourth, which being a double congressional district was to have twice the number of representatives of any other district. It was also agreed that if the Legislature should refuse to pass the desired bill the president of the convention should reconvene it for the adoption of such ulterior measures as might then be deemed expedient.

The people seemed disposed to fully sustain the recommendations of the convention, for the Assembly of 1835 had passed laws which tended to enlarge the representation of the more populous districts, and which only needed the confirmation of the ensuing Legislature to become a law. By this act two additional delegates were given to Baltimore City, and Carroll County was erected out of portions of Frederick and Baltimore Counties, thus giving four more representatives to this section of the State, and making the Reformers more urgent in their demands.

But these movements suddenly took a most unexpected turn. The Presidential election was approaching, and the opposition or Whig party, although they were unable to concentrate their forces upon a single candidate, had strong hopes of defeating the election of Mr. Van Buren by throwing the final choice into the hands of the Representatives. Party spirit was at its height in Maryland; a new State Senate was to be elected, and the combination of parties in the interest of reform was scarcely to be expected. The Senate of Maryland was composed of fifteen members, who were elected every five years, not immediately by the people, but by a college of electors, forty in number, who were elected by the people. Two of these electors were chosen from each of the nineteen counties, and one each from Baltimore and Annapolis.

On the 5th of September, 1836, the election came off, and resulted in the choice of twenty-one Whig and nineteen Van Buren electors.

On the third Monday of September, in accordance with the constitution of the State, they assembled at Annapolis to go into an election of senators. By the constitution of Maryland no Senate could be elected unless twenty-four electors were present in the college. On the day appointed the twenty-one Whig electors qualified by taking their official oath, but the nineteen Van Buren electors, availing themselves of this provision, which seems to have been designed for the protection of the counties on the Eastern Shore, acted in accordance with the following instructions, given by the Democrats of Frederick County to their electors:

"Whereas, The fifteenth section of the constitution declares that no Senate can be formed unless twenty-four electors agree to meet for the appointment of the members of which it is to consist:

Therefore resolved, That the senatorial electors of this county be instructed to require of the twenty-one Whig electors a pledge that no member of the former Senate and no member of the House of Delegates who opposed the bill calling a convention of the people shall be elected to the next Senate of the State; that at least eight of the members of the Senate to be chosen by the electoral college shall be selected from among persons known to entertain opinions and sentiments coinciding with the principles and opinions held by and governing a majority of the people (two hundred and five thousand nine hundred and twenty-two), who have elected nineteen Van Buren electors; and that in the formation of the Senate there shall be a majority of members known to be favorable to such a thorough and radical reform of the constitution of the State as will insure to all citizens living under it equal political rights and privileges.

Resolved, That unless the pledges required by the preceding resolution are solemnly given in true faith, the two electors from this county be requested to refuse to enter into an election of senator, provided that the electors from other counties and cities having a majority of the white population of the State therein will co-operate with them to defeat the election of a Senate hostile to a reform in the constitution to the extent required in the first resolution.

Resolved, That our friends in the counties and cities that have elected Van Buren Reform electors are earnestly invited and recommended to join us in these measures, as the only means by which we can avoid the fate of being compelled to submit for five years at least to the tyranny of a government wielded and controlled by a small and aristocratic minority of the people of the State."

The nineteen Van Buren electors met in caucus in Annapolis on the 19th of September, and determined, in accordance with the instructions they had received, that as they represented a majority of the voters in the State, it was right that they, although a minority in the electoral college, should have the nomination of eight members.

Contrary to the hopes and expectations of the Van Buren electors, the Whig electors declined to receive or reply to the propositions submitted to them. Finding that the Whig electors refused to hold any communication with them until they had qualified, according to the requirements of the constitution, the nineteen Van Buren electors, on the 21st of September, abandoned Annapolis and retired to their homes. Before doing so, however, they issued an address "to the people of Maryland," in which they announced their determination not to take part in the election of the Senate, setting forth the reasons for their course, to which the Whig electors immediately published a reply. This sudden and hostile demonstration excited serious alarm throughout the State, and it was feared that a most painful and perilous crisis was at hand; public meetings were held in many places; at Baltimore an immense meeting of citizens expressed their indignation in forcible language at the "Reform or Revolution" in Maryland. Similar meetings were held in Washington, Frederick, and Allegany Counties, at which all party distinctions were ignored, and all pledged themselves to sustain the supremacy of the law; and on the 18th of October (1836) the grand jury of Allegany presented the nineteen recusant electors "as unfaithful public agents and disturbers of the public peace."

In the meanwhile the Whig electors continued at Annapolis, patiently waiting until a sufficient number of the recusants should qualify to enable them to proceed to business. The Presidential election took place on the 7th of November, and on the following day Governor Thomas W. Veazey issued his proclamation, denouncing in severe terms the conduct of the "recusant electors and their abettors," calling on the people, civil and military, to hold themselves in readiness to maintain the law, and convening the old Senate and House of Delegates to assemble on the 21st of November. On the 12th of November, Wesley Lithium, a Van Buren elector from Anne Arundel County, addressed a note to his associates, informing them that, in accordance with "the will of the people," he had determined to repair to Annapolis, and on the 19th qualify as an elector of the Senate. John S. Sellman, the colleague of Mr. Lithium, had entered the college and qualified early in October.

In the mean time the people of Maryland, in the election for delegates and for the President, had expressed at the ballot-box their opinion of the conduct of the Van Buren electors. The contest was conducted with much spirit, and the result may be considered as a fair criterion of the strength of parties in those counties where they were arrayed in opposition. In Worcester and Frederick the Van Bureanites had no ticket in the field. In the latter county the Van Buren delegate ticket was withdrawn, on the ground that, as it had been determined to hold a convention in Annapolis on the third Monday of November, 1836, to make provisional arrangements for the "continuance of the government until the old constitution is amended or a new government instituted, it was not necessary to elect delegates to the Assembly." The election resulted in the choice of sixty Whig and nineteen Van Buren members of the House of Delegates.

The result of this election changed the aspect of affairs very considerably. The recusant electors found that their action had not been sustained by the approval of the people, and a number of them determined to obey the popular will, and the electoral college, reinforced by the electors from Anne Arundel, Queen Anne's, and Caroline, proceeded on the 19th of November to the election of fifteen senators.

The Reform convention held another session in Baltimore on the 16th of November, and adjourned to meet in Annapolis on the first Monday of January, 1837. This meeting never took place, for the Assembly convened a few days afterwards and immediately entered upon the work of reform. They first confirmed the law, passed at the last session of the Assembly, to increase the delegation from Baltimore from two to four members; and in March, 1837, coerced by the state of public feeling produced and manifested by the course of the nineteen electors, the Legislature passed a law making many of the desired changes in the constitution. The people were given the power of electing the Governor; the Senate was entirely reorganized, one member being assigned to each county and the city of Baltimore, to be elected immediately by the people. The constitution of the House of Delegates was materially altered, five members being assigned to Baltimore City, Frederick, and Baltimore Counties each, four to Montgomery, Carroll, and Washington each, and three to Allegany; and it was provided that after 1840 every county having a population of over thirty-five thousand souls should have six delegates, and Baltimore City as many delegates as the most populous county. The first Democratic State Convention under the reformed constitution was held in Baltimore on the 31st of May, 1838, and resulted in the nomination of William Grason, whose opponent was John L. Steele. At the ensuing election Mr. Grason was elected Governor.

At an early period in the history of the country the dangerous policy of unlimited internal improvement by the Federal government—"to set apart and pledge certain funds for constructing roads and canals and improving the navigation of water-courses, in order to facilitate, promote, and give security to internal commerce among the several States, and to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions of the common defense”—had attracted public attention, and had received its temporary quietus at the hands of President Jackson in 1832 by his veto of the Maysville road bill. Unfortunately for Maryland, this opinion, which had been confirmed by the general approval of the country, was not shared by the State government. It refused to abandon altogether an extravagant system of roads and canals that could not be perfected at that period, when the population of the country was comparatively so small and scattered over such an immense area of territory. Measures were taken to place Maryland in the van of those States ambitions of rivaling Great Britain, Holland, and other countries, where the population was crowded and dense, and where vast numbers justified large expenditures to facilitate intercourse. In the short space of seven years succeeding the veto of President Jackson the debt of Maryland was augmented more than twelve millions of dollars. Within the same period other roads and canals were projected, until the little State of Maryland, having ten thousand square miles of territory and 318,194 white inhabitants, was staggering under a load of debt under which any less determined people would have sunk in financial ruin.

We were at one and the same time projecting or constructing a railroad from Baltimore to Washington, another from Baltimore to New York, another on the Eastern Shore, another from Baltimore to the Ohio, and a magnificent canal from tide-water on the Potomac to the Ohio River. If the people of the State had foreseen the distresses which these works were destined to bring upon them, or had then understood, as they did afterwards, the financial measures devised to insure the punctual payment of interest, few persons would have been hardy enough to invest their capital in these securities. Our citizens had not the remotest idea that taxes were ever to be the result of these debts, nor was any allusion to that contingency ever permitted. On the contrary, the vast revenues to be derived from these works to enrich the State was the sole theme of newspaper discussion, stump oratory, and the plausible estimates of contractors and jobbers,—a vast army eager to obtain the money that the people were urged to vote.

Such was the indignation of many, when first awakened to a true conception of the whole subject, that a strong disposition existed to deny all obligations to pay the debt on account of the alleged absence of constitutional power in the Legislature to contract it. To overcome the pecuniary embarrassments which threatened to overwhelm her creditors, Maryland, in 1837, when there was a general bank suspension and no currency but depreciated bankpaper, stepped forward and displayed to her sister States a noble example by passing a law ordering that the State creditors should be paid in gold or silver, or its equivalent, and this law was made retrospective. Unfortunately, this could not be long maintained, for the embarrassments into which the State was drawn by her system of internal improvements, exaggerated by the deceptive manner in which the affairs of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal were managed, resulted in such a deficit in revenue that when the foreign markets were no longer open to the sale of stock the payment of interest on the State debts became impossible, and as no system of taxation had previously existed in Maryland, difficulties in levying and collecting a tax were encountered, and in January, 1842, the State failed to pay its interest. The revenue of the State would meet only its current expenditure, and it became necessary to raise the whole interest, of over $600,000 per annum, by taxation. Although it had thus become evident, at the close of 1840, that taxes were inevitable, the Legislature, at the session of 1841, was disposed to dodge the question by false estimates and chimerical paper speculations, but was finally compelled to take effective measures, and on the 23d of March, 1841, passed a law which, with a supplement enacted in the following December, imposed a tax for the first year of twenty cents, and for the next three years of twenty-five cents on the one hundred dollars of assessed value of real and personal property. This was expected to yield $456,000 per annum, and, together with other laws passed, it was hoped the State would realize $200,000 more. All these estimates proved fallacious, mostly from causes incident upon the commencement of a system of taxation. It was contested by the ship-owners, banks, and others, who required time. When it is recollected that before the act of March, 1841, the largest amount of direct taxation ever levied upon the people of Maryland in any one year was $600,818, and that even that imposition was continued but for a few years, it is not surprising that grave doubts of the ability of the State to raise in this way more than $600,000 were entertained, and this apprehension operated very injuriously by leading people to resist what they supposed would ultimately not be enforced. Under the impression that no serious attempt would be made to pay the State interest, the several companies also that had received aid from the State held back in their payments, showing an evident disposition to cast off the obligation to the public credi-tions by throwing the odium of repudiation upon the commonwealth at large. When the direct tax was levied the value of the assessed property in Maryland was estimated at $300,000,000. If this estimate had been correct, the rate of tax then imposed would have been sufficient. When, however, the actual value of the property was ascertained to be $190,723,788, subsequently reduced to $177,139,645 by the action of the appeal tax courts, there was no alternative for those who intended to pay the interest on the public debt by taxation except to increase the rate of the levy from twenty to thirty cents on the one hundred dollars, but instead of doing this the Legislature undertook to rely upon other doubtful sources of revenue. Another fatal error was in the failure to enforce the laws against the first delinquents, the result of which was that in seven counties the tax laws were not enforced, and as a consequence, in January, 1842, the State suspended the payment of interest on its debts.

Various expedients were tried by the people to meet the progressive increase of interest, which had grown from $859,656 on the 1st of December, 1842, to $1,171,872 on the 1st of December, 1843, and to $1,450,961 on the 1st of December, 1844.

Among the many laws enacted for raising a rev enue the act of 1844, ch. 250, imposing the "stamp tax," was the most objectionable. This law, which was popularly known as the "British Stamp Act," required stamps to be used "for every skin or piece of vellum, or parchment, or sheet, or piece of paper, or other material upon which shall be printed or written any or either of the instruments of writing following, to wit: On any bond, obligation, single bill, or promissory note or notes, made or executed in this State, above one hundred dollars, and not made or issued by any incorporated bank of this State, and on any foreign or inland bill of exchange, or other evidence of debt, above one hundred dollars, whether indorsed or otherwise, and whether made or issued by any incorporated institution, individual, or firm." This act went into operation on the 10th of May, 1845, and from its passage it was denounced in all sections of the State in unmeasured terms, through the public press, from the hustings, and in every other shape which the ingenuity of its opponents could devise. In several sections of the State resistance to the law was strenuously urged, and insisted upon as a rightful measure. In Carroll, Washington, Harford, and other counties many of the citizens formed anti-tax associations, and declared their inability to meet the demands made upon them by the State.

Finally a number of the prominent citizens of Somerset County, irrespective of party, signed a notice calling "a united convention of tax-payers, farmers, mechanics, and workingmen" at the court-house in Princess Anne on the second Tuesday in June, 1845. The object of the convention was stated to be "to confer and consult upon measures of policy and practice deeply interesting in the present depressed condition of the country;" and all were invited to attend who were "disposed to unite in endeavoring to deive means to avoid ruinous taxation and provide for the reduction of the public debt,—in fine, to arrest the downward course of the great interests of the people, and to save the State from desolation and disgrace."

On the 9th of June the convention met and adopted a memorial asking the Legislature to pass an act providing for the election of delegates to a State Convention to form a new constitution. They also appointed delegates to an informal State Convention which had been proposed, at a meeting of the citizens of Harford County, to be held in Baltimore on the first Wednesday of August following. In response to the call of these counties, the other counties of the State appointed delegates to the "Reform Convention," which assembled in Baltimore on the 27th of August, 1845. It was composed of some of the ablest men of the State of both political parties, and organized by the selection of Col. Anthony Kinnell, of Fredrick County, president, and various vice-presidents, among whom was Dr. E. L. Boteler, of Washington County. The convention adopted resolutions recommending the organization of reform associations throughout the State, and calling upon the people to vote for no candidate for either branch of the Legislature who would not pledge himself to vote for the call of a convention, the abolition of all useless offices, and the retrenchment of all unnecessary expenses.
These efforts produced a good moral effect, and, with the improvement in business generally, as the country emerged from the disastrous effects of the great collapse of the credit system which attended the final explosion of the corrupt United States Bank, the taxes were more readily paid, and the machinery for collecting them worked more smoothly. The actual produce of the taxes gradually approximated to the estimates, and the reduction in the State expenses by the curtailment of many outlays enabled a large amount to be appropriated to the payment of interest.
At length it became evident that the finances had by able management been worked up to a position which would permit of resumption, and at the session of 1847 the Legislature, in compliance with the earnest recommendations of Governor Thomas G. Pratt, passed a law directing the State treasurer to resume payment of the current interest on the public debt on the 1st of January, 1848. This law also authorized and directed the commissioner of loans, after Oct. 1, 1847, to issue six per cent. bonds, the interest payable annually, to the holders of coupons or certificates of interest. The interest on the main debt to be first paid; and if then, after defraying the ordinary expenses of the State, there should not remain in the treasury funds adequate to pay the full amount of six per cent. interest on the bonds, then what was remaining should be appropriated pro rata among said bonds, and certificates given for the balance due. All taxes and State dues were to be paid in current money. The law was carried into effect, and resumption took place January, 1848. The amount of arrears funded under its provisions was $554,003.43 in six per cent. stock, redeemable at the pleasure of the State.

Upon the assembling of the Legislature the committee appointed by the "Reform Convention" held in the city of Baltimore in August, 1845, laid before that body the memorial suggesting "alterations in the existing, or the call of a convention for the adoption of a new, constitution." The Legislature declined to accede to this recommendation, but passed a law submitting to the people the question of biennial sessions of the General Assembly, and it was ratified by the popular vote on the 7th of October, 1846. Upon the assembling of the Legislature, on the 3d of January, 1848, Governor Philip Francis Thomas laid before that body a message of great force and power, principally upon the question of constitutional reform and retrenchment, and in a lengthy argument favored the call of a convention for the purpose of revising the constitution. This act of justice was again, however, denied the people. For more than thirty years a large majority of the people of Maryland had been ineffectually importuning the Legislature to give them the opportunity to revise the constitution. Bills directing the call of a convention for that purpose had been repeatedly passed by the Lower House, and as often rejected by the Senate. Within the last four years a "Reform party" had been organized, the members of which bound themselves not to vote for any candidate for the Legislature who would not pledge himself to support the call for a convention. This party, notwithstanding the opposition of the smaller counties on the Eastern Shore, had now acquired power and influence, and assembled in convention in Baltimore on July 23, 1849, to make public declaration of their objects, which was done in a set of strong resolutions. At the fall election of 1849 in a number of the counties the Whigs and Democrats united in running "Reform" tickets for members of the Legislature, without reference to political distinctions, and in others and in Baltimore City the candidates of both parties were pledged to constitutional reform. The efforts for reform were successful, and a new constitution was framed and went into effect on the 4th of July, 1851. By the new constitution the State was divided into three gubernatorial districts, from each of which, in regular rotation, the Governor was to be selected. St. Mary's, Charles, Calvert, Prince George's, Anne Arundel, Montgomery, and Howard Counties, with the city of Baltimore, were to form the first; the eight counties of the Eastern Shore the second; and Baltimore, Harford, Frederick, Washington, Allegany, and Carroll to form the third.

Every county in the State and the city of Baltimore to be entitled to elect one senator. In the House of Delegates Allegany was assigned four representatives; Carroll, three; Frederick, six; Montgomery, two; Washington, five. The greatest change was in Baltimore City, which gained five delegates, while the counties collectively lost seventeen. The State was to be divided into four judicial districts,—Allegany, Washington, Frederick, Carroll, Baltimore, and Harford Counties to compose the first; Montgomery, Howard, Anne Arundel, Calvert, St. Mary's, Charles, and Prince George's, the second; Baltimore City, the third; and Cecil, Kent, Queen Anne's, Talbot, Caroline, Dorchester, Somerset, and Worcester, the fourth. The State was further divided into eight judicial circuits, of which Montgomery belonged to the second, Frederick and Carroll formed the third, and Washington and Allegany the fourth. In the election for members of the House of Delegates, held in the fall of 1851, under the provisions of the new constitution, the Democrats succeeded in electing forty-three members, and the Whigs thirty. The Senate stood eleven Democrats and ten Whigs, with one vacancy, caused by a tie vote in Washington County, which gave the Democrats political control of the State. In the Presidential election of 1852 the Democrats again carried the State. In Baltimore the Whigs were defeated by a majority of 4474 out of 23,016 votes polled, and in the State the Democratic electors, R. M. McLane, C. Humphries, J. Parren, R. H. Alvey, Carroll Spencer, C. J. M. Gwynn, J. A. Wickes, and E. K. Wilson, were elected by a majority of 5077.
the help of the "American party," which was now assuming shape, placed in the field Richard J. Bowie, of Montgomery, as their candidate for Governor, to whom the Democrats opposed T. Watkins Ligon, of Howard County. The result was the election of Mr. Ligon, but with a Whig majority in both branches of the Legislature, the Lower House standing thirty-nine Whigs to thirty-five Democrats, and the Senate fourteen to eight. The American or Know-Nothing party, in the fall of 1854, determined to place in nomination in Baltimore City a straight-out mayorality ticket, and selected Samuel Hinks as their candidate, who was opposed by William G. Thomas, the Democratic nominee. The election resulted in the triumph of the American party, and in the State election of 1855 the American ticket was successful by a majority of 2699. The American party elected four out of the six congressmen, and eight of the eleven State senators chosen. The House of Delegates, which contained seventy-four members, was divided politically as follows: Americans, fifty-four; Union, ten; Democrats, nine; Whig, one. Strengthened by their majority in the Legislature, the American party soon obtained full and supreme control in Baltimore, where they inaugurated a reign of terror and lawlessness which all the efforts of its respectable citizens were for several years unable to overthrow. The Legislature, with its Know-Nothing majority, was deaf to all the appeals of the citizens of Baltimore for protection from the organized ruffianism which had taken possession of the city government, and treated the suggestions and recommendations of the Democratic executive with indifference and contempt. In the November election of 1857, by the help of the "Plug-Uglies," "Blood-Tubs," and other Know-Nothing organizations in Baltimore, they elected their candidate, Thomas Holiday Hicks, Governor by a majority of 8400 over John C. Groome, the Democratic candidate. They also secured forty-three members in the House of Delegates to thirty-one elected by the Democrats, and fifteen members of the Senate to seven Democrats. They, moreover, elected all the other State officers, thus obtaining complete political control of the State. The supremacy of the American party continued until 1860, when the General Assembly at length gave ear to the appeals of the people of Baltimore, and by the passage of the reform bills enabled them to restore their city to the position of a law-abiding, self-governed community.

Early in July, 1859, Capt. John Brown, or "Ossawatomie Brown," of Kansas notoriety, appeared in the neighborhood of Harper's Ferry, under the assumed name of Isaac Smith, attended by two of his sons and a son-in-law. He pretended to be a farmer from New York who desired to rent or purchase land in that vicinity with a view to farming and mining. Soon afterwards he rented a small farm from Dr. Kennedy on the Maryland side of the Potomac, about four or five miles from Harper's Ferry, in Washington County, and began farming operations in a small way. He lived in an obscure manner and attracted but little attention. Two or three of his friends were posted at Chambersburg, Pa., who received and forwarded to him arms of different kinds.

A man named Cook, whom Brown had sent to Harper's Ferry about a year previous to await his orders, now joined him, and on Sunday night, the 16th of October, 1859, between eleven and twelve o'clock, Brown and his party, some eighteen in number, crossed the bridge connecting the village of Harper's Ferry with the Maryland shore, and on reaching the Virginia side proceeded to take possession of the armory and arsenal of the United States. Each member of the party was armed with a Sharp's rifle carbine and with revolvers. The inhabitants of the village being asleep, the presence of Brown's party was not known until they demanded admittance at the arsenal gate, which was locked. The watchman refusing to admit them, they burst open the gate, made him prisoner, and established themselves in a strong brick building used as an engine-house. They brought with them a wagon containing arms and prepared torches. During the course of the night and the following morning they arrested many of the citizens of Harper's Ferry and the vicinity, and detained them in the engine-house as hostages.

The intelligence of the invasion of Harper's Ferry at first seemed so improbable that little credit was given it, but the news was soon confirmed, and created the most intense excitement. The Frederick military telegraphed to the President, proffering their services, which were immediately accepted. Other military organizations from Baltimore also started promptly for Harper's Ferry, and were joined on the way by a detachment of marines and Col. Robert E. Lee. In the mean time a number of Virginia volunteer companies, and three from Frederick under Col. Shriner, had arrived at Harper's Ferry and forced the insurgents to withdraw within the armory inclosure. The next morning Brown was summoned to surrender, and refusing to do so, the doors of the engine-house were battered down by the marines and the party captured or killed. After the citizens arrested and held prisoners by Brown were liberated, Lieut.-Col. S. S. Mills, of the Fifty-third Maryland Regiment, with the Bal-
The execution of Brown and his associates increased the political feeling in the North of which it was one of the manifestations, and the utterances and actions of the popular leaders on both sides only served to increase sectional hate and bitterness. The history of the political events immediately preceding the great civil conflict, as well as the narrative of Western Maryland's share in that tremendous struggle, are recited elsewhere, and it is not necessary to rehearse them in this connection. As a matter of interest in the military history of Western Maryland, it is not inappropriate to refer once more in passing to the readiness and enthusiasm with which the great majority of her people responded to the appeals for the support of the Union. On the 4th of August, 1862, the President ordered a draft of three hundred thousand militia for nine months, unless sooner discharged, and directed that if any State should not by the 15th furnish its quota of the additional three hundred thousand authorized by the act of Congress of July 17, 1862, the deficiency of volunteers in that State would be made up by special draft from the militia. On the 13th of August the enrolling officers of the State began to enroll the militia, under the direction of Hon. John A. J. Creswell, assistant adjutant-general of Maryland. In Baltimore City the work of enrolling was completed by Messrs. John B. Seidenstricker, Frederick Fickey, Jr., and Henry Stockbridge, the commissioners, on the 22d of August. The aggregate quota assigned to Allegany County was 872 men, but when this enrollment commenced, under the call of President Lincoln, it was found that this patriotic little county, with a population of only 27,895, had already furnished 1463 volunteers, or 591 in excess of its quota. The quota of Washington County was 943, but no draft was needed within its borders, for it had already given 1048 soldiers to the Union armies. Thirteen hundred and fifty-four men was Frederick's proportion, of which 1019 had been raised and sent to the field in volunteer organizations before the call of August, 1862, was made; while Carroll, out of a total quota of 742, had voluntarily and eagerly contributed 499 without the necessity of any other spur or stimulus than that of earnest patriotism.
Montgomery was the only county of Western Maryland in which enthusiasm for the Union cause was lacking at the beginning of the contest, and here the absence of this sentiment was so marked that out of a quota of 486 only seven volunteers had been furnished up to the date of this enrollment.

As the war proceeded and the power of the Republican party increased, it was more and more emboldened to adopt many anti-slavery measures on the plea of military necessity. On the 6th of August, 1861, a bill was approved declaring free all slaves used by the Confederates in aid of military purposes. On the 13th of March, 1862, the President also approved a bill disarming from the service officers guilty of surrendering fugitive slaves. On the 16th of April, 1862, he approved a bill abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia. On the 10th of June, 1862, slavery was prohibited in the Territories, and on the 17th of July, 1862, Congress authorized the enlistment of negro soldiers. Upon the first Confederate invasion, in September, 1862, "I made a solemn vow before God," said Lincoln, "that if Gen. Lee was driven back from Maryland, I would crown the result by a declaration of freedom to the slaves." Accordingly, three days after the retreat of Lee across the Potomac, on the 22d of September, 1862, he issued his emancipation proclamation, declaring that on the 1st day of January, 1863, "all persons held as slaves within any State, or designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward, and forever free," and on the 1st of January, 1863, issued another proclamation in which he designated the States and parts of States in which emancipation was to take effect.

In the mean time anti-slavery sentiments were making rapid strides in Maryland, and entered largely into the politics of the times. As early as May 28, 1862, the Union Convention of Baltimore unanimously adopted a series of strong resolutions recommending a new Constitutional Convention and approving a system of gradual emancipation. The subject continued to be discussed from time to time by the press and people until the year 1863, when the ultra Union party, aided by the administration, determined to make emancipation the paramount and leading issue in the fall canvas. They demanded peremptory emancipation, without regard to constitutional rights and laws of the State, or even the reasonable convenience of those who were slaveholders, and who had been from the beginning of the war as strong in support of the government as the emancipationists. As the campaign opened the deepest interest was felt by the country in the result of Maryland's choice. The election was for comptroller of the treasury, commissioner of the land-office, members of Congress, members of the General Assembly, judges of the courts, clerks of courts, sheriffs, and minor officers. In Baltimore there were four tickets in the field: the Independent Union, Regular Union, Conditional Union, and Unconditional Union. The Independent Union, Regular Union, and Unconditional Union had the same State officers, with some differences in the candidates for local offices. The candidates for Congress on the Unconditional tickets were: First District, John A. J. Creswell; Second District, Edwin H. Webster; Third District, Henry Winter Davis; Fourth District, ex-Governor Frank Thomas; and Fifth District, John C. Holland. The candidates on the Conditional Union were: First District, John W. Crisfield; Fifth District, Charles B. Calvert and Benjamin G. Harris. The five Unconditional Union candidates were all pledged to vote for the administration candidate for Speaker. In the election for State officers the question of emancipation or slavery was to be tested. Those who were for the speedy abolition of slavery in the State voted for Henry H. Goldsborough for comptroller of the treasury; and those who wished to retain slavery in the State, and who were opposed to the calling of a convention for its abolition, voted for Samuel S. Maffit for that office. In Baltimore the entire regular Unconditional Union ticket was elected, and in the State the same State ticket was elected, with the nominees of the same ticket from the First, Second, Third, and Fourth Districts for Congress. In the Fifth District, where there were two Union candidates running, Benjamin G. Harris, the Constitutional Union candidate, was elected. In Baltimore City Goldsborough received 10,942 votes, and Maffit 368. In the State the former received 33,901, and the latter 12,951, making a total vote of 46,852, and a majority of 20,950 votes for Goldsborough. The Legislature was largely in favor of the abolition of slavery and the calling of a convention to alter the constitution of the State.

Under the anti-slavery agitation slave property became almost valueless. This was strikingly illustrated in July, 1863, when Col. William Birney, of the bureau for the organization of colored troops, liberated all the slaves in Campbell's slave-prison, on Pratt near Howard Street, Baltimore. The course pursued by Col. Birney in enlisting negroes excited universal comment, and considerable correspondence grew out of it. Among those who participated in the discussion were Governor Bradford and ex-Governor Francis Thomas. Judge Hugh L. Bond, who became one of the most strenuous advocates of unconditional emancipation in the State, addressed a long and urgent letter to the Secretary of War, Mr. Stanton, which attracted a great deal of attention at the North, and was widely copied by the journals of that section of the country. He pointed out that in Maryland the free negroes were nearly equal in numbers to the slave population, their aggregates being in 1860 eighty thousand of the former to eighty-seven thousand of the latter. If enlistments were to be confined to the former class, he observed, Baltimore and the adjoining free counties of the northern and western section of the State would suffer materially in being deprived of the laboring force necessary for their welfare. The enlistment of free negroes only, he argued, tended to appreciate the value of slave property and to put money in the pockets of the planters of the lower counties, a majority of whose inhabitants, he declared, were at heart disloyal. He therefore recommended that a proclamation should be issued stating explicitly that the acts of Congress before referred to authorized the enlistment of all classes of persons of African descent, and inviting free negroes and slaves alike to join the army.

In the meanwhile, however, the abolition and recruiting of slaves was kept up in Maryland by the various colored companies in the State. It was practiced to a very large extent on the Eastern Shore, and in the southern counties of the Western. In the fall of 1863 a circular was issued from the War Department for the organization of colored troops, and the establishment of recruiting stations for negro troops in Maryland, among which were Monocacy and Hagerstown. All claims for enlisted slaves were laid before a board appointed by President Lincoln, consisting of Hugh L. Bond, Thomas Timmons, and L. E. Straugh. No claim was entertained from any person who was or had been in arms against the government, or who in any way had given aid or comfort to the Confederates, and all claimants were to file with their claims an oath of allegiance to the government of the United States.

The General Assembly convened at Annapolis on Jan. 6, 1864, and one of its first acts was the introduction of a bill calling a State Convention with a view to the abolition of slavery. This bill passed both houses on the 28th of January, and became a law on the 3d of February. The vote in the Senate was, ayes 13, nays 2; and in the House, ayes 45, nays 17. By this act the people of Maryland were called upon to vote on the first Wednesday in April "for" or "against" holding a State Convention to frame a new constitution, and on the same day they were to vote for delegates to the convention. The election took place on the 6th of April, and resulted in the calling of a State Constitutional Convention. The Governor stated that the whole vote cast was 51,117, of which 31,593 were for, and 19,524 against a convention. He thereupon called the convention by proclamation to meet at Annapolis on Wednesday, the 27th of April. The vote in Washington County was 3298 for the convention and 651 against; in Montgomery it was 516 for and 746 against; in Frederick it was 3231 for and 1957 against; in Allegany it was 2307 for and 1135 against; and in Carroll it was 1898 for and 1635 against. The Constitutional Convention assembled at Annapolis on the 27th of April, 1864, and after a session of over four months it adopted a new constitution and form of government, and adjourned on the 6th of September. The most important changes made by the new constitution in the organic law of the State were the articles abolishing slavery and declaring "paramount allegiance" to be due to the Constitution and government of the United States. The new constitution was submitted to the people for their ratification in Baltimore City on the 12th of October, and in the several counties of the State on the 12th and 13th. The total vote in Baltimore on the adoption of the constitution was 11,832, of which 9779 was for and 2053 against. In Allegany County the vote was 1833 for and 964 against; in Carroll, 1587 for and 1690 against; in Frederick, 2308 for and 1916 against; in Montgomery, 422 for and 1367 against; and in Washington, 2441 for and 955 against. The result was a majority in the State of 1995 against the new constitution. To counteract this result provision had been made for taking the soldiers' vote at their camps outside of the State. The soldiers voted as the Prussian army prays, at the word of command, and the final result was: citizens' vote for, 27,541 against, 29,536; soldiers' vote out of the State 2633 for and 263 against; total, 30,174 for, 29,799 against; declared majority in favor of the constitution, 375. As soon as it was known that the constitution was defeated in the State, Thomas S. Alexander, of the Baltimore bar, on the 24th of October, on behalf of Samuel G. Miles, a slave-owner, applied to the Superior Court of that city for a writ of mandamus to compel Governor Bradford to reject the soldiers' vote on the ground of illegality. The application was refused pro forma by Judge Martin, and an appeal was taken the same day to the Court of Appeals, which affirmed the decision on the 29th, Judge Bartol dissenting. Governor Bradford on the same day issued a proclamation declaring that the constitution and form of government had been adopted by a majority of the voters of the State, and in pursuance of the provisions therein contained the same will go into effect as the proper constitution and form of government of this State, superseding the one now existing, on the 1st day of November next."

The constitution of 1864 virtually disfranchised nearly two-thirds of the citizens of the State. When the military regime came to an end and civil authority was once more fully established, a bitter struggle for political supremacy at once commenced.

The Legislature, which was largely Republican, passed "an act relating to the registration of the voters of the State," which was the first general and permanent registration law in Maryland. By this act the Governor was to appoint from the citizens most known for loyalty, firmness, and uprightness three persons for each ward in the city of Baltimore, and for each election district in the several counties of the State, who were to be styled officers of registration. They were to "register all free white male persons claiming and entitled to the elective franchise resident in or temporarily absent from the several wards of the city of Baltimore, and the several election districts of the counties." Three persons were also appointed to register the soldiers and sailors of the State in the service of the United States, stationed at convenient and accessible points, who were absent from their regular places of voting on account of the nature of their service, and qualified voters at the various camps, hospitals, etc.

To all persons registered they were to administer the oath of allegiance prescribed by the constitution of 1864, and also a further oath that they would answer truly all questions propounded touching their right to vote. They were empowered to exclude from the lists the name of any person who had done any of the acts enumerated in the third, fourth, and fifth sections of the constitution, notwithstanding the applicant had taken the oath of allegiance prescribed in section four of the first article. In pursuance of this law, the Governor appointed registers, who held a convention in Baltimore on the 2d of August, 1865, and adopted regulations for the guidance and government of registers throughout the State. A series of questions were formulated, to be propounded to the applicant for registration, which effectually excluded from the privileges of the elective franchise not only those who had shown but even those who had felt the slightest sympathy for the Southern cause. The registration, when completed, showed that in Baltimore, out of a voting population of forty thousand, only ten thousand persons were considered qualified to take part in the political government of the city. The total number of persons registered throughout the State was only about thirty-five thousand in a voting population of ninety-five thousand.

The first election under the registration law took place on the 7th of November, 1865, when the people of Baltimore were called upon to vote for a member of Congress, State senator, two members of the House of Delegates, sheriff, clerk of the Circuit Court, and city surveyor. In the counties elections were also held for county officers and judges of the Circuit Courts.

Early in January, 1866, at the instance of a number of gentlemen from the counties, a meeting was formally called and held in Baltimore for the purpose of ascertaining whether the people of the city were willing to co-operate in calling a State Convention of those who were opposed to the registration law. At this meeting resolutions were adopted calling upon the people of the different counties of the State and of Baltimore who were opposed to the registration law to hold primary meetings, and through them to appoint delegates to meet in convention in Baltimore on the 24th of January, 1866.

The convention met at Temperance Temple, Baltimore, on the day appointed. Allegany County was represented by Richard D. Johnson, James M. Schley, Dr. Robert T. McKaig, John S. Daily, J. Philip Roman, and Peter Baker; Carroll by Dr. Henry Betz, J. M. Parke, Jacob Ponder, Sterling Galt, T. W. Mauro, L. P. Stilngliff, John Frizzle, Henry Motter, Michael Murdock, Dr. Butler, James Blizzard, John B. Boyle, and E. M. Shipley; Frederick by Col. J. M. Kunckel, John Bartholow, Hon. Anthony Kimmell, Frederick J. Nelson, Harry W. Dorsey, Valentine Ebbarts, Upton Worthington, Hugh McAleer,

Hon. Montgomery Blair, of Montgomery County, was chosen president, with Col. James Wallace, of Dorchester County, Hon. John Wethered, of Baltimore County, George M. Gill, of Baltimore City, J. Oden Bowie, of Prince George's, and George Schley, of Washington County, as vice-presidents; and Milton Y. Kidd, of Cecil County, William H. Neilson, of Baltimore City, and Thomas E. Williams, of Prince George's County, as secretaries. The convention adopted an address "to the people of Maryland," in which were set forth the grievances which had called the body together, and appealed to the Legislature to correct the evils complained of. After a two days' session, before adjourning, committees were appointed to proceed to Annapolis and present the resolutions of the Convention to the General Assembly then in session, and to procure signatures throughout the State to a memorial praying a repeal or modification of the constitution. The committee appointed to appear before the Legislature were accorded a respectful hearing, and in due time petitions signed by over twenty thousand citizens were presented to the General Assembly, but that body, on the 8th of February, 1866, resolved "that neither the temper or conduct of the people of this State who have been hostile to the government, nor the condition of our national affairs, nor the provisions of the constitution of the State warrant any interference with the registry law, and that it ought to be vigorously enforced."

On the 6th of June the ultra wing of the Unconditional Union party in Maryland assembled in convention in Baltimore, and adopted a platform declaring that "the registered loyal voters of Maryland will listen to no proposition to repeal or modify the registry law," and cordially indorsing the reconstruction policy of Congress. This convention again met in Baltimore on the 15th of August, and after adopting similar resolutions, and appointing delegates to the Southern Loyalists' Convention, to be held at Independence Hall, Philadelphia, on the 3d of September, nominated Col. Robert Bruce, of Allegany County, as their candidate for State comptroller.

The Conservative wing of the Unconditional Union party in Maryland assembled in convention in Baltimore on the 25th of July, 1866, and nominated for comptroller Col. William J. Leonard, of Worcester County. After the adoption of a long series of resolutions and the appointment of delegates to the Philadelphia National Convention, it adjourned. In the meanwhile a new set of officers of registration were appointed, who gave a more liberal construction to the law than their predecessors.

On the 10th of October following the municipal election was held, and resulted in the success of John L. Chapman, the ultra Republican candidate. The total number of votes cast was 7993, of which 5392 were given to Chapman, and 2601 to Daniel Harvey, the Conservative candidate. As the act of 1862, ch. 131, provided that for official misconduct any of the police commissioners might be removed by a concurrent vote of the two houses of the General Assembly, or by the Governor during the recess thereof, those who felt aggrieved at the result of the recent election determined to make an effort to have the police commissioners removed for their alleged partisan conduct.

A meeting of citizens was accordingly held on the 16th of October, when committees were appointed "to gather information touching the official misconduct of the police commissioners and appointees," and to prepare memorial lists to the Governor asking for their removal, and that the election should be set aside.

In a few days a memorial signed by over four thousand citizens was presented to Governor Swann, accompanied by numerous affidavits, praying for the removal of the commissioners. In their petition the memorialists represented that the commissioners, "disregarding alike the appeals of their fellow-citizens and their own explicit oaths, appointed the two hundred and forty judges almost without exception from the political party of which they themselves are members."

They moreover charged that "the Board of Police, in violation of law and the liberty of the citizens, gave orders to the police justices not to hear any case, or take bail, or in manner release any person arrested or committed on the day of election, but in all cases to keep them confined until after six o'clock in the evening of that day."

On the 18th of October, Governor Swann notified Messrs. Nicholas L. Wood and Samuel Hindes, the police commissioners, that he would take up their case on the 22d, at the executive chamber at Annapolis, and enclosed copies of the memorial and affidavits for their inspection. The police commissioners denied the power of the Governor to try them for "official misconduct," or to find them guilty thereof. Governor Swann, however, proceeded to try their case, and on the 1st of November announced his intention to remove Messrs. Hindes and
HISTORY OF WESTERN MARYLAND.

Wood on several grounds which he distinctly specified. Pending the decision of Governor Swann, the State was threatened with invasion by armed partisans from other States, and military organizations were formed in Baltimore for the open and avowed purpose of resisting the authority of the laws. On the 24th of October, Gen. Grant wrote to President Johnson, declaring that there was no occasion to send troops to Baltimore, and on the 25th President Johnson asked for the number of troops at convenient stations near Baltimore, to which Gen. Grant replied on the 27th, giving the desired information. On the 1st of November, President Johnson announced to Secretary Stanton that, "in view of the prevalence in various portions of the country of a revolutionary and turbulent disposition which might at any moment assume insurrectionary proportions and lead to serious disorders, and of the duty of the government to be at all times prepared to act with decision and effect, this force is not deemed adequate to the protection and security of the seat of government. I therefore request that you will at once take such measures as will insure its safety, and thus discourage any attempt for its possession by insurgent or other illegal combination."

When Governor Swann made his decision removing the police commissioners, President Johnson, on the 2d of November, gave Secretary Stanton the following order:

"EXECUTIVE MANSON, WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 2, 1866.

Sir,—There is ground to apprehend danger of an insurrection in Baltimore against the constituted authorities of the State of Maryland, on or about the day of the election soon to be held in that city, and that in such contingency the aid of the United States might be invoked under the acts of Congress which pertain to that subject. While I am averse to any military demonstration that would have a tendency to interfere with the free exercise of the elective franchise in Baltimore, or be construed into any interference in local questions, I feel great solicitude that should an insurrection take place the government should be prepared to meet and promptly put it down. I accordingly desire you to call Gen. Grant's attention to the subject, leaving to his own discretion and judgment the measures of preparation and precaution that should be adopted.

"Very respectfully yours,

Andrew Johnson.

Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War."

On the same day Gen. Grant sent an order to Gen. Canby, inclosing the orders from the President, and directing him to hold troops in readiness for the anticipated difficulties in Baltimore. Gen. Canby came immediately to Baltimore, and was followed in a few days by Gen. Grant, who reported on the 5th that "a collision this morning looked almost inevitable. Wiser counsels now seem to prevail, and I think there is strong hope that no riot will occur. Propositions looking to the harmonizing of parties are now pending." Messrs. Wood and Hindes, the police commissioners, having been removed by Governor Swann, Messrs. William Thomas Valiant and James Young were appointed on the same day to fill the vacant offices. The superseded board, however, procured the arrest of the new appointees and the sheriff, William Thomson, who was assisting Messrs. Valiant and Young, and had them all lodged in jail. They were arrested on a warrant issued by Judge Bond, of the Criminal Court, and were charged with inciting a riot. Judge Bond required them not only to give bail to keep the peace, but to bind themselves not to attempt to execute the duties of their office, and to this demand they refused to submit, and were therefore committed to jail. This proceeding caused the most intense excitement in the city, but there was no serious disturbance of the peace. Several regiments of troops organized and were quartered at Fort McHenry, and Gen. Grant and Canby were besieged by the several factions at their headquarters in the city. Messrs. Hindes and Wood mustered in about three thousand five hundred regular and special police, and guarded the station-houses, their office, and prominent places in the city. As soon as the new police commissioners and sheriff were committed to jail, their counsel waited upon Hon. James L. Bartol, one of the judges of the Court of Appeals, who was at his home in the city, and procured a writ of habeas corpus, which was made returnable on Monday, November 5th, at 9 A.M., before the judge of the Superior Court. The writ was directed to the warden of the Baltimore City jail, commanding him to produce the bodies of William Thomas Valiant, James Young, and William Thomson, and have them before the judge at the time named. At the time appointed it was stated to the judges that the writs had been served, but it was understood that they would not be obeyed. The court adjourned until November 8th, and in the mean time the police commissioners were kept confined. During their confinement, on the 6th of November, the election took place, and resulted in a triumph of the Conservative party. In the city a total vote of 16,006 was polled for State comptroller, of which the Conservatives cast 8513, and the stalwart Republicans 7493.

Messrs. Valiant and Young, the new police commissioners, were brought before Judge Bartol on the writ of habeas corpus on November 8th, and on the 13th the judge rendered his decision releasing the commissioners, who immediately took possession of the office and entered upon the discharge of their duties. The marshal of police during the day surrendered the force under his charge to their orders, and on the 15th Messrs. Hindes and Wood surrendered their books, and turned over the station-houses and other property to the new commissioners, thus settling one of the most exciting difficulties that ever occurred in Baltimore.

The success of the Conservatives was followed by appeals to Congress on the part of their opponents, and by charges that the State had been revolutionized, and that the safety of loyal men, and especially of the colored population, was endangered. These charges first took definite and official form in a notice of contest by Joseph J. Stewart, Republican candidate for the Fortieth Congress from Baltimore, defeated by Charles E. Phelps, Conservative, and then a member of the Thirty-ninth Congress. Mr. Stewart charged "that Thomas Swann, Governor of the State of Maryland, conspiring with officers of his own appointment to defeat the law and revolutionize the State, did resort to measures revolutionary in their character, as against the loyal body politic of Maryland." After considerable testimony had been taken on both sides, Mr. Stewart abandoned the contest in a published letter to Mr. Phelps, dated April 12, 1867, admitting that the evidence had failed to present matter of serious controversy, and offering to indemnify his opponent for the costs.

The Republican State Convention which assembled in Baltimore on the 28th of March, adopted resolutions which were presented to Congress, calling upon that body "to protect the loyal majority of the people of Maryland, both white and colored, in defeating the scheme of the revolutionists in the Legislature," and declaring that "we will oppose any new constitution set up in subversion of the existing constitution under the convention bill which does not express the will of the majority of the people without regard to color; and we will, with the aid of the loyal representatives of the nation, and by all means in our power, resist and destroy any such constitution as revolutionary usurpation." The Baltimore City Council also asked Congress to "assist the people of Maryland to form a State government, republican in form, and in union with the spirit of the age." A petition for an injunction to prevent the election authorized by the Legislature on the 29th of March, 1867, to decide whether or not a Constitutional Convention should be called, was filed in the Superior Court of Baltimore on the 30th of March. After an extensive argument on both sides, Judge Martin, on the 2d of April, rejected the application.

The election was held on the 13th of April, and the whole number of votes cast in the State was 58,718, of which 34,534 were for a convention, and 24,136 against it. After a session of over three months the convention completed its work, and adjourned on the 17th of August, 1867. The election for the adoption or rejection of the new constitution was held on the 18th of September. The whole number of votes cast in the State in favor of its adoption was 47,152, and the whole number cast in opposition to it was 23,036, a majority of 24,116 in its favor. The first election under the new constitution was held in Baltimore on Oct. 23, 1867, for judge of the Court of Appeals, chief and four associate judges of the Supreme Bench of Baltimore, and mayor and City Council. The vote for mayor was: R. T. Banks, Democratic-Conservative, 18,420; A. W. Denison, Republican, 4896. At the State election on November 5th the candidates for Governor were Oden Bovie, Democratic-Conservative, and Judge H. Lennox Bond, Republican. The total vote of the State was 83,744, of which Bovie received 63,694, and Bond 22,050.

In the Presidential election of Nov. 3, 1868, Allegany County cast 2721 votes for Seymour, and 2428 for Grant; Carroll, 2697 for Seymour, and 2300 for Grant; Frederick, 3813 for Seymour, and 3869 for Grant; Montgomery, 1745 for Seymour, and 399 for Grant; Washington, 3114 for Seymour, and 3056 for Grant.

In March, 1870, the Legislature passed a law incorporating Towson town, the county-seat of Baltimore County, and on April 4th an election was held for five commissioners to serve one year. This was the first election in the State under the Fifteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, and was the first occasion on which colored men had been allowed to vote in Maryland since 1862. They were duly impressed with the importance of the new privilege, and cast a full vote for the Republican ticket, which was elected by a large majority. The election of Nov. 2, 1870, passed off quietly considering the excitement of the campaign and the introduction of a new political element. All the colored voters appeared at the polling-places at an early hour, and the day seemed to be almost a holiday with them. United States deputy marshals were present at the polls in Baltimore, in accordance with the provisions of the Enforcement Act, but there was no necessity for their services. The total vote in the State was 134,525, of which 76,796 were cast for the Democratic and 57,729 for the Republican candidate, leaving a Democratic majority of 19,067.

In Allegany County the vote was 2843 for the Democratic candidates, and 1980 for the Republican;

In the State election for Governor, comptroller, attorney-general, and members of the Legislature, held on the 7th of November, 1871, the Democrats were again successful. On the State ticket the Democratic candidates were William Pinkney Whyte, of Baltimore City, for Governor; A. K. Syster, of Washington County, for attorney-general; Levin R. Woolford, of Somerset County, for comptroller. The Republican candidates were Jacob Tome, of Cecil County, for Governor; Alexander Randall, of Anne Arundel County, for attorney-general; and Lawrence J. Brendle, of Frederick, for comptroller. The total vote of the State was 132,728, against 134,525 at the congressional election in 1870. The total number of votes cast for the Democratic candidate for Governor was 73,908, and for the Republican candidate 58,820; Democratic majority, 15,088.

At the Presidential election of 1872, Greeley or the "new departure" candidate received in the State 67,687 votes, and Grant 66,760. Majority for Greeley, 927. Allegany County cast 2695 votes for Greeley, and 3301 for Grant; Carroll, 2505 for Greeley, and 2587 for Grant; Frederick, 4065 for Greeley, and 5186 for Grant; Montgomery, 2121 for Greeley, and 1949 for Grant; Washington, 3204 for Greeley, and 3664 for Grant.

The State election of Nov. 2, 1875, for Governor, attorney-general, comptroller of the treasury, and members of the Legislature, was one of the most animated political contests ever known in Maryland. The Democratic candidates were John Lee Carroll for Governor, Charles J. M. Gwinn for attorney-general, and Levin Woolford for comptroller. The opposition Reform candidates were J. Morrison Harris, of Baltimore City, for Governor; S. Teackle Wallis, of Baltimore City, for attorney-general; and Col. Edward Wilkins for comptroller. The total vote cast in the State was 157,984, of which Carroll received 85,454, and Harris 72,530. In the counties Harris was successful, but his majority in the State was overcome by the vote in Baltimore City, which stood 36,958 for Carroll and 21,863 for Harris, the total vote of the city being 58,821. Great frauds were alleged, and the election was contested before the Legislature of 1876, which decided in favor of the Democratic candidates. At the Presidential election of Nov. 7, 1876, the Democratic electors were elected by 19,799 majority, the vote for Samuel J. Tilden, of New York, and Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, being 91,780, against 71,981 for R. B. Hayes, of Ohio, and William A. Wheeler, of New York.

In the political campaign of 1879 the contest was narrowed down to a struggle between Democrats and Republicans. The issues of the campaign were, however, above the level of personal altercation or attacks upon individual character, as there was no personal objection that could be alleged against either of the gubernatorial candidates.

Hon. William T. Hamilton, of Washington County, was the Democratic nominee for Governor, and Mr. James A. Garey the Republican nominee. The election was held on the 4th of November, 1879, and resulted in the success of the entire Democratic State ticket by heavy majorities, the vote being 90,820 for Hamilton and 68,612 for Garey. The Democrats carrying, among other counties, Carroll, Montgomery, and Washington.

FREDERICK COUNTY.

CHAPTER XVIII.

INTRODUCTORY.

Frederick, the parent-county of Western Maryland and the fourteenth in the order of formation in this State, was created by an act of the General Assembly passed June 11, 1748. This act, however, did not take effect until the 10th of December of the same year. The territory of Frederick County originally belonged to Charles County, created in 1658, the bounds of which, as defined by the commission appointing officers for it, were "the river Wicomico to its head, and from the mouth of that river up the Patumac as high as the settlements extend, and thence to the head of Wicomico." Charles County had then on the east St. Mary's and Calvert Counties, and in its general and vague boundary it included all the territory in the western part of the province, or what are now Prince George's, Montgomery, Frederick, Washington, Allegany, and Garrett Counties and the District of Columbia, and so continued for thirty-six years.

The early settlers of Maryland and Virginia kept to the navigable streams, and it was many years afterwards before the fertile lands in the valleys in the neighborhood of the Blue Ridge and Allegheny Mountains began to be dotted with the log cabins of an advancing frontier. No pioneer had ventured into these solitudes, whose sleeping echoes were only waked by the scream of the eagle or the whoop of the painted warrior. Neither Gist nor Cresap had yet seen the wilds of Western Maryland. The Potomac then flowed in solitary grandeur for more than three hundred miles through an unbroken wilderness, its gentle surface only disturbed by the wing of the wild-fowl or the dip of the savage paddle. It now washes shores studied on either side with the habitations of civilized and Christianized men, reflecting in its mirror-waves the jocund harvests and golden fruits of regulated and active tillage, is adorned with smiling villages and cities, and for one hundred and twenty-five miles from its mouth it bears upon its bosom the diversified commerce of mighty commonwealths.

As we have seen in another place, the Potomac had been explored as far as the Little Falls, above Georgetown, by Henry Fleet, thirty-four years before the erection of Charles County. Fleet, however, was not the first white man who ever looked upon the site of Washington, for this locality was explored by Capt. John Smith, of Virginia, as early as 1608. When Leonard Calvert arrived in the "Potomac" in 1631, he went up to confer with Fleet, the adventurous fur-trader, who had been many years in the country. "The place," said Fleet, alluding to the Potomac just above Georgetown, and afterwards in Frederick County, "is, without all question, the most healthful and pleasant place in all this country, and most convenient for habitation, the air temperate in summer and not violent in winter. It aboundseth with all manner of fish. The Indians in one night commonly will catch thirty sturgeons in a place where the river is not over twelve fathoms broad. And for deer, buffaloes, bears, turkeys the woods do swarm with them, and the soil is exceedingly fertile; but above this place the country is rocky and mountainous, like Canada. . . . We had not rowed above three miles but we might hear the falls to roar."

The progress of settlements up the Potomac was slow, and we have learned little respecting them. "Blue Plains," a tract of ten hundred acres east of the Anacostia,—i.e., the Eastern Branch of the Potomac,—was surveyed for George Thompson, June 4, 1662.

"St. Elizabeth," of fourteen hundred and thirty acres, was on a survey Sept. 30, 1635, made "Oxon-Hill Manor." "Glennings," of three hundred and forty-nine acres, and "Giesborough," of eight hundred and fifty, surveyed May 5, 1663, on a resurvey Feb. 3, 1695, by Col. John Addison, were made "Barnaby Manor." These settlements continued to grow rapidly until 1695, when Prince George's County was formed out of the territory lying north of the Mattawoman and Swanson's Creek, and a straight line connecting their heads, and between the rivers Patuxent and Potomac. In 1748, Prince George's received its first definite western limits by the creation of Frederick County, from which it was separated by a straight line, beginning at the lower side of the mouth of Rock Creek, and running thence with Hyatt's plantation to the Patuxent River. Since that period no change has been made in its bounds, except by the interposition of the District of Columbia (ceded to the United States by Maryland in 1789), which has given to it as its present southern and western boundaries the Potomac River until it meets the lines of the District, then with those lines lying in Maryland until they intersect the former line from Rock Creek, and with that line to the Patuxent.

Frederick County, at the time of its formation, embraced all that portion of the province lying north and west of Prince George's, Anne Arundel, and Baltimore Counties which is now contained in the counties of Carroll (partly), Montgomery, Frederick, Washington, Allegany, and Garrett and the District of Columbia. In other words, Frederick County originally embraced the whole of that section of the State now known as "Western Maryland."

The act of 1748 was passed in response to repeated petitions sent annually for the preceding nine years by many of the inhabitants of the western part of Prince George's County, the first of which was delivered by Benjamin Tasker from the Upper House to the Speaker of the Lower House on the 10th of May, 1739. These petitions asked leave to have a separate county formed from that in which the petitioners resided, to have separate magistrates, and to build a court-house. The bill of 1748 enacted "That from and after Dec. 10, 1748, a new county is erected out of Prince George's County, the bounds whereof to be as followeth, viz.: Beginning at the lower side of the mouth of Rock Creek, and thence by a straight line joining to the east side of Seth Hyatt's plantation to Patuxent River, the said line to be run by the surveyor of Prince George's County, and trees marked, etc.; then with Patuxent River to the lines of Baltimore County, and with the said county to the extent of the province; and all the lands lying to the westward and northward of the said lines to be included within the new county aforesaid, which shall be called Frederick County, and the inhabitants thereof to have and enjoy equal privileges with the other counties of this province in sending delegates to the Assembly, having county courts, sheriffs, justices, etc., and the court-house and prison to be built in or adjoining to Frederick Town." Provision was made for holding the county courts on the third Tuesday of March, June, August, and November, and the assize on the Monday next after that in Prince George’s County. exactly what were the western lines of Baltimore County had not been determined, and accordingly in 1750 an act was passed establishing a definite line, beginning at Parr’s Spring, and running thence with artificial metes to the Pennsylvania line.

"By this act it was provided that that part of Frederick County which was formerly included in Prince George’s County is hereby divided from Baltimore County in manner following, viz.: Beginning at a spring called Parr’s Spring, and running thence north 55° east to a bounded white oak standing on the west side of a wagon-road called John Digg’s road, about a mile above a place called the Burnt House Woods, and running thence up the said road to a bounded white oak standing on the east side thereof, at the head of a draught of Sam’s Creek, thence north 55° east to a Spanish oak standing on a ridge near William Roberts’, and opposite to the head of a branch called the Beaver Dam, and running thence north 20° east to the temporary line between the provinces of Maryland and Pennsylvania, being near the head of a draught of Conewago, at a rocky hill called Rattlesnake Hill, which said lines are hereby established as the boundaries between the said counties, and all the lands on the southeast side of the said lines to be deemed to be in Baltimore County, etc., and all the lands on the west-northwest sides to be part of Frederick County," etc.

It is probable that the first settlements in what was afterwards known as Frederick County were made in the neighborhood of Georgetown, D.C., which was for a long time the chief mart and the only seaport of the county. It is also evident that the glowing descriptions given by the early voyagers to this locality fired the imaginations of many of the colonists of Virginia and the Old World, and led many to take up their homes at the head of navigation on the Potomac. The attractions and advantages of this section of the province had become familiar in the other colonies some years before Cecilius Calvert received his charter. Whatever, indeed, may have been the date at which the first settlements in Frederick County were made, it is certain that it was indebted in an early period for much of its population to Virginia and Pennsylvania. The religious persecutions in Virginia and political troubles in that colony, and the risings in Scotland in 1715 and 1745 led many persons to come to Maryland and settle near the headwaters of the Potomac, and the dispute with the Dutch over the title to the Delaware drove a few of the Swiss to this locality. Our border troubles with Pennsylvania led many of the inhabitants of the adjacent counties of that province to remove to Maryland, who in the early days settled mostly in the neighborhood of Frederick Town. The lower part of the county, at Georgetown and Rockville (now in Montgomery County), was at first the most thickly settled, and there is conclusive evidence in the old Episcopal Parish records to show that it long maintained this numerical superiority. Settlements in the beginning, as we have stated, clung to the shores of the bay or the banks of the large rivers, and nearly every plantation of consequence was placed within easy distance of some water highway, the only sort of road which the early colonists found already prepared for them. Thus from the first the "backwoods" was the wilderness, and the backwoods was simply the unsettled region removed from navigable water; and thus it happened that both shores of the bay and its large estuaries were settled before the interior of even St. Mary’s, Charles, Talbot, and Kent Counties had ceased to be called the "backwoods." The tide of immigration from the South, as far as the original Frederick County was concerned, was met by a downward current from the North, and accordingly we find among the early settlers of Western Maryland emigrants from Virginia, Southern Maryland, Delaware, and England on the one hand, and from Pennsylvania, New York, and Germany on the other. The settlements on the Potomac continued to be the most populous until about the time of the formation of the county, when the Governor and Council stated to the Board of Trade in England that "the population of Maryland had been much increased by the influx of Germans, who had been assigned lands in Frederick County." These settled principally in the neighborhood of Frederick Town, and when the county was created Frederick Town was made by law the county-seat, and the court-house was ordered to be erected there. The town of Frederick had been laid out in 1745, three years before the creation of the county, and there had been a settlement of pioneers from Southern Maryland in what is now the Urbana district as early as 1730. In 1733 a company of German immigrants came down from Pennsylvania and established themselves in the valley of the Monocacy, and from this time onward we can date the rise and progress of this interesting section of our State.

The county was named after Frederick, the Sixth and the last of the Barons of Baltimore. He was the only son of Charles, the Fifth Lord Baltimore, who died on the 24th of April, 1751, aged fifty-two years. Before the death of Charles he made and published his will, which was afterwards proved in the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury, England, bearing date Nov. 17, 1750, whereby he devised to trustees therein mentioned the province of Maryland and all his estates, "of what nature or kind soever the same were (except the manor of Anne Arundel, in the county of Anne Arundel, in the said province), to the use of his only son, Frederick Calvert, afterwards Lord Baltimore, in strict settlement, with the reversion in fee to his the testator's eldest daughter, Louisa Calvert."

Frederick, the last of the Barons of Baltimore, married Lady Diana Egerton, youngest daughter of the Duke of Bridgewater, in 1753. She died Sept. 4, 1771, without issue. Frederick was a fast young man, and did not live to be an old one. His memory is not precious, and his deeds were anything but meritorious. In 1768 he was indicted and tried for committing rape, but notwithstanding he was acquitted by the court, he was most severely censured by the press and people for this atrocious act, and the conviction of his guilt was universal. He had an insurmountable propensity to flourish as an author, but he never gained any literary reputation, although he published several works. He died in Naples, Sept. 14, 1771, leaving two illegitimate children by Hester Wheland,—Henry Harford and Frances Mary Harford. Hester Wheland, alias Harford, afterwards married Peter Prevost, and her daughter, Frances Mary Wheland, alias Harford, married Robert Morris, of England. Frederick Calvert upon his death bequeathed the province of Maryland in tail mail to his illegitimate son, Henry Harford, a child nine years of age, then under the care of Rev. Dr. Loxton, at Richmond School, remainder in fee to his younger sister, the Hon. Mrs. Norton, and several minor bequests.

Henry Harford, instead of repairing to Maryland to take possession of the province under Frederick's will, remained in England during the Revolutionary struggle, and as a consequence all their property, revenues, etc., valued at two millions of dollars, were confiscated. As Frederick left no legitimate issue, the title of Lord Baltimore became extinct, and by the results of the war for independence Henry Harford was the first and last proprietary of Maryland.

At the time of the formation of Frederick County some thirty persons from New York joined the German and English colonists near Frederick Town in clearing the surrounding country and in building up the town. In addition to these there were important descents from the Scotch-Irish of the Cumberland Valley and from Swiss refugees. These pioneers found themselves in a wild country, in close proximity to the Indians, and confronted by all the difficulties and dangers of the frontier life. They were, however, a hardy, adventurous people, and soon succeeded in permanently establishing themselves in their new home. So compact, indeed, and well ordered was the little colony that it not only kept the Indians at a respectful distance, but developed rapidly in the peaceful arts. Undoubtedly the great natural advantages of the region in which the immigrants had settled contributed largely to their success. To a kind and fertile soil, abundantly watered by numerous streams, were joined a bracing climate and delightful scenery of a character peculiarly fitted to stimulate all the energies of the thrifty and industrious pioneers who had chosen it as their abiding-place. The abundance of mineral deposits and the utilization of the valuable water-power provided by the various rivers and creeks were important factors of industrial development, and it was not long before iron and copper-works and two glass manufactories were in active operation. Thus in an early writer (1807) we find: "Frederick County contains abundance of iron ore, slate, and limestone, a copper-mine near Liberty Town, and flintstone for making glass. There are two furnaces and two forges in operation, which manufacture pig, hollow-ware, and bar-iron to a considerable amount. Within a few miles of Frederick Town are two glass-houses which carry on the manufacture of glass with much spirit." The two glass-houses mentioned were probably those of John Frederick Amelung & Co., who issued a prospectus Feb. 9, 1755, announcing that "a company of German manufacturers being lately arrived in the State of Maryland, and having made a plan of establishing a complete glass manufactory in the United States," were prepared to make "all kinds of glass-ware, viz.: window-glass from the lowest to the finest sorts, white and green bottles, wine and other drinking-glasses, as also optical glasses and looking-glasses finished complete." The firm purchased a tract of land on the Monocacy, near Frederick, erected factories, and soon began the regular manufacture of glass. They established agencies in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Frederick. In Baltimore their representative was Melehior Keener, and in the town of Frederick, Abraham Paw. This was undoubtedly the first glass manufactory established in America. In common with the rest of the country, however, Frederick County was hampered in the development of manufactures by the restrictive and almost prohibitory legislation of the British Parliament against all American manufactures which competed with English goods, and under the circumstances their progress prior to the Revolution was remarkable.
So rapid was the growth of the settlements in Western Maryland that within the comparatively brief period of twenty-five years it was found necessary to erect two new counties in addition to Frederick. That county had been established on the 11th of June, 1748. On the 6th of September, 1776, the Colonial Convention divided Frederick County, and formed the new county of Washington on the west and Montgomery on the south. Carroll, which now bounds Frederick on the east, was not established until 1835, and previous to that year was comprised in Frederick and Baltimore Counties. The ordinance for the establishment of the new counties provided "that after the 1st day of October next such part of the said county of Frederick as is contained within the bounds and limits following, to wit: beginning at the place where the temporary line crosses the South Mountain, and running thence by a line on the ridge of the said mountain to the river Potowmac, and thence with the lines of the said county, so as to include all the lands to the westward of the line running on the ridge of the South Mountain, as aforesaid, to the beginning, shall be and is hereby erected into a new county by the name of Washington County," and "that after the first day of October next such part of the said county of Frederick as is contained within the bounds and limits following, to wit: beginning at the east side of the mouth of Rock Creek, on Potowmac River, and running with the said river to the mouth of Monocacy, then with a straight line to Parr's Spring, from thence with the lines of the county to the beginning, shall be and is hereby erected into a new county by the name of Montgomery County." For Washington County, Messrs. Joseph Sprigg, Joseph Smith, John Barnes, Andrew Rench, Daniel Hughes, William Yates, and Conrad Hogumire, and for Montgomery County, Messrs. Nathan Magruder, John Murdock, Henry Griffitt, Thomas Crampton, Jr., Zadock Magruder, Allen Bowie, and John Wilson were named as commissioners. These lines still constitute the boundaries of Frederick County on the south and west, but by the formation of Carroll County in 1835, which cut off a large part of Frederick, the eastern boundary of the county was changed, so that it now runs as defined by the act (1835, ch. 256) creating Carroll County: "Beginning at the Pennsylvania line where Rock Creek crosses said line, thence with the course of said creek until it merges in the Monocacy River, thence with the Monocacy to the point where Double Pipe Creek empties into Monocacy, thence with the course of Pipe Creek to the point of juncture of Little Pipe Creek with Big Pipe Creek, thence with the course of Little Pipe Creek to the point where Sam's Creek empties into Little Pipe Creek, thence with Sam's Creek to Warfield's Mill, thence with the road called the Buffalo road and to a point called Parr's Spring." In 1789, Allegany County was formed out of Washington County, and embraced all of that part of the State lying west of Sideling Hill Creek until 1872, when it was divided to make the new county of Garrett.

Frederick is one of the most picturesque, diversified, and interesting counties in the State. Along its western boundary extends the Blue Ridge, or South Mountain, and its surface is divided by the Catoctin Mountains into two beautiful valleys, the Valley of the Monocacy River and the Middletown Valley, drained by the Catoctin River or Creek. The scenery on both sides of the Catoctin range and along the base of the Blue Ridge is of the most charming character, presenting a diversity of effects, a boldness of outline, and a warmth of color (at certain seasons of the year) which fully justify the local pride which is felt in them. The soil, especially of the two valleys, is famous for its fertility. Frederick, in fact, is, agriculturally, the most productive county in the State. The pasturage is so superior that stock-raising has long been one of the distinctive features of Frederick County farming, and in certain districts tobacco and potatoes are important crops. The surface of the country is undulating, with gently-swelling hills, rising in the western portion to a beautiful spur of the Blue Ridge, geographically known as the Catoctin Mountains; not rugged, barren, and forbidding in their aspect, but covered to the summit with well-cultivated farms or dense forests of valuable timber. The South Mountain, or Blue Ridge Range, which divides Frederick from Washington County, is noted for the grandeur and beauty of its scenery and the purity of its atmosphere. Frederick County embraces many varieties of soil, most of which have been improved to the highest degree and are in the best state of cultivation. The soil is mostly limestone, with some slate and flint lands and considerable red soil. The extensive tracts of comparatively level land in the basins of the valleys are sufficiently rolling to drain well, and there are no marshes or swamps of any extent in the country, so that it is exempt from all malaria. In quality the soils comprise the best varieties of the clay limestone, mica slate, roofing-slate, and red lands. Each of these soils has its peculiar excellence and adaptation to particular crops, but all of them produce large yields of wheat, rye, oats, corn, and the cultivated grasses, and, as a consequence, the best cattle, sheep, horses, and other domestic animals. The climate is salubrious, and the county renowned for its healthful-
ues. The inhabitants are intelligent and industrious, and mainly devoted to agriculture. The farms are finely improved with large barns and substantial dwellings that bespeak the prosperity of the owners. Orchards abound, and the apple and peach are extensively grown. The eastern slope of the Catoctin Mountains and the Linganore hill country are especially adapted to the culture of the grape. Here is the native home of the Catawba, while other varieties are also largely cultivated with success. There are also several large and flourishing vineyards in the vicinity of the Monocacy River. The Concord grape thrives best on limestone lands, but in the hill country the Catawba, Iona, Isabella, Delaware, and Clinton are singularly exempt from the ravages of the phylloxera.

The mountains are covered with oak, hickory, and chestnut timber, the latter affording an inexhaustible supply of fencing material, while in the valleys, at frequent intervals, there are strips of woodland, which give variety to the landscape and furnish fuel and fencing. The county is watered by innumerable streams. The Monocacy River and Catoctin, Linganore, Owen's, Hunting, Fishing, Carroll, Tom's, Bennett's, Bush, Israel's, Tuscarora, Middle, Sam's, Pike's, Broad, and Beaver Dam Creeks traverse the county and provide an abundance of water-power, besides that existing on the Potomac.

Large tracts of land in Frederick County were taken up or purchased by the Dulanys, the Carrolls, and other leading families of the province, who early appreciated its great value for agricultural purposes. Patrick Dulaney owned the land on which Frederick City now stands, and a considerable tract besides. Charles Carroll of Carrollton's manor on the Monocacy, in what is now Buckeystown District, was much more productive than the family-seat in Howard County. Land was taken up in what is now Linganore District by James Carroll as early as 1727. The abundance of water-power and the discovery of valuable deposits of copper, iron, and other minerals naturally gave a great impetus to manufactures and to industrial occupations of various kinds. Paper-mills were erected, and during the Revolution a gun-lock factory was established at Frederick, and Daniel and Samuel Hughes, of Antietam, were given a contract for casting cannon. Long ere this the manufacture of linen had been established by the German settlers. Large quantities of flax were grown, the soil being especially suited to its cultivation. The men prepared it for spinning, and the women wove it into coarse linen, which found a ready sale. Thread of different colors was also made and sold at a profit, and the seed of the flax was sent to Baltimore and Philadelphia, where it was easily disposed of. Thus in every German household an important industry was added to the ordinary avocations of the farm, and it is not to be wondered that the Frederick County Germans should have so soon outstripped their Southern neighbors in the race for material prosperity. Nor did they stop at a single branch of manufactures, but occupied themselves with a great variety of profitable employments. Thus they knitted long yarn stockings, very useful to the frontiersman and farmer; they tanned leather and worked it up into harness; and they prepared butter in firkins, honey, apple-butter, dried apples, etc., which they exchanged in Frederick and in Baltimore for salt, lead, gunpowder, and other necessary supplies. These, in turn, were often exchanged with the frontiersmen for furs and peltries, hides, game, etc. The natural consequence was that Frederick expanded rapidly, and soon became the second town in Maryland in population and importance. As early as 1760, and probably even earlier, a public road was established between Frederick and Baltimore, and another about the same time between Frederick and Annapolis. In addition to the trade with Baltimore, Frederick carried on an extensive traffic with the people of Georgia. That colony was established about the same time (1733) that the first settlement was made at Frederick, and under the direction of the eccentric but able Ogilthorpe had developed rapidly. There was a bond of sympathy between the Germans of Frederick and the people of Georgia, from the fact that Moravians and Protestant refugees from Salzburg had settled in the Southern colony. The goods sent from Frederick were boots and shoes, saddles and harness, wooden goods, linen and woolen and flaxseed threads. They were carried on pack-horses, and were exchanged for cotton, indigo, and money. Frederick also had a lucrative trade with the posts of the Ohio Company, the first of these being situated on the Potomac, on the present site of the city of Cumberland. Annapolis, during this period, was an important post, and the road to that point was chiefly used for the transportation of tobacco and flax intended to be shipped abroad.

A turnpike road between Frederick and Baltimore was commenced in 1805. Writing of Frederick in 1807, Joseph Scott, the geographer, says, "It (Frederick) is a flourishing place, and carries on a brisk trade with the Western country, and when the great Western turnpike which is to pass through it into Pennsylvania and the State of Ohio is completed it will add greatly to the trade, wealth, and prosperity of the place. Frederick Town will then become the great thoroughfare between Baltimore and Philadphia to the Western country." In another portion of his book he says, "The great Western turnpike . . . has been begun, and twenty miles of it completed from the city of Baltimore. It is expected that during the ensuing summer it will be finished as far as Frederick Town." This fact alone serves to prove the industrial importance and prosperity which Frederick County had already attained. It was the more marked from the fact that in the other counties of Maryland the people devoted themselves almost exclusively to the cultivation of tobacco with slave labor, and led, on the whole, a very easy, indolent life. Naturally, the prosperity of the German families of the rich Monocacy and Middletown Valleys excited the cupidity of adventurers, and we read in "Edlis' Letters" that large sums of money were made by those who had influence with Governor Ogles by the lease and sale of fertile lands in Frederick County of which they had secured possession. These lands speedily found their way into the hands of comparatively small holders, who cultivated them closely, and improved them so that now they form one of the most productive agricultural regions in the country. The Monocacy and the Catoctin, both of which flow southward into the Potomac, have numerous branches, so that the county is abundantly supplied with water-power, which was utilized at a very early date in the erection of mills, tanneries, etc. As early as 1796 there were thirty-seven grist-mills on the Monocacy and its branches. Copper-mines were worked as far back as 1760. On the 20th of November, 1765, a copartnership was entered into between Stephen Richards and John Stevenson to raise copper ore from a tract known as Spring Garden. James Smith was appointed manager, and work was commenced. Comparatively little success was met with until 1767, when some of the ore was shipped to London. The Fountain Copper-Works were in operation in 1760. These veins of ore are situated in the Linganore Section, near Liberty, and are still worked with profit. The rich marble quarries of the Catoctin Mountain and of the Monocacy Valley were also developed at a very early day. From the Monocacy region came the marble which was used in the columns of the old hall of the House of Representatives in the capitol at Washington. Very handsome limestone marble of various tints of blue and gray is found in quantities between Woodsboro' and the Potomac River, and another variety of light and dark red is seen west of Frederick City. To Frederick County is due the credit of having first manufactured that useful article, the friction-match, which was discovered and first made in the village of Mechanistown, by Joseph Weller and two others, in 1831. Large quantities were manufactured and sent to Baltimore, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, Wheeling, and Nashville, Tenn. Mr. Whittaker, druggist, at the corner of Howard and Baltimore Streets, was the agent for Baltimore. Owing to a defect in the preparation, the "heads" of the matches became soft in hot weather, and this of course had the effect of greatly diminishing their popularity for a while. The manufactury was twice blown up, and one of the proprietors with it. Mr. Weller narrates that he sent an agent into the Middletown Valley, and that the prudent and wary farmers ran him and his matches off, saying, "You rascal, you want to sell articles to set our barns and houses on fire!" At first the matches sold for twenty-five cents per box, and afterwards for ten cents. Every box had a piece of sand-paper in it on which to strike the match.

The geographical position of the town of Frederick has made it the scene of many stirring events. Situated on the great highway to the South and West, it became during the Revolution one of the most conspicuous of the colonial towns. During the French and Indian war it was the nearest English settlement of importance to the theatre of military operations, and was the rallying-point for the British and colonial troops. Here Gen. Braddock swore and foamed over the vexatious delays which preceded his fatal advance upon Fort Du Quesne, and here George Washington, then a colonel in the colonial service, and Benjamin Franklin, postmaster-general for the colonies, met for the first time. No community contributed more liberally to the Revolutionary cause than did Frederick County, whose companies of the "Flying Camp," under the gallant Johnson and Rezin Beall, and of the German Battalion, commanded by Col. George Stricker, did gallant service throughout the war. The people appear to have been practically a unit in their devotion to the principles for which the colonies contended, and under the leadership of Thomas Johnson, John Hanson, Thomas Sim Lee, Alexander Contee Hanson, and other patriotic men, were uniring in their exertions in behalf of the cause. A hardy, independent race, they were naturally impatient under the oppressive legislation of the British government, and though peaceable by nature and slow to violence, were tenacious of their rights and determined to assert them at all hazards. It was not to be expected that the men who had braved the perils of the wilderness for freedom's sake would sit down tamely under the iniquitous burdens which the British ministry was seeking to impose, and consequently we find many of the bravest soldiers of the Revolution in the ranks of the German companies which were recruited in Frederick County. Among the earliest manifestations of the Revolutionary spirit were the demonstrations of the Sons of Liberty, who not only denounced the Stamp Act in 1765, but threatened to march to Annapolis, in order to compel the Governor and Council to abolish a certain tax on tobacco which they continued to levy in opposition to the Lower House of the General Assembly. This was not the first time the men of Frederick had asserted themselves in a similarly bold and independent manner. In 1756, Capt. Thomas Cresap publicly announced his intention to lead a band of riflemen to Annapolis to compel the provincial government to give them necessary aid in repelling Indian attacks, but as the aid was granted he did not execute his threat.

The settlements of Frederick and in the vicinity extended rapidly westward, and the more adventurous spirits did not hesitate to establish themselves in isolated situations, exposed to sudden assaults from the neighboring Indian tribes. Among these pioneers the Creseys, the Shelleys, the Poes, the Gists, and the Wetzes stand forth conspicuous in local history for daring and success. Previous to and during the French and Indian war the savages made frequent incursions into thinly-settled portions of the county, and their depredations caused the inhabitants to organize a band of riflemen for the protection of the frontier. The constant presence of danger and the necessity for unflagging vigilance invited the people to military service, and produced a warlike race of frontiersmen. In fact, the settlements outside of Frederick Town were all established in the midst of no ordinary perils, and were subjected to many severe trials before their permanent safety was secured. Frederick itself does not appear to have been seriously threatened at any time, except during the French war and once during the Revolution by the famous Dunmore,—White Eyes’ conspiracy, which was frustrated by the energetic measures of the patriotic John Hanson. The Swiss settlement, in what is now known as Hauer’s District, was one of the most advanced of the frontier villages. The country around it was wild and desolate, but the Swiss preferred it on account of its mountainous character, and their industry soon caused it to blossom like the rose. The Indians were dangerously near, but as the French war had practically terminated, the settlers were not often molested except in individual cases. For some years the population of the county was composed mainly of the emigrants from Germany and Switzerland, but as this portion of Maryland began to assume importance as a region of uncommon productiveness, it attracted persons from other portions of the province and from Pennsylvania, and became a favorite point with emigrants newly arrived from Great Britain. Among those who repaired thither from other counties of Maryland were the well-known families of Howard, Dorsey, Chaggott, Carroll, Fitzhugh, Johnson, Graham, Gaither, Wood, Cockey, Worthington, Duvall, Hanson, Thomas, and Tidghman. Daniel Dunlap owned more than eight thousand acres of land in Frederick County, and previous to the Revolution his son, Walter Dunlap, was one of its representative men. Charles Carroll of Carrollton had a vast estate on the Monocacy River. James and Baker Johnson, brothers of Governor Thomas Johnson, and William Elder, the first settler in the Emmitsburg District, were attracted to the flourishing new country from Southern Maryland and soon acquired valuable property there. Frederick, the last Lord Baltimore, had a manor of thirteen thousand one hundred and forty-eight acres on the Monocacy, and two manors and reserves, aggregating one hundred and twenty-five thousand one hundred and thirty acres, west of Fort Cumberland. By his order these, with his other manor lands, were nearly all sold in 1766 by his agents, Governor Sharpe, Daniel Dunlap, and Mr. Jordan, at prices ranging from twenty to thirty shillings per acre. The influx of English settlers was followed by the establishment of churches of the Anglican communion. At this period, however, the Episcopalian Church in Maryland had the misfortune of being largely in the hands of dissolute and unprincipled ministers. Their lives were a daily scandal and reproach; but, as the church was established by law, and their livings were held independently of the will or wishes of their parishioners, they continued to perpetrate the worst excesses with impunity. The inevitable consequence was that many of their parishioners and the people generally turned to other denominations, and we find that even the oppressed and persecuted Catholics made considerable headway in the western portion of the State. The Lutherans, Presbyterians, Reformers, Mennonites, Friends, and various German sects made rapid progress in Western Maryland, and the numerous churches of these denominations which are scattered over the country are enduring memorials of the early religious activity of that region.

From an Episcopalian stand point, however, the condition of the people was simply deplorable. The Rev. Thomas Bacon, compiler of the early laws of Maryland, who had a parish in Frederick County, writes to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in England, that “infidelity has indeed arrived to an amazing and shocking growth in these parts.” By
"infidels," however, he probably meant all who did not subscribe to the doctrines of the Established Church. A curious picture of the proflicity of the clergy is found in the adventures in Maryland of the Rev. Bennett Allen, who succeeded Rev. Thomas Bacon as rector of All Saints' parish, in Frederick County, in 1768. All Saints' was the richest parish in Maryland, yielding about one thousand pounds per annum. Mr. Allen had come over to Maryland with letters from Lord Baltimore commending him to the consideration of Governor Sharp. He sought to have himself made rector of St. Ann's, at Annapolis, and for a time succeeded. Not satisfied with this living, however, he undertook to get possession of St. James' parish, near Annapolis, but his conduct was so tricky and unprincipled that the vestry of St. James' would not consent to the union. Enraged at his failure he quarreled with one of the vestrymen, Samuel Chew, who thereupon ejected him from his house. Mr. Allen returned to Annapolis and challenged Mr. Chew to fight a duel. After several letters had been exchanged, Mr. Chew consented to fight, and named the time and place, adding that he was determined that one of them should never leave the field alive. It was agreed that they should fight with pistols, and that there should be no witnesses. Fearing treachery on Allen's part, however, Chew took with him a servant armed with a blunderbuss. Allen did not appear, and afterwards alleged that he had received "timely information" that Chew had brought a third party to the field with the intention of murdering him. This duel, therefore, never came off, but Mr. Allen afterwards fought Lloyd Dulany, son of Daniel Dulany, in England, and killed him. On being told that the income from St. James' parish was about three hundred pounds sterling, Mr. Allen replied, "It will hardly supply me with liquor." He carried pistols and "a cane with a spear in it," and seems to have led a turbulent, dissolute life. He made his appearance at Frederick on Tuesday, May 3, 1768, and having had the keys to the church stolen from the sexton by "a tipping, itinerant barrister," proceeded to the church and read prayers in the presence of witnesses. The people were very much opposed to him, having doubtless heard of his scandalous behavior in Annapolis. On the following day (Sunday) he attempted again to enter the church, when he was met by the vestry, who remonstrated with him. He persisted, however, and entering the chancel took his place at the desk and began to read the prayers. The vestry retired, but the congregation were much incensed, and one of them approached the desk and asked Mr. Allen to desist from a performance which seemed little short of sacrilege. For reply the clergyman drew a pistol and declared with an oath that if the person offered to touch him he would shoot him through. But the people persisted, and at length Allen, becoming frightened, descended from the desk and left the church. Outside he was assailed with stones and compelled to yield the church keys, which he dropped to the ground as he ran. The parishioners then shut up the church. Mr. Allen appears to have returned to Annapolis, as he published a card in the Maryland Gazette, Sept. 29, 1768, in which he gave his version of the affair. He was severely criticised for his conduct, as would appear from the fact that he threatened to "knock up" Mrs. Green's press if she published "any more pieces against him." The only effect of his threats, however, was to cause Mrs. Green to be elected provincial printer by the General Assembly. He seems to have had a special grudge against the Dulany family, for his animus appears not only in the fatal duel with Lloyd, but also in the fact that he sought to bribe a man named David Atchison to shoot Walter Dulany, Lloyd's brother.

It would be unfair to select Mr. Allen as a representative of his class, but we have the strongest contemporary testimony for the assertion that many of his fellow-ministers were ignorant, neglectful, and too often dissolute. The Revolution did away with the arbitrary appointment of rectors, and produced a marked improvement in the character of the Episcopal clergy. In the mean time Methodism had been making rapid growth. The first regular Methodist congregation established in the colonies was that at Sam's, or Pipe Creek, Frederick Co., which was organized by Robert Strawbridge, a Wesleyan lay preacher, who had come to America from Ireland in 1760 and had settled there. He formed in his own dwelling a class-meeting of twelve or fifteen persons, which Bishop Asbury says was "the first society in Maryland and America." He preached regularly at his house and at various places in the neighborhood, and gradually extended his work to Baltimore and Harford Counties, the Eastern Shore, Fairfax County, Va., and Lancaster County, Pa. The first society of Methodists in Baltimore County was formed under his direction at the house of Daniel Evans. For this society a chapel, one of the first in the country, was afterwards built. Mr. Strawbridge licensed preachers, the first of them being Richard Owen, of Baltimore County, who was the first native American to preach the Methodist doctrines. Mr. Strawbridge resided at Sam's Creek for sixteen years, when he removed to Long Green, Baltimore Co., to a farm given him for life by Capt. Charles Ridgely, of Hampden. He died about 1781. In 1764 the congregation at Sam's Creek built a log meeting-house. It remained standing until 1844, when it was demolished. It is believed to have been the first chapel erected in this country, preceding the next in order about three years. A stone chapel was built near it in 1783, and rebuilt in 1800. In 1772 the congregation were visited by Francis Asbury, afterwards bishop. John and Charles Wesley had preached in Georgia as early as 1736, and John Wesley and George Whitefield in various portions of the country afterwards, but there seems to be no reason to doubt that the first regular meeting or society was organized at Sam's, or Pipe Creek. Mr. Strawbridge was not regularly licensed to exhort until 1772, when authority was given him by Francis Asbury. Methodism was introduced into Frederick Town by Mr. Strawbridge on an invitation from Edward Drumgole, who, on coming from Ireland in 1770 with a letter to Mr. Strawbridge, went to Pipe Creek. He heard him preach, and was so well pleased that he gave him an invitation, which Mr. Strawbridge accepted, to preach in Frederick. Mr. Drumgole afterwards became a Methodist minister himself. The celebrated Methodist minister, Freeborn Garretson, began his career in the Frederick District in 1776. Frederick County may in fact be termed the cradle of Methodism in America, and from the humble efforts of Strawbridge, Drumgole, Owen, and others rose the mighty structure of the present Methodist denomination. In its earlier stages Methodism exerted a powerful influence in correcting the abuses of the Established Church, and for that reason it is not at all surprising that it should have met with harsh treatment and misrepresentation in various portions of the province, until at length it grew to be strong enough to command both toleration and respect.

It is impossible to state with certainty the date of the establishment of the first Presbyterian congregation in Frederick County. But as the Scotch-Irish settlers of the Cumberland Valley and vicinity were mostly Presbyterians, and as they crossed the line into Maryland at an early period, it seems highly probable that Presbyterianism was among the earliest denominations on the field. Thus, for instance, we find that Samuel Cavin, a licentiate from Ireland, was sent by the Presbytery of Donegal on the 16th of November, 1737, to Conococheague (now Chambersburg). This settlement was first mentioned in September, 1736, when the Presbytery refused to sanction the employment of Mr. Williams, from England, who was then preaching there. The settlement embraced Falling Spring (or Chambersburg), Greencastle, Mercersburg, and Welsh Run. The congregation was soon divided into two portions, the dividing line being Conococheague Creek, and they were denominated respectively East and West Conococheague. Mr. Caven accepted the call of the East Side, April 4, 1739. In the following winter he visited the settlements on the South Branch of the Potomac. In 1741 he severed his relations with Conococheague, and spent some time in ministering to settlers on the present site of Hagerstown, Marsh Creek, Opequon, and the South Branch of the Potomac. The settlement at Conococheague remained without a regular minister for some years. In September, 1760, the Rev. Robert McMordie was appointed by the Presbytery of Donegal to "supply" the settlers on the Monocacy. One year later provision was made for ministerial service for congregations on Tom's and Pipe Creek.

The earliest organized religious bodies in Frederick County were the Protestant denominations represented among the German and Swiss emigrants. There was quite a number of these sects, and all of them appear to have maintained the lines of demarcation between them with scrupulous care. The immigrants from Germany were indiscriminately denominated "Palatines," from the fact that many of them came from the Palatinate, along the Rhine (afterwards incorporated in Prussia, Bavaria, Baden, Hesse-Darmstadt, and Nassau). After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, which had secured toleration for the Protestants of France, the latter were relentlessly persecuted by the government of Louis XIV. and his successors, the Regent and Louis XV. It is estimated that more than five hundred thousand persons fled from France during this reign of terror to Holland, England, and America; and when the victorious French army invaded Germany a similar expatriation of the Protestant population took place. Many thousands fled to America, and being attracted to Pennsylvania by the mild and tolerant rule of Penn and his representatives, the greater portion settled in that province. Thus, for instance, Governor George Thomas, of the province of Pennsylvania, writing to the Bishop of Exeter in 1747, says, "The Germans of Pennsylvania are, I believe, three-fifths of the whole population (whole population two hundred thousand). They have by their industry been the principal instruments of raising the State to its present flourishing condition beyond any of His Majesty's colonies in North America." The religious sects into which they were divided were the Lutherans, the German Reformed, the Moravians, the Mennonites, the Calvinists, the Amish Brethren (rigid Mennonites), and the German Seventh-Day Baptists. There were also the Labadists, the Society of the Woman in the Wilderness, the Separatists, the Quietists, and others. Of these none were more devout, frugal, and industrious than the Mennonites, who took their name from the Protestant reformer, Menno Simon, a native of Friesland, who founded many communities in Germany and Switzerland. His teaching extended even to Russia, where in our own day the Mennonites are a large and prosperous community. Many of the immigrants were robbed before leaving home, and were compelled to sell their services and those of their children for a term of years in order to pay the passage-money. And yet in a comparatively short time these Redemptionists, as they were termed, had become well-to-do farmers or mechanics, so universal among them was the practice of the closest economy and thrift. They seem to have had keen eyes for fertile soil, and many of them were speedily attracted from Pennsylvania to the blooming plains and valleys of Western Maryland. They soon spread over the entire region east of the South Mountain, and even penetrated as far west as the Conococheague Creek. Owing to the danger from predatory Indians, the settlements advanced no farther for some time. With the exception of the trading-post of the Ohio Company at Fort Cumberland, they were the most western of the European settlements in the eastern section of America. Nearly all the leading seats established in Pennsylvania soon came to be represented in Maryland, and some of them grew rapidly there.

We find, therefore, that three distinct and widely divergent elements entered into the composition of the early population of Frederick County, viz.: (1) the English and colonial settlers from other portions of Maryland; (2) the Scotch-Irish from just across the Pennsylvania border; and (3) the German and Swiss immigrants, some newly arrived from Europe, and the rest previously settled in Pennsylvania, chiefly in the counties of Lancaster, York, and Adams. It was to be expected that the interests, the habits, and the prejudices of these communities would have kept them apart, but in the presence of common dangers and difficulties they speedily joined hands and worked together harmoniously, forming in course of time a practically homogeneous population, distinguished equally for judicious liberality and thrift, and second to none in the country in the general distribution of intelligence and wealth.

It will be seen that Frederick was deprived of a very large slice of its original territory, more than one-half in fact. However, it was still quite large enough, and could even afford to spare the portion annexed to that taken from Baltimore County in 1835 to form the new county of Carroll. It was pop-led by a superior class of immigrants, who found ample room for development in its fertile valleys and high, breezy table-lands, and it has held from the beginning the front rank among the counties of Maryland for the beauty of its scenery, the fertility and productiveness of its soil, and the industry, energy, and thrift of its inhabitants. As constituted at present, Frederick County is bounded on the north by Adams County, Pa., on the east by Carroll County, on the southeast by Howard and Montgomery, on the south by Montgomery and the Potomac River, which divides it from Virginia, and on the west by Washington County, from which it is separated by the Blue Ridge, or South Mountains. Its area is 652 square miles, and its population is 50,122

Total population, 50,122.

There are eight incorporated towns in the county, viz., Emmitsburg, Mechanistown, Middletown, Woodboro, Jefferson, New Market, and Point of Rocks.

In 1790, Frederick County contained 27,150 free persons and 3641 slaves; and in 1800, 20,341 free persons and 4572 slaves. On the other hand, Montgomery, with a much smaller population in 1790—viz., 11,973 free persons—had 6030 slaves; and in 1800, with only 8770 free persons, 6228 slaves; clearly demonstrating the difference in the habits and pursuits of the people of the two counties. In Frederick the population was chiefly engaged in small farming, manufacturing, and mining, while in Montgomery it was mainly occupied with planting, for which slave labor was in great demand, although manufacturing factories had also been established there.

Following are the census returns of population for Frederick County since and including the first census of 1790 up to 1870, inclusive:

CHAPTER XIX.

LAND GRANTS AND RESURVEYS.

Under the charter of Maryland, the proprietary was both the ruler of the province and the owner of its soil, and hence the exclusive landlord of Maryland. The revenues arising from his land grants consisted in quit-rents, caution money paid at the time of the grant, and alienation fines, including fines upon devises. The quit-rents, or ground-rents, as we now call them, were the annual rents, renewed by the proprietary in his grants, and to be perpetually paid from year to year by the owner of the land granted, in acknowledgment of the tenancy. They were rent charges, charged upon the land when it was first granted out by the proprietary, and they constituted the only revenue from land grants which was looked to in the first settlement of the province. The quantum of the rent to be reserved was always regulated by the proprietary's proclamations or instructions, and it varied continually throughout the government with the varying value of the lands to be granted and the views of the proprietary. In the earliest grants, under the first conditions of plantations, the rent was made payable in wheat, but in general, with regard to the rights acquired after the year 1635, the rent was payable either in money alone or in the commodities of the country, at the option of the proprietary and his officers. This right of the proprietary to require payment of his rents in money was attended with great inconvenience and oppression to the people, and hence, as early as 1671, it was commuted for payment in tobacco. The act of 1671, which originated this commutation, imposed a duty of two shillings sterling on all exported tobacco, of which one-half was given to the then proprietary for his own use, and the residue for the defense of the province, in consideration of his agreeing to receive tobacco for his quit-rents and alienation fines at the rate of two pence per pound. This mode of payment was continued until 1717 by a variety of acts, when the Assembly resorted to the expedient of buying out the rents and alienation fines as the only effectual mode of relief from the harassing petty officers scattered over the whole province. The act of 1717 gave to the proprietary for his own benefit a duty on all exported tobacco of two shillings sterling on every hogshead, and fourpence sterling per hundred on all tobacco exported in box or case, etc., and so pro rata, "in full discharge of his quit-rents and alienation fines." This temporary law was continued by several acts until 1733, when it was suffered to expire; and from that period until 1789, there being no commutation, the quit-rents were payable according to the requisition of the patents. During this interval it appears that all the evils of the old system of collection returned in full force. Scarcely a session of Assembly elapsed without some complaint of outrage or oppression on the part of the collectors of these rents, and every effort was made by the Assembly to induce the proprietary to accept an equivalent for them. Of the value of the quit-rents throughout the proprietary government it is difficult for us at the present day to speak with accuracy, but from the best estimate which can be collected from the debt-books it appears that in the year 1770 their gross amount was about £8400 sterling, and the net revenue of the proprietary from them, after deducting the expenses of collection, upwards of £7500 sterling.

The sagacity of the wise and benevolent Cecilius, the first proprietary of Maryland, is conspicuous in the policy pursued by him in granting the lands of the province. The first wish of his heart was to see its population increase and its commerce prosper. Looking to the future, beyond the petty ambitions and interests of the moment, he saw that his reputation and permanent interests were identified with the prosperity of the colony; and with the sagacity to perceive, and the heart to feel this, he made his rights of property in the province minister to its advancement. His lands were offered as premiums for emigration. Adventurers were encouraged to come into the province, and to bring their servants and dependants with them. Every person transporting himself into it was entitled to a certain quantity of land, without paying any caution or purchase money, and the land granted was charged only with a moderate quit-rent. If he brought others with him he was allowed for their transportation a further quantity, which was proportioned to the numbers, age, and sex of the persons transported, the highest premiums being given, in some of the earliest conditions of plantation, for the transportation of males between fifteen and sixty, and of females between fourteen and forty-three. These land rights were prescribed by various proclamations, issued from time to time by the proprietary, which were familiarly called "The Conditions of Plantation." They were frequently varied, according to the necessity for inducements to emigration, or to promote the establishment of settlements in particular portions of the province.

These plantation rights were the only modes of acquiring lands recognized in the "Conditions of Plantation," but besides these there were land rights acquired under warrants for land granted by the proprietary to particular individuals. The inducements granted to the first settlers were abolished by the new proprietary in 1683, and a new system was then adopted, under which all persons were permitted to sue out warrants for lands upon payment of a definitive amount of purchase money, which was called "caution money," because no warrant could issue until it was paid or secured. Thus was fully introduced the system of granting lands which has prevailed in Maryland until to-day. Fines for alienation were the incidents of the feudal tenures generally, as they originally existed in England. They appear to have belonged as well to the socage tenure as to that in chivalry, and the same feudal reasons existed for their connection with both. They were transplanted to the province of Maryland, with the socage tenure, and notwithstanding their abolition in the mother-country in 1660, they continued to exist until the American Revolution.

The sale and lease of the proprietaries' lands in Maryland formed the principal part of their revenue, and consequently the Land Office became from the first the chief office of the province.

In the year 1680, from the natural increase of business, it was found necessary to create a Land Office, distinct and not blended with other offices, as it had been up to that period. From the year 1680 the Lord Proprietary managed the land affairs of his province by a Land Council, the clerk of which was called the register. In 1684 certain formal instructions were given by the Lord Proprietary to his Land Council, the principal and most important of which are here subjoined:

- "The Land Council is first authorized to give, grant, lease, or otherwise dispose of all land escheatable for want of heirs. Any error made by surveyor or clerk in certificate or patent to be corrected, rectified, and amended, as the case shall require.

- "Any person owning two or three more tracts of land contiguous or adjoining, upon application the Land Council may grant special warrant to resurvey or to lay out the same into one entire tract and grant patent for the same.

- "May grant land of an alien, not naturalized, that may escheat to the proprietary.

- "Where it hath been discovered or made known to the Land Council that any grant hath been illegally or surreptitiously obtained, the Land Council are required to order seizure facias to issue forth out of the Chancellor's Court of Records to the patentee, or other present owner and possessor, to show cause why the same should not be vacated.

- "Should the land be adjudged and condemned to the proprietary for the reasons aforesaid, then the Land Council may, by letters patent or otherwise, give, grant, or dispose of the same to the discoverer thereof.

- "The Land Council may, upon the death of the surveyor-general, extend or continue any special warrant or warrants of resurvey.

They cannot grant any patent for any tract of land that is part or parcel of a greater tract formerly granted.

"Authority is given to the Land Council to sign all patents legally obtained and affix the great seal."

When the war with Great Britain culminated in the independence of the colonies, the first act of the State to assume the control of the Land Office was contained in the act of Assembly of April session, 1777, ch. 15, entitled "An act to open the courts of justice, etc.," by the eighth section of which it was ordained, among other things, in order, as the act stated, that individuals might not suffer by the change of government, that all the land warrants granted and issued out of the Land Office before the appointment and qualification of the new register should continue to be in force for the same time, and should be executed by the new officers in the same manner as if the former government had continued; and that all officers who might have in their possession any such land warrants, or any record-books or papers, should deliver them to the proper officers immediately when they should be thereunto required.

The next act of the Legislature is that of October session, 1777, ch. 8, by which the State appeared to have in view its succession to the bodies of land still remaining vacant, by promising certain bounties of land to recruits for the army and to recruiting-officers, with a declaration, however, that if no other method should be provided within the time specified in the act for laying out the quantity of land required to make good that engagement, it should be procured within the limits of the State at the public expense.

The acts of October session, 1780, chs. 45, 49, and 51, by which, for reasons therein set forth, all property, debts only excepted, belonging to British subjects was declared, under certain exceptions, to be confiscated to the use of the State, are presumed to have ended the struggle and decided the question as to what was to be the future destination and employment of the Land Office.

The act of November session, 1781, ch. 20, "to appropriate certain lands to the use of the officers and soldiers of this State and for the sale of vacant lands," and which, by subsequent acts, as well as by general acceptance, is termed the law opening the Land Office, is the first that makes arrangements for disposing of the State's right to vacant land.

Under this law provision was made for the appointment of two registers of the Land Office, one on the Eastern and one on the Western Shore. By the act of 1841 the former office was abolished, and all the papers, etc., were transferred to the Western Shore Land Office, at Annapolis.

The original "patents" or "surveys" for lands in Frederick County varied in extent from one up to tens of thousands of acres, were irregular in shape, and had bestowed upon them names as quaint and odd as human ingenuity could suggest. The commissioners empowered by Lord Baltimore to sell his reserved lands and manors, on Nov. 9, 1767, offered for sale at the house of Col. Thomas Prather, in Frederick County, his lordship's manor of "Conococheague," with the reserve, containing over eleven thousand acres. The original patents of lands in Frederick County are not now found in the county clerk's office, but the following are the resurveys made since their issuing down to 1800, which in some cases are exact duplicates of the originals, and in other instances subdivisions of the first patents:

1 The first deed recorded conveying in fee simple land in the county was that of George Matthews, dated Jan. 21, 1749, and recorded the same day. This instrument conveyed to Charles Davis, for the consideration of thirty pounds, one hundred acres of land, one water or part of a tract called "Good Luck," on Ballenger's Creek. The next deed is that of William Biggerstaff to Thomas Harris, dated Feb. 21, 1749. It conveyed, for fifty pounds, a plantation called "The Pleasant Level," "situated on the south side of a branch of Tom's Creek, between the mountains, being a draught of thirty acres." The third conveyance was that of Joseph Chapple to Samuel Kely, dated March 8, 1749, conveying, for twenty-five pounds, part of a tract of land called "Hunting the Harp," being fifty acres. The first deed recorded in the new volume of records opened after the adoption of the first State constitution in 1776 was that of Peter Hoffman to His Excellency Thomas Johnson, Governor of Maryland. It is dated Aug. 24, 1778, and conveyed, in consideration of four thousand pounds current money of Maryland, all that tract called "Rose Garden," being part of the survey called "Tasker's Chance." The piece thus conveyed "contained two hundred and twenty-five acres, except the graveyard now placed in on the said land."
CHAPTER XX

THE BENCH AND BAR.

The bar of Maryland has long been distinguished for its learning, its probity, and the lofty professional standard it has maintained. It has been equally renowned for the prominence of its leaders, who have conjured in a marked degree knowledge of the law, familiarity with the statutes, and acquaintance with the rules of practice and pleading to signal powers and graces of oratory, no less than it dominates the jury, and makes the court wish, like Ulysses, to be tied to the mast. Colony and State, the Maryland bar can point to an unbroken succession of these conspicuous leaders from the earliest periods down to our own very day. Each gem in that galaxy is a bright particular star, yet so closely do they succeed one another that there seems no interval between, The Bordleys, Dulany's, Jenningses, Tlighman's, and Carroll's of the earlier periods are followed in unbroken order by the Chases and Johnsons of the Revolutionary age, to whom Martin and Pinkney are rather younger brothers than children. When Wirt, Harper, Winder, and others of that "old school" fell into the "sere and yellow leaf" the mantle was not dropped before it was caught by the brilliant circle in the centre of which McMahon, Nelson, and Schley, of Western Maryland, shone brightest, nor can these be said to have left a vacuum so long as we have Wallow, Steele, Alvey, Ritchie, Walsh, Darby, Douglas, Sykes, Turner, Roberts, the Schleys, and their associates.

The bar of Maryland has not lost any of its old-time brilliancy. It is still distinguished for its eloquence, its integrity, and for its solid learning as of yore. But these qualities are not so conspicuous now as their singularity made them in the period from 1750 to 1820, when, for two generations, the lawyers of Maryland were almost without peers in their profession upon this continent. Massachusetts and Virginia were rivals, but not superiors, if even equals.

In that period Annapolis, and afterwards Baltimore and Frederick, were centres of legal rivalry such as are seldom seen. A style of oratory, ornate and elegant, yet precise, correct, and elaborated upon the best models of pure English, furnished the fitting capstone to a solidly-built column of carefully-studied principle and precedent; the judges were worthy of the barristers who pleaded before them, and neither judges nor barristers were content unless they seemed at least to measure themselves with the most conspicuous lights of Westminster Hall and the great English circuits. During this period, indeed, our bar prided itself upon closely following English models.

It claimed to have its Erskines and its Mansfields, its Scarlet's and its Broughan's; it followed most rigidly the precedents of old English law and the practices of the English courts, and certainly refreshed itself more frequently with English methods and English studies than the bars of either Massachusetts or Virginia. The courts of these States were provincial, the one from necessity, the other from a certain lordly and aristocratic indifferrence which regarded Williamsburg as good enough for the men who followed legal pursuits in Virginia, as the cream of the tobacco noblesse did not. But estates were not so large in Maryland, while, on the other hand, the rewards of the law as a profession were much more tempting in our State than in Virginia. It paid for the younger sons of a family to pursue the law in Maryland, and the competition was so keen that it paid the fathers of those younger sons to give them a good legal education in the London Inns of Court. Hence a surprisingly large number of our young lawyers, during the colonial period, studied their profession in the Temple and Lincoln's and Gray's Inns. The Bordleys, the Dulanys, the Taskers, the Carrolls, the Tilghmans, the Jenningses, the Paeus, and Bennets, and Helmsleys were all represented, at one time or another, in those classic walks. After the Revolutionary war these fashions were not resumed; yet Pinkney went twice to London to defend and secure American interests, and it was proudly believed by those who knew him best that he had found no rival there with whom he feared to cope.

There must have been sufficient causes for this exceptional brilliancy of the early Maryland bar, nor are these causes far to seek. They are the same as those which subsequently gave their great eminence to the bar of Kentucky and some other Western States,—the certainty of handsome emoluments and the existence of much litigation. It was the confusion of titles and the multiplicity of claims to the rich lands of Kentucky which involved that whole State in lawsuits and feuds after its first settlement, and afforded, in both the criminal and the equity sides of the courts, such an opportunity as is rarely offered for the profitable exercise of legal talents and legal skill. The same causes are now at work to give peculiar brilliancy to the bar of Texas. In Maryland, when the colony was settling, while the lands were being cleared, the Indians pushed back, and all society was seething with the hand-to-hand struggle between Protestant and Catholic, Puritan and Cavalier, there were practically no lawyers, the courts were mere justices' courts and, later, vestry courts, and the bench—outside, at least, of St. Mary's, if we may trust the author of the "Sot-Weed Factor"—was boorish and ignorant if not venal. But there came a swift change with the settlement of the provincial government at Annapolis, the clearing of the "backwoods," the large importation of labor, both white and colored, and the general growth of the colony in wealth and importance. Three or four elements are noticeable right here as concerting together for the rapid development of an able and brilliant bar. The rapidly-increasing forces of labor could only be profitably employed by a correspondingly rapid opening up of new lands, and of these there was great variety of choice. The old planters rested contented upon their inherited estates, but their overseers and factors, busy, pushing, ignorant men, took negroes and convicts to the newer settlements, worked them for all they were worth, grew rapidly rich, and were correspondingly arrogant and litigious. When they came to Annapolis they had money to spend and lawsuits to adjust, in respect to both of which they found plenty of young lawyers to accommodate them. Every lease or sale of land made by the provincial government implied an addition to the income of the Lord Proprietary, and quick sales and hasty surveys necessarily involved the validity of many a title. Besides this, the proprietary government, claiming and exercising extraordinary powers, felt constrained to maintain its pretensions by extraordinary means. It was the fountain of patronage for both State and Church, and it made this patronage profitable. There were many offices, and all these were in the gift of the Lord Proprietary, or his deputy at Annapolis. Surveyorships, advowsons, parishes, clerkships, tobacco-inspectorships, collectorships of rents and taxes, sheriffsalties, coronerships,—all were appointed from Annapolis. A sheriffalty in that time was a plum indeed, and the prothonotary of a county might grow rich on the fees of office in ten years.1

Besides these there were militia commands, commands in the wood rangers, and a very great variety of other patronage, paid for from the fees of office. Any young scion of a good family who studied law, came to Annapolis, and showed his loyalty to the existing government, winking at its abuses and courting its leading spirits, might be sure of securing an office such as would yield him a good support. If it was necessary he could be made a pluralist. John Coode, miserable rebel agitator and atheist as he was, held commissions militant, civil, and apostolic at once,—he was in holy orders, he was collector of customs, and he was colonel of county militia. Rev. Bennett Allen, controversialist, brawler, duelist, murderer, and sot, was incumbent of St. Ann's parish, in Anne Arundel, and the best parish in Frederick County. In 1770, among other fees and salaries, Governor Sharpe was paid, besides his salary of £1000 as Governor, £226 as surveyor-general, and an unstated amount as chancellor. Benjamin Tasker was president of Council, member of Upper House, and joint commissary, his pay in the latter position amounting to £483. Benjamin Tasker, Jr., was councilor, member of Upper House, and naval officer, the fees of the latter office being £318. Edmund Jennings was councilor, member of Upper House, and secretary for county clerks, register in chancery, clerk of provincial court, and notary public, his six offices yielding him £1307. George Steuart was judge of the land office and commissioner of the land office, receiving £517 salary. Daniel Dulany, to the practice at Anapolis courts, added the place of joint commissary, with £483 salary.

1 As early as 1689 one of the alleged grounds for Coode's rebellion was excessive fees of office and extortionate tolls, against which no remedy can be found, "the officers themselves that are partyes and culpable, being Judges."
These various causes soon built up a strong legal circle at Annapolis. In 1710, when Daniel Dulany the elder came to the bar, then fresh from England, there were but few lawyers, and these chiefly provincial born and educated at the provincial court. Among these, Dulany, Stephen Bordley, and the father of Edmund Jennings were the chief. In 1771 the bar of Annapolis was illustrious for its great lawyers and the great number of lesser lights revolving about them. They made a society of their own, witty, ingenious, dissipated. They fought, gambled, dissipated, had their clubs, wrote for the newspapers, patronized the theatres, the cock-pit, and the races, and all the province paid toll to them. They rode the circuits to some extent, going to Marlboro', Joppa, Frederick, Chestertown, and Easton; but Annapolis was their home and the fountain of their business. Here was Daniel Dulany the younger, of whom Pinkney, who only saw him in the evening twilight of his greatness, said that "even among such men as Fox, Pitt, and Sheridan he had not found his superiors," and of whom McMahon said, "For many years before the downfall of the proprietary government he stood confessedly without a rival in this country as a lawyer, a scholar, and an orator." He was regarded as "an oracle of the law." Here was John Beale Bordley, just retiring from the Governor's Council and the emoluments of office in Baltimore County to become the Cincinnatus of the Eastern Shore. Here was Samuel Chase, first and one of the greatest of our patriots, whose energies "quickened all that he touched, and whose abilities illustrated all that he examined." 1

"What he felt he expressed," says the lawyer historian of Maryland, "and what he expressed came stamped with all the vigor of his mind and the uncompromising energy of his character; if his manner was a fault it leaned to virtue's side. It is not for my feeble pen to portray his virtues and abilities, they are registered in the nation's history, and there is no true American to whom his name, recorded on the imperishable roll of American independence, does not bring back the grateful recollection of his services. He was a son of Maryland, and when will she have his like again?" Here was Charles Carroll of Carrollton, fresh from his law studies in the Temple, eager and able to challenge Daniel Dulany's masterly pen in a pamphlet controversy about American rights and American liberty,—the wealthiest citizen in the province, and the most keen to stake his fortune for independence and sacred honor, and "to win or lose it all." Here was "Barrister" Carroll, another law student of the Temple, another leader of public opinion, another patriot, whose able pen may be traced in many of our tersest and most effective State papers of the Revolutionary period.

The courts at that time were but little altered from the provincial, or, in other words, the old English model. They were much more formal and precise than now, more stern in rule, more rigid as to precedent, more complicated in practice. They were, in fact, overloaded with formalisms, and the official documentary language was but little removed from an utterly barbarous jargon. The business of the courts was apportioned into more numerous, minuter, and sharper divisions, and the predominant rule, which is now simplicity, tended in those days constantly towards over-refinement. Chancery was then by no means a name, but the labyrinthine way by which alone most men could reach after long wanderings the adytum of equity as to property and goods, estates, and hereditaments. The chancellor was the most important judge in the State, and was paid the highest salary. There was the Court of Appeals, which had then but minor jurisdiction, the Admiralty Court, superseded by the United States District Court after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and the chief judge and his associates of the General Court. These, after their appellate business at Annapolis was concluded, used to separate and preside over the Oyer and Terminer terms of the County Courts. In 1777 the chancellor's salary was £650 (in Maryland currency), the chief judge of the General Court got £600, and his two associates £500 each; the five judges of the Court of Appeals received £200 each, and the judge of the Admiralty Court was paid £250. This pay does not seem large, but it sufficed to secure for the bench some of the best lawyers in the State. They were appointed by the Governor for life, they did not have to Court the popular favor, they were as good, if not better, lawyers than the barristers who pleaded and the attorneys who practiced before them, and they kept up a dignified presence and attitude which would appear astonishingly severe at the present day. The wig was not part of the judge's costume, but the gown was until quite a late period, and there was a certain state about the courts which must have admirably upheld what it was meant to enforce, the dignity and elevation of the judiciary. This was well conceived for a bench which had such unlimited power over the persons as well as estates of the citizens, which could retain property in chancery for unlimited intervals, could imprison for debt while life lasted, which could pillory, or brand, or whip, or hang in chains and gibbet for offenses which to-day scarcely cause a year or two's imprisonment. It must not be inferred from this, however, that these severe punishments were very often imposed in Western Maryland during the later colonial days and the early State history of Maryland.

The bench held to its dignity as severely as it held to its ancient forms and complicated and involved terminology. The lawyers were kept in order by a rigid construction of the contempt rules, and the judges also sought to apply these rules as rigidly to the press. In fact, for many years the courts, in Frederick, Baltimore, and Annapolis, attempted to control the relations between the press and the public, so far as their sessions were concerned, much more according to the precepts of Lord Thurlow than in obedience to the suggestions of common sense in a free and enlightened country, and collisions between the two powers were consequently quite frequent, the courts seeking to maintain themselves upon a very high plane of constructive dignity, the papers resolve to give the people the news as promptly and fully as possible, with such editorial comments as they thought necessary to make.

The courts had not so many officers as they now have, but the officers were worthy of much more consideration, and were consequently supplied from a better class of materials. The prothonotary, afterwards clerk, held office for life, as did also the register of wills, and both were paid in fees. These officers were appointed. The sheriff, who had great power, was appointed under the provincial government, but elected under the State government. He also received his pay in fees, and the position was as hereditary as it was influential and responsible. Under the colonial government the sheriff was tax and tithe collector, and his influence upon and intercourse with the people must have been extensive to a very unusual degree. Down to quite a recent period the sheriffs of the counties were selected from among persons of the first consequence, and their criminal functions were looked upon as the least part of their charge.

Among the members of the Constitutional Convention of 1777 was Luther Martin, representing Harford County. The constitution then matured provided for an attorney-general of the State, and after Thomas Jennings, James Tilghman, and Benjamin Galloway had one after another declined the appointment, thought to be particularly perilous in a time of war, in which the party which might chance to lose would be treated as rebels, Governor Johnson tendered the post to Mr. Martin, who accepted it Feb. 11, 1778, and performed the duties of the office until December, 1805, when he resigned, and was succeeded by William Pinkney. From 1778 until the reorganization of the Court of Appeals in 1805 the judges of the court were Benjamin Rumsey, chief judge; Benjamin Mackall, Thomas Jones, Solomon Wright, and James Murray. Judge Wright dying in 1801, Littleton Dennis succeeded him, and Richard Potts was the same year appointed to fill the vacancy caused by Judge Murray's death.

The world never produced a better lawyer than the great legal genius, Luther Martin, whose knowledge was as broad as his judgment was unerring, who had so many of the solid parts of the law at his command that he could afford to neglect the graces in his pleadings. Unlike Patrick Henry, who trusted to eloquence and genius to carry him through, Martin was all his life a student. They lower themselves who think of this man as a simple case lawyer, earning fees in order that he might besot himself with brandy. He was a profound student, and a student of principles. At Princeton College, in addition to the studies necessary to give him the highest honors in a class of thirty-five, Martin took a course of French and Hebrew. His parents were poor, but he said that in giving him a liberal education they had endowed him with "a patrimony for which my heart beats towards them with a more grateful remembrance than had they bestowed upon me the gold of Peru or the gems of Golconda." Luther Martin was born in New Brunswick, N. J., in 1744; he was graduated in 1762, and immediately set out to this State in search of a school, securing one at Queenstown, Queen Anne's Co., under the patronage of Edward Tilghman. While teaching school he studied law, borrowing books from Judge Solomon Wright, and laboring indefatigably. He was often arrested for debt, even at that early day, but his studies were never arrested. "I am not even yet," he said long after this period, "I was not then, nor have I ever been, an economist of anything but time." Even while walking on the street he would be seen reading some volume or document lest a moment should be wasted.

Martin was admitted to the Virginia bar in 1771, began to practice in 1772, removed to Accomac, and thence to Somerset, in Maryland, where his practice was soon worth one thousand pounds per annum.
In his first term in a criminal court, of thirty cases he had, twenty-nine resulted in acquittal. He took an active and ardent part in the struggle for American independence, was member of the Maryland Constitutional Convention, and the only leading lawyer who dared accept the office of attorney-general. Tories were abundant in Somerset County at that time, and Martin prosecuted them and confiscated their goods with an unsparing vigor, and with such an intimate knowledge of the law that none escaped. Martin, like Chase, was an ardent Federalist politician. He defended Chase when impeached, and his defense of Burr in his trial for treason is not only one of the causes célèbres of the United States, but secured for Martin the active, life-long gratitude of the most heartless man the country ever produced. This great man died paralytic, imbecile, in penury, a pensioner. Yet the Maryland bar had such a sense of his greatness and of his broad contributions to legal science, and their obligations to him on that account, that they willingly consented to pay an annual license tax for his maintenance, and procured an act of the Legislature legalizing the assessment and collection of the tax, a case probably without precedent in professional history. Martin stands out among lawyers for presenting the sound sense of the law without trick or ornament, in beauty unadorned. His knowledge was always broader than his case; his mind seemed to grasp, co-ordinate, and classify the principles of the law as if it were one of the exact sciences, and his professional accuracy was so generally acknowledged that his mere opinion was considered law, and is still deemed sound authority before any of our tribunals.

It is commonly said that when William Pinkney returned from Europe (where he had been serving as commissioner under the Jay treaty), in the full flush of his extraordinary powers, and with his eloquence pruned and chastened down to the tone of English models, Martin's great position at the bar fell away. But when Pinkney came back Martin, who was twenty years his senior, had already seen his best days, and these two were never rivals, nor can they well be compared together. Their methods were entirely different. Martin's cases and his arguments on them grew out of his knowledge of the law, as the tree springs from the soil; but Pinkney built up his cases as the architect, with magic design and exact eye and selection of faultless material, builds a Strasburg cathedral or an Alhambra. The art is wonderful, supernatural if you will, but it is art nevertheless.

William Pinkney, this magic mechanician, was born at Annapolis, March 17, 1764, had a private tutor in classics, began to study medicine, finally studied law with Samuel Chase, and came to the bar in 1786. He held some legislative offices, and practiced his profession successfully until 1796, when he went to England on the Jay treaty claims commission, and also to reclaim Maryland's Bank of England stock from chancery. Mr. Pinkney removed to Baltimore in 1806. He was attorney-general of Maryland and of the United States, State senator, member of Congress, minister to Russia, and United States senator, dying in 1822, in the height of his fame. He was the most brilliant lawyer the State ever produced, but not so sound nor so solid as Martin. Vain, chary of his reputation, he never went into a case without the most careful and elaborate preparation. He did not wish to appear so, but was the most laborious of men, studying each theme like an actor preparing his part. He knew the law deeply, but only regarded it as his instrument. He was philosophical and poetical in the same way, so that he might fill out and round up his nosegay; yet so consummate was this great actor's art — on the country's broadest stage, moreover — that his hearers thought him the most perfect of orators, and said that he conjoined Burke's turbid thought and tropical rhetoric the chaste sentiment of Canning, the sonorous declamation of Pitt, the vivid fancy of Sheridan, Fox's ardor and passion, and Erskine's rapid but eloquent flow. Why not? William Pinkney was the aptest pupil that ever lived, and during his nine years in England he was at school to all these masters. The traditions of his triumphs, however, are something wonderful, and show him to have been a man of extraordinary force and versatility. These triumphs, however, were always the personal victories of Mr. Pinkney, and only legend tells of them, while the victories of Martin were the victories of the law, and its applications such that the courts even to this day respond to their influence. The distinction is as great as that between the appearance and manner of the two men, — Martin, awkward, matter-of-fact, slow in speech and dress, a great snuff-taker, and often using his sleeve in lieu of a handkerchief, sometimes hardly sober enough to appear in court, yet never losing or tangling the thread of his argument; Pinkney, with the airs of a petit maître, coming into court glove and dressed in the height of fashion, or hurrying in, booted and spurred, as if he had only remembered the case at the last moment, making good play with his handkerchief and his pinch of snuff à la morgue, always the actor, affected even to himself and his own thoughts, yet always fortified at every point in regard to his own case, terribly in earnest to win it, and terribly determined to let no rival eclipse him in the argument.

If to these names we add those of Roger Brooke Taney, the late chief justice of the United States, and William Wirt, whose lives, public property, do not need to be recited here, it will be admitted that the early bar of Maryland deserves all and more than the eulogiums that have been bestowed upon it. Taney, though he lived down to our own times, was the contemporary of Harper and Winder, of Pinkney and Martin. He was attorney-general of Maryland, and at the head of the profession in the city and State, when Andrew Jackson took him and in rapid succession made him Attorney-General of the United States, Secretary of the Treasury, and chief justice of the Supreme Court.

A man of the purest character, the loftiest principles, the calmest judgment, the most unbending courage, his spotless life and record were proof against the foulest breath of calumny and the most frantic convulsions of cant. He served his State and his country well, and rests peacefully in his honored grave.

Around these giants in law gathered many men who but for comparison with them would have shown themselves to be far above the ordinary stature. Of these it is only possible to mention the names of Thomas Beale Dorsey, William Frick, John Purviance, Nicholas Brice, Elias Glenn, and Alexander Nesbit, all of whom ascended the bench; Joseph Hopper Nicholson, of the old Eastern Shore family of that name, who was chief judge of the Baltimore County circuit, and afterwards (in 1805) was appointed to the Court of Appeals; William Ward, Theodoric Bland, who became chancellor; Zebulon Hollingsworth, Stevenson Archer, also chief judge of Baltimore County circuit; John Kilty, David Hoffman, the author; William Gwyn, editor of the Federal Gazette, and prince of the Delphian Club, etc. Jonathan Meredith, a contemporary of all these, lived right down into our own times, and deserves the title which was accorded him of "the Nestor of the bar."

And meantime the students of all these elders were coming forward to restore for a second time the golden age, the Saturia regna, of the Baltimore and Western Maryland bar. A good focal point from which to glance at these would be the date of the amended constitution of 1838, when the Governors of the State were first elected by the people. By that time there had been a general reaction against the State's policy of internal improvements, which had involved the community in overwhelming debt. The protest of the "glorious nineteen" had succeeded in arousing the people to a consciousness that the State government was degenerating into a mere rotten borough system, and the general sentiment was being effectually "democratized," so to speak. This had its decided influence upon the temper and character of the bar, and though the incoming leaders were still Whigs, they were Whigs of a very different stamp from the semi-Federalists of the Harper school. Fugivism was departing, like silk stockings and hair powder, and the railroad spirit had already made its distinct and recognizable impress upon society.

Easily first and foremost of the new school, legitimate and worthy successor of Martin and Pinkney, Winder and Harper, stands the towering form of John Van Lear McMahon. Born at Cumberland in 1800, taking first honors at Princeton when only seventeen years old, and coming to the bar at nineteen, Mr. McMahon was as distinctly a nineteenth century man as Messrs. Harper and Carroll were of the eighteenth. His immediate success at the bar did not prevent him from plunging at once into politics, and in his second term in the House of Delegates he became the recognized leader of that body, taking a memorable stand in favor of granting equality of civil rights to the Hebrews. In 1826 he removed to Baltimore to live, was twice again elected to the Legislature as a Jackson Democrat, and declined a nomination to Congress. It was rather a personal issue with the Jackson party than a change of principles which made McMahon turn Whig; his Cumberland birth, education, and associates inclined him to favor internal improvements from the first, and this he did in a masterful way, not only by his eloquent voice, but by his equally effective pen, in pamphlets, memorials, reports, and in bills and charters which embodied and vivified the spirit of the institutions he aided in creating. He drew the charter of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, the first incorporating act of the kind ever prepared in this country, and the model for all that have succceeded it. This fragment of Maryland history, which is one of the monuments to Mr. McMahon's memory, has caused the best judgments to regret that he did not devote himself entirely to literary pursuits, for it is in this field that his broad and philosophical mind seemed to exercise itself most freely. He was a man of towering genius, the equal of any political speakers, a lawyer profound, astute, full of resources, and knowing at once the authority, the precedent, the principle, and the "right reason" of every point he made. He was an insatiate reader, and a teacher of such winning powers that those who listened to him were never conscious of the lapse of time. His oddities and eccentricities were harmless, and he was the most charming and fascinating of companions.

John Nelson, one of McMahon's rivals at the bar, though not thought to be a larger and broader man, was by many esteemed to be a better lawyer than even that eloquent pleader, who boasted that he never lost a case. Mr. Nelson was a most accomplished and able barrister; he was a skilful and astute diplomatist, and a man all of whose varied parts were rounded up into perfection by close and exhaustive study, by acute analysis and a power of conjoined comprehension and apprehension such as is vouchsafed to but few men. He was a genial, kindly, warm-hearted, thoroughly well-balanced man. His natural endowments were great, his intellect was luminous and vigorous, and he regarded law as a science, the most intricate problems of which it was his province, his privilege, and his delight to master and unravel.
In the didactic parts of his profession, before the court and before a jury, his reasoning was close and exhaustive, his logic masterly, but this did not preclude him from the exercise of a genuine eloquence that was pleasing without being florid, and persuasive without vehemence. The late Reverdy Johnson, in speaking of Mr. Nelson's powers, said, "I have heard more eloquence, more brilliant imagery, more power of amplification, and more affluence of learning, but I do not think that in force of analysis, clearness of arrangement, perspicuity of statement, simplicity of language, closeness of logic, and concentration of thought I have ever seen Mr. Nelson much, if at all, excelled." John Nelson was born in Frederick, Md., in 1790; he was elected to Congress when only twenty-five years old; appointed minister to Naples by Andrew Jackson, and made Attorney-General by John Tyler. In the latter position he succeeded the brilliant Hugh Swinton Legare, of South Carolina, but did not suffer in the least by the comparison. He died in Baltimore in 1860, after a severe fit of the gout.

It is natural when we speak of McMahon and Nelson for the thought to revert to Reverdy Johnson. This sturdy oak of the law was the senior of the great triumvirate, in some respects likewise the greatest of the three. A man of wonderful power, both physical and mental, combative, yet subtle, acute, yet never wasting time on hair-splitting, Mr. Johnson's scope and range were remarkable.

He could talk to a jury of plain farmers in a simple diction of which they understood every word (or thought they did), and so make them have perfect faith in a new medical theory of "moral insanity," invented by him for the nonce and enforced by precept and example. He knew—none better than he—how to address the venerable judges of the Supreme Court so as to win their approbation while securing their attention, and giving them the pleasing sense of relief from the deluge of verbiage perpetually rising around and threatening to overwhelm them. He was the readiest of debaters in the Senate, where his profound grasp of constitutional subjects kept him ready armed in any emergency. He was skilful, astute, and au' faux in all the language and terms of diplomacy, never losing sight of the main issue of his case, while affecting, with the politezza of Talleyrand, the indifferent attachment of a Walpole to the middle way of compromise, and as an after-dinner speaker he was as clear, as genial, as sparkling, and as delightful as a draught of old southside Madeira, sunny and golden as the rays in which it had ripened. His capacity for work and business was almost miraculous. It despised the weight of years and the loss of sight, and when his last fatal accident befell him, on Feb. 9, 1876, at Annapolis, his mind and his powers seemed to be in their full vigor. Mr. Johnson was bred in the law. The son of Chancellor Johnson the first, the brother of Chancellor Johnson the second, he was born in Annapolis, May 21, 1796, educated at St. John's College, and taught law in his father's office. In 1817 he came to Baltimore to challenge the stalwart elders whose history we have already sketched. He never hesitated to throw down the gauntlet to any one. His success was immediate and continuous, nor did his loss of popularity in consequence of the Bank of Maryland troubles affect his standing at the bar. He was Attorney-General of the United States in 1849, United States senator in 1863, minister to England in 1868, and besides these received many other important appointments at the hands of his State and the Federal government.

The last of the lawyers whom we shall attempt to mention in connection with this period as fertile in legal ability of the first order will be William Schley.

Mr. Schley, of Frederick, was one of the most competent and successful barristers and pleaders of his time. He knew the law well, both the common law, the statutes, and the rulings; he was an excellent judge of human nature, full of sound practical common sense, and no man could be plainer or more logical than he in statement and argument. In many respects he resembled Luther Martin, and he had the faculty in a remarkable degree, both before judge and before jury, of following up, pursuing, and hunting down with pertinacity and the unerring instinct of a houndsman the point of all others which was the material, vital, and hinging-point of the case upon which he was engaged.

In 1851 the issue raised by the "glorious nineteen" was finally settled. Governor Philip Francis Thomas, in his message to the General Assembly when it met in January, 1850, speaking of the long-deferred question of constitutional reform, very plainly told them that "unless the wishes of the people in this behalf are gratified, the sanction of the Legislature will not much longer be invoked." A "Reform Bill" calling a Constitutional Convention was accordingly adopted; the Convention met in November, and adopted the new constitution of May, 1851.

This instrument did away with the Court of Chancery, made judges and court officers elective by the people, abolished imprisonment for debt, and radically changed the whole court apparatus of the State, simplifying practice and processes, deeds, and instruments, and paving the way for codifying the statutes. The State was divided into eight judicial districts for county courts; there was a Court of Appeals with four judges, and for Baltimore City there were established a Court of Common Pleas, a Superior Court, and a Criminal Court, to which was afterwards added a City Circuit Court. The office of attorney-general was abolished. Under this new system John C. Logrand was elected chief judge of the Court of Appeals, with John Bowie Eccleston, William Hallam Tuck, and John Thompson Mason, associates.

One of the most accomplished and most beloved members of the Frederick and Baltimore bar was Charles H. Pitts, who died in 1864. Mr. Pitts was endowed with those qualities which give usefulness and honor to his calling, thoroughly grounded in the principles of his profession, and quick and able in their perception and application. He was distinguished for his taste and judgment as an advocate, was eloquent, witty, and forcible, full of manliness, honor, and loyalty to duty and to friendship. Mr. Pitts was a native of Frederick, but made Baltimore his home from the time that he came to the bar. The profession had no greater favorite than Mr. Pitts.

Henry Winter Davis, despite the political estrangements to which his radical opinions and his boldness in expressing them gave rise, is acknowledged on all hands to have been one of the brightest and most conspicuous ornaments of the bar of Maryland. He was but forty-nine years old when his death occurred, in December, 1865, yet he had reached a prominent and commanding position in national affairs. Born in Annapolis in 1817, he was educated at Kenyon College, Ohio, and the University of Virginia, with the idea of becoming a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He, however, passed the bar in Alexandria, Va., and after practicing there a while came to Baltimore in 1850. He was always fond of polemics, however, and shone in ecclesiastical controversy. He was in every way a ripe scholar, full of various attainments carefully elaborated, and must have attained success as a writer if his oratorical powers had not swept him away. As an orator he scarcely had his equal, and he was as impressive on the stump as he was in legislative halls. As elector on the Scott ticket in 1852, he canvassed the State as it had never been canvassed before. Then he joined the Know-Nothing movement, and represented Baltimore in the Thirty-fourth, Thirty-fifth, and Thirty-sixth Congresses, and again in the Thirty-eighth, having been defeated for the Thirty-seventh by Hon. Henry May. Mr. Davis was a master of elo-
